[3] On this point the petitioner contends that the law does not authorize a forfeiture of credits for offenses committed by convicts while at liberty on parole, but only for those committed by them while actually confined within the prison inclosure. We are satisfied that this contention is without foundation. The parole law expressly declares that a prisoner out on parole is nevertheless "in the legal custody and under the control of the state board of prison directors." In legal contemplation, therefore, he remains a prisoner, although out on parole. He is in the control of the board and subject to its rules, although otherwise at liberty. The rules which the board may make for his conduct while outside are, as we understand the statute, "the rules and regulations of the prison," within the meaning of that phrase as used in the act providing for the forfeiture of credits, for the violation of which the board may declare such forfeiture. The phrases "rules of the prison" and "rules and regulations of the prison," in the credit law, should be interpreted broadly to include any rule made by the prison board to regulate the conduct of convicts committed to its custody and control, whether for acts done within or without the inclosure. Its language is equivalent to the phrase "rules and regulations of the prison authorities"; i. e., the board of prison directors. We find no reasonable ground for restricting the application of the law to offenses committed by convicts while actually within the prison walls.

There are no other points requiring notice.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the prison authorities.

METROPOLIS TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. MONNIER (HASSHAGEN, First Intervener, and ANDERSON, State Superintendent of Banks, Second Intervener). (S. F. 6132.)

1. MORTGAGES ⇐256 — NEGOTIABILITY — NOTES.

Where a note and the mortgage securing it are executed as part of the same transaction, the note, though negotiable in form, and not referring to the mortgage, is nonnegotiable in fact if taken with notice of the existence of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 678–681, 688; Dec. Dig. ⇐256.]

2. PLEADING ⇐8—CONCLUSION OF PLEADER—ANSWER.

An allegation, in the answer in an action to foreclose a mortgage securing a note, that the note and mortgage were obtained by menace, duress, and fraud exercised by the mortgagee on defendant, and that the mortgagee was then acting as defendant's attorney and occupied a fiduciary relation to defendant, being a mere conclusion of the pleader, was insufficient to present a defense based on the exercise of menace, fraud, or duress.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12–28½, 68; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

3. JUDGMENT ⇐18—PLEADING TO SUSTAIN—FINDINGS OUTSIDE THE ISSUES.

A judgment for defendant, in an action to foreclose a mortgage securing a note, was not authorized by findings that the mortgagee exercised menace, duress, and fraud in procuring the instruments, where the answer failed to state facts sufficient to present a defense based on the exercise of menace, duress or fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 34–37; Dec. Dig. ⇐18.]

4. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇐123—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN — FAIRNESS — BURDEN OF PROOF.

While Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, by which he gains any advantage from his beneficiary, "are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence," does not preclude an attorney from dealing with his client, it places on him, when he does so deal and obtains an advantage thereby, the burden of showing that the transaction was fair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-245, 248, 249; Dec. Dig. ☞123.]

5. TRUSTS ☞283—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN TRUSTEE AND BENEFICIARY—PRESUMPTION—"SUFFICIENT CONSIDERATION."

The presumption arising under Civ. Code, § 2235, relative to transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, by which the trustee obtains an advantage, is that they are without "sufficient consideration," and not that there is a total want of consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 403, 404; Dec. Dig. ☞283.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sufficient Consideration.]

6. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ☞123—CONTRACT PROCURED BY UNDUE INFLUENCE—VALIDITY.

Where an attorney through the exercise of undue influence, but for some consideration, procures from his client a note secured by a mortgage, the transaction is voidable merely, and the instruments cannot be canceled or a recovery on them denied, except on equitable conditions.

7. TRIAL ☞377—REFUSAL TO REOPEN CASE—EVIDENCE IN REBUTTAL OF DEFENSE.

Where, in an action to foreclose a mortgage given by the mortgagor to her attorneys for services rendered, the defense was undue influence, and the attorney for the intervener, owning the instruments sued on, was advised after submission of the cause, but before its determination, that the differences between defendant and such attorney as to the value of his services and her execution of the instruments in payment therefor had been wholly adjusted, and where one of the interveners' attorneys made affidavit that, though he had been previously notified that negotiations were pending for such adjustment, he had been told by defendant's attorney that such negotiations had been abandoned, it was error to refuse to permit a reopening of the case to admit evidence of such adjustment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; A. I. McSorley, Judge.

Action by the Metropolis Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, against Anna Monnier, defendant, Adeline Hasshagen, first intervener, and Alden Anderson, Superintendent of Banks of the State of California, second intervener. From judgment for defendant against all the other parties and denial of new trial, the other parties, with the exception of the Superintendent of Banks, appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellant Hasshagen. Gavin McNab, B. M. Aikins and Geo. W. Mordecai, all of San Francisco, for other appellants. Thomas E. Curran and Francis Dunn, both of San Francisco, for respondent. F. A. Cutler, of San Francisco, for Anderson.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff sued to foreclose a mortgage securing a promissory note executed by the defendant Anna Monnier in favor of Charles L. Patton for the sum of $20,000, payable in one year from August 1, 1908, the date of the note and mortgage. The mortgagee sold and assigned the note and mortgage to the Union State Bank on October 26, 1908. On April 26, 1909, the note and mortgage were transferred to the plaintiff Metropolis Trust & Savings Bank as collateral security for a promissory note made on that date by the Union State Bank in favor of plaintiff. On June 17, 1909, plaintiff for a valuable consideration transferred the note and mortgage to Adeline Hasshagen, who appears in this suit as first intervener, and also transferred to her the note of the Union State Bank which the note and mortgage of Monnier to Patton were assigned to secure. These were taken as part of the consideration of her note and deed of trust for $45,000, on the same date and as part of the same transaction delivered by said Adeline Hasshagen to said plaintiff. However, Mrs. Hasshagen allowed the note and mortgage to remain in the possession of the plaintiff as additional security for her note of $45,000. No part of the note of Monnier to Patton has been paid. More than $20,000 remains unpaid on the note of $45,000 from Hasshagen to plaintiff, and she claims the benefit of the foreclosure sought by the banking corporation plaintiff. The superintendent of banks appears as second intervener, representing the insolvent Union State Bank.

The defendant Anna Monnier set up by way of defense want of consideration, fraud, menace, and duress exercised by Charles L. Patton in obtaining the note and mortgage; and that Patton was her attorney occupying a fiduciary relation at the time when the note and mortgage were executed. After trial of all the issues joined by the various parties claiming interest in the note and mortgage of Monnier to Patton, the court found that, when the note and mortgage were executed, Charles L. Patton long had been and for a long time thereafter continued to be attorney at law for Anna Monnier; that the note and mortgage were procured by the exercise of undue influence over said Anna Monnier on the part of said Charles L. Patton; and that there was no consideration for the note and mortgage, and that the note and mortgage had been procured by menace, fraud, and duress, exerted by Patton on defendant. The conclusion of law from the findings was that the note and mortgage were nonnegotiable; that subsequent transferees thereof took with full notice of all equities existing in favor of the defendant; and that the instruments are void as to Patton and all subsequent transferees. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of defendant against all the other parties, who, with the exception of the superintendent of banks, have duly appealed from the said judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] The first contention of appellants is that the note does not come within the rule announced in Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110, and is a negotiable instrument. It is negotiable in form, and contains no reference to the mortgage, and appellants also insist that the mortgage does not contain covenants not permitted in a nonnegotiable instrument. They seek, therefore, to differentiate this case from Meyer v. Weber, supra. We see no difference in principle between that case and this. The note and mortgage were made, executed, and delivered simultaneously. All of the transfers involved in this litigation were of the note and mortgage. The plaintiff and first intervener pray for relief based upon a covenant of the mortgage not contained in the note, namely, the stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees in case of a suit. So far as all of the parties to this litigation are concerned, the note and mortgage were known to be coexistent and interdependent. They were nonnegotiable. To make them so it was not necessary that the note should state upon its face that it was coupled with a mortgage. Where a note is secured by a contemporary mortgage on land, both instruments having been executed as a part of one transaction, the said note, whether negotiable in form or not, is nonnegotiable in fact if taken with notice of the existence of the mortgage. Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 309, 132 Pac. 259, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861; Meyer v. Weber, supra; Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 125, 121 Pac. 381; Helmer v. Parsons, 18 Cal. App. 451, 123 Pac. 356; Mentry v. Broadway Bank, etc., Co., 20 Cal. App. 389, 129 Pac. 470; National Hardwood Co. et al. v. Sherwood et al., 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 883; Taylor v. Jones, 165 Cal. 108, 131 Pac. 114. The finding of nonnegotiability was therefore supported by ample authority applicable to the facts disclosed at the trial.

[2] The allegation that the note and mortgage were given without any consideration presented a material issue in the case, on which the court found in favor of defendant. The allegation touching the menace, duress, and fraud asserted to have been exercised by Patton upon defendant was in the following language, no less and no more:

"That said note and mortgage were obtained by the means of menace, duress, and fraud exercised and exerted by said Charles L. Patton upon this defendant, and that said Charles L. Patton was at all said times acting as the attorney of this defendant and occupied a fiduciary relation to this defendant."

The court, as has been said, found the note and mortgage were procured by means of menace, duress, and fraud. As a pleading charging menace or fraud or duress this answer is wholly insufficient to raise an issue or present a defense. It contains no averment of fact whatsoever, and rests upon the naked, unsupported, legal conclusion of the pleader. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 425, 91 Am. Dec. 644; Capuro v. Builders Ins. Co., 39 Cal. 123; Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631, 22 Pac. 404, 13 Am. St. Rep. 200; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488.

[3] Nor, as such an allegation tendered no issue upon the question of menace, fraud or deceit, was it incumbent upon appellants, in availing themselves of this defect, to demur to the answer either upon general or special grounds. A general ground of demurrer would not have availed, since the pleading did state a defense under the allegation of lack of consideration. The issues of fraud, menace, and duress not being in the case, appellants could rest until evidence was sought to be offered concerning them, and then properly make their objection to the introduction of such evidence. For, as is said in People v. McKenna, supra, discussing the necessity of averment of facts in such cases:

"It matters not that no objection is made by demurrer (to the absence of them). Objection may be made at any time because it goes to the substance of the complaint or indictment. The question whether a thing has been done fraudulently is a matter of law, and an allegation of fraud in general terms presents no issuable fact."

It follows herefrom that appellants' position is correct in declaring that this judgment cannot derive support from the findings of the exercise of menace, duress, and fraud.

The court also found that Patton exercised undue influence. It is a singular circumstance, however, that undue influence is not directly tendered by defendant as an issue, and at the most it is only inferentially tendered in the allegation above quoted that Patton was her attorney at the time she gave him the note and mortgage.

Perhaps, if no other ground of objection to the judgment appeared, it might well be argued that the trial below proceeded on the theory that this ground of defense was sufficiently pleaded, and that, after such trial and a finding on the issue, the appellant could not question the sufficiency of the pleading for the first time on appeal. As will appear, however, the judgment must be reversed for other reasons, and this proposition need not be considered. Upon a new trial, the course of proceedings, and perhaps the pleadings themselves, will be different, and it is unlikely that the question now under discussion will be presented in the same aspect.

The finding that the note and mortgage were entirely without consideration would support the judgment, regardless of any question of fraud or undue influence, but this finding is manifestly contrary to the evidence. The undisputed testimony is that the note and mortgage were given in exchange for the surrender of existing contracts between Mrs. Monnier and Mr. Patton and another attorney, providing for the employment of said attorneys on certain terms. That some services were rendered and some compensation due is not to be questioned. The defense must therefore rest entirely on the finding that the note and mortgage had been obtained through the exercise of undue influence.

[4] Assuming that, upon another trial, the defense of undue influence will be within the issues, it is proper to point out that a prima facie case in support of this defense would be made out by proof that Mr. Patton, prior to and at the time he took the note and mortgage, was acting as attorney for Mrs. Monnier. The relation of attorney and client is of a fiduciary character, and the Civil Code (section 2235) clearly provides that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, "are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." This does not mean that a trustee may not deal with his beneficiary. But, if he does deal with him in such manner as to obtain an advantage, the trustee has the burden of showing by evidence that the transaction was fair. Certainly the obtaining of a note for $20,000, secured by mortgage, is an advantage, and the attorney, or those claiming under him, cannot safely rest, as they did in this case, without affirmative proof of the facts surrounding the transaction. On the question of the applicability of the presumption declared by section 2235, it is sufficient to refer to Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, 105 Pac. 981, and authorities there cited. See, also, Cooley v. Miller, 142 Pac. 83, 88.

[5, 6] It will be observed that the presumption is, not only that undue influence was exercised, but that there was no "sufficient consideration." This does not mean that a total want of consideration is presumed. Besides, as we have already pointed out, there was a clear showing that the giving of the note and mortgage was supported by some consideration. In this connection it may be remarked that, even if undue influence had been established, the note and mortgage would not thereby have been rendered void, in the extreme sense of that term. The transaction would have been voidable merely, and the instruments should not have been ordered canceled, or a recovery on them denied, except upon equitable conditions, such as, for example, the payment to Patton or his assignees of the fair value of the contracts surrendered upon the giving of the note and mortgage.

[7] This brings us to the last proposition necessary here for consideration. After the submission of the cause and before its determination, appellant Hasshagen's attorney was advised that the differences between Patton and Mrs. Monnier touching the value of his services and her execution of the note and mortgage in payment therefor had been wholly and completely adjusted and settled, which adjustment and settlement necessarily, and as matter of course, disposed of all the real and attempted defenses of undue influence, menace, fraud, duress, and lack of consideration. Application to the court was timely made to permit the opening of the case for the taking of this evidence, which, if forthcoming, was a complete defense and bar to the assertion of all of Mrs. Monnier's equitable claims for relief. The court refused permission to open the case and rendered judgment in favor of Mrs. Monnier and against the validity of her note and mortgage. The court found its justification for this refusal in that the attorneys of appellant had failed in proper diligence in securing knowledge of this compromise and adjustment. This notwithstanding the fact that one of the attorneys for appellant made affidavit that he was advised that negotiations for such settlement were in progress between Mr. Patton and Mrs. Monnier, but was further advised by one of Mrs. Monnier's attorneys that the negotiations had fallen through and the attempted settlement had been abandoned. It is manifest that this evidence presented a complete answer to Mrs. Monnier's defense. Moreover, it is equally manifest that to refuse admission of this evidence, which admission was sought before the determination of the case, would result in enabling Mrs. Monnier with gross injustice to reap the benefit of an asserted fraud, for which she had already received full and satisfactory compensation. We can but repeat the language of this court in Sulloway v. Sulloway, 160 Cal. 508, 117 Pac. 522:

"He might properly have been required, as a condition precedent to the granting of his application, to reimburse defendant for the expense of bringing back his witnesses, but the absolute denial of his application to be allowed to introduce evidence on the matters referred to, when he was so clearly entitled to prevail on the merits, and where the effect of a judgment against him would be to practically deprive him for all time of any use or enjoyment of the water rights given him by the will, must be held to constitute prejudicial error."

It was therefore a plain abuse of discretion for the court to have refused to hear the offered evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

TAXATION — § 79 — TRANSFER TAX — GIFTS — "CONTEMPLATION OF DEATH."

Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1911, p. 713) § 1, subsec. 3, imposes a tax upon the transfer of any property, without adequate consideration, in contemplation of death or intended to take effect in possession at or after his death, and section 27 as amended, declares that the words "contemplation of death" shall include that expectancy of death actuating the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and shall not be limited to that expectancy of death actuating the mind of one making a gift causa mortis, and that the purpose of the act is to tax all transfers made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of property by testate or intestate laws. The deceased suffered from a tumorous growth, which in 1904, and about once a year thereafter, necessitated an operation, and which in September, 1910, necessitated the amputation of his right leg. Two days before such operation he gave certain hotel property to his wife, and, after the trouble returned, gave certain other property to her and made a will, and on May 26, 1911, he conveyed to his son a department store property worth $100,000, and assigned to him the goods therein on his assumption of an indebtedness of $30,000 and his payment of $600 a month during the grantor's life. Held, that the gifts to the wife and to the son were made in "contemplation of death," and as substitutes for gifts by will, and were subject to the transfer tax.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of George N. Reynolds, deceased. From decree of the court in probate imposing an inheritance tax upon property disposed of by deceased in his lifetime, Laura T. Reynolds and another appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. McIntyre, of Riverside, for appellants. Lyman Evans, Dist. Atty., of Riverside, and Robert A. Waring, State Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This appeal is from the decree of the court in probate imposing an inheritance tax upon property disposed of by the deceased during his lifetime.

By the inheritance tax act (Stats. 1911, p. 713) a tax is imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal, or mixed (subsection 3, § 1)—

"when the transfer is of property made by a resident, or by a non-resident when such non-resident's property is within this state, by deed, grant, bargain, sale, assignment or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, assignor or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death."

The words italicized were added to the act by the amendment of 1911. Otherwise the act is in language identical with the earlier inheritance tax act of 1905. Stats. 1905, p. 341. However, it had long and uniformly been held that transfers made upon valuable and adequate consideration were not within the purview of the inheritance tax act, and therefore the amendment served but to clarify and not to change the pre-existing law. Section 27 of the same act, as amended in 1911, declares as follows:

"The words 'contemplation of death,' as used in this act, shall be taken to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in no wise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

This amendment also served the purpose of elucidating without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning.

With the law thus before us, we may come to the facts of the case. George N. Reynolds in his lifetime was a resident of the city of Riverside and was possessed of much wealth. He died testate in September, 1911. The cause of his death was sarcoma—a malignant tumorous growth which first made its appearance upon one of his hips. The excision of a sarcoma by surgical operation sometimes results in an eradication of the trouble. At other times it is recurrent. In the case of Mr. Reynolds the first surgical operation became necessary in 1904. Thereafter the tumor returned, and he was obliged to submit to an operation about once a year. In the later stages of the affliction more frequent operations became necessary; the last three occurring three months apart. Mr. Reynolds was well advised of the character of sarcoma, knew from experience the danger of its recurrence, and that if not successfully eradicated it meant death. On the 3d of September, 1910, about one year before his death, it was deemed necessary to perform one last drastic operation. That was the amputation of his right leg at the hip. This operation held out the only hope of checking his mortal disease. Two days before the operation was performed he made a gift of the Reynolds Hotel property to his wife, Laura T. Reynolds. He recovered from the effects of the operation, but in the spring of 1911 began to fail. The sarcoma returned and, as has been said, occasioned his death in September. On April 14, 1911, he made another gift of the Nevada Block in Riverside to his wife. One day thereafter he made his will, leaving $10,000 to his wife, and the remainder of his estate, appraised in the probate proceedings at about $110,000, to his son Charles; the wife and son constituting his sole heirs at law. The inheritance tax appraiser valued the property thus deceded to the wife at $125,000. It was about six months after the last operation when Mr. Reynolds began to fail. He was confined to his home from June until his death. On May 26th he conveyed to his son Charles the property known as the Reynolds Department Store, valued by the inheritance tax appraiser at $100,000, and on the same day assigned and transferred to him the merchandise in the store. Under the transfer the son Charles assumed all the indebtedness of the business, amounting to about $30,000, and agreed to pay his father $600 per month during his life. The court in probate, after the taking of evidence, held that these transfers were subject to the inheritance tax and decreed accordingly. Whether or no the court's findings in this regard are supported by the evidence is the essential question upon this appeal. In passing upon such transfers the law which will direct trial courts and this court has been sufficiently indicated in the quotations already made. Little or no aid upon the question will be found in the adjudications of other states under their varying laws, and least of all from the courts of New York, which first gave an extremely narrow construction to a gift or transfer "in contemplation of death," holding their statute to mean a gift causa mortis, and to be applicable to no other kinds or characters of transfers. In re Price's Estate, 62 Misc. Rep. 149, 116 N. Y. Supp. 283, reviews the history of the decisions of that state. Nothing in our law compels us to adopt the restricted construction put by the courts of New York upon their own statute, and everything in our law directs that a liberal construction should be placed upon it to the end that its provisions be not evaded.

Coming then to the testimony in the case, we have already spoken of the physical condition of the deceased and of his knowledge of the character of his ailment. The transfers to his wife were admittedly gifts, pure and simple. They were made prior to and following an operation "considered absolutely necessary to save his life." Mrs. Reynolds speaks of the transfers to her as gifts and says that they were made under Mr. Reynolds' promise to make provision for her. After his death she filed her election to take these gifts instead of the benefits under the will. All this was done under the agreement that she had had with Mr. Reynolds, that the property given to her was in lieu of all rights and claims which she might have against his estate. It would seem to be clear beyond peradventure that, as to these transfers, they were made in that contemplation of death which the law designates, and that they were gifts in life substituted for gifts by will. The transfers to the son stand upon a slightly but not an essentially different plane. If it can be said that there was any element of valuable consideration received back by the father for his transfer to the son, it was certainly not adequate from any commercial point of view. He was in failing health at the time the gift was made. It was known, and he knew, that his tumor had returned and that the days of his life were numbered, and the agreement to assume an indebtedness of $30,000 in consideration of a gift in value exceeding $100,000 and the further agreement to pay $600 a month during the donor's life (which agreement itself does not seem to have been observed), certainly do not measure up to the requirements of the law of a valuable and adequate consideration. Indeed, it seems to be quite plain that, as in the case of the widow, so in the case of the son, the father in contemplation of death was transferring by gift instead of devise the valuable business which he owned and had theretofore conducted.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William Richard Broome, deceased. From a decree of final distribution, Frances Broome, widow of deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 162 Cal. 258, 122 Pac. 470.

Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco, for appellant. Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an attempted appeal by Frances Broome, widow of William Richard Broome, deceased, from a decree of final distribution given in the latter's estate.

[1] It would appear that on this appeal a different construction of the will of William Richard Broome is sought from that put upon it by the decree, but the record presented to us forbids an examination of the question. It is axiomatic that papers not properly authenticated as having been used on a hearing resulting in a judgment or order or decree cannot be considered on appeal. Saving those papers, and those alone, which may be regarded as constituting the judgment roll, all others require authentication by the judge. What may be regarded as constituting the judgment roll in an appeal such as this is set forth in Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 135 Pac. 970. There it is said:

"These would be the petition for distribution, the opposition thereto, if any written opposition was filed, the counter petitions filed, if any there were, or any other papers in the nature of pleadings filed at or before the hearing purporting to set forth the claim of parties who appeared and claimed distribution, with the answers thereto, also the findings of the court, if any, upon the issues formed, any orders or other papers of like character to those mentioned in section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the decree of distribution itself."

These papers, and these alone, are we permitted to consider upon this appeal.

[2] But the transcript brought upon support of this appeal, apparently prepared under the new method (C. C. P. § 953a), consists of a number of papers, records, and documents, including the order admitting the will to probate, petition for letters of administration with the will annexed, order appointing administrator with the will annexed, and stipulation of the parties, bearing for certification nothing further than the declaration of the clerk that the copies contained in the transcript are true and correct copies of the same "as they appear on file and of record in my office." Therefore the will of William Richard Broome, deceased, upon which the decree of distribution is based, is not before this court for consideration. We do not mean by this to be understood as saying that, if any of the papers and files which we are authorized to consider contained either an exposition of the will or such reference to it as to make it a part of the judgment roll, it might not here be considered. But such is not the condition of affairs presented by this appeal. The petition for distribution declares merely that the petitioner is the administrator with the will annexed, and asks that distribution be decreed, to this appellant one-third of the estate, and to the three named children of the deceased each two-ninths of the estate. The decree of distribution in precise terms follows the petition. The will is thus merged in the decree of distribution. It is merely a part of the evidence upon which the decree of distribution is based. Wills v. Wills, 166 Cal. 529, 532, 137 Pac. 249. "On appeal the presumptions of law are all in favor of the action of the court below.

If error is claimed, the record on appeal must contain sufficient legal evidence of it or the claim must be disregarded." Estate of Gamble, supra.

Such is the precise situation here presented, and for this reason the decree appealed from is affirmed.

1. EJECTMENT $\Leftrightarrow$ 94—TITLE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in ejectment held sufficient to show the identity of the land occupied by defendants with the section to which plaintiffs had title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 279; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 94.]

2. PUBLIC LANDS $\Leftrightarrow$ 28—RESURVEY—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Where the original federal survey of public lands became useless through disappearance of monuments, and Congress ordered a resurvey to be made, which was done, defendants, who subsequently entered upon a school section not open to entry established by such resurvey, could not object to the abandonment of the previous survey when they had claimed no rights in the lands previous to the act authorizing the resurvey; the public lands being under the exclusive control of Congress until title or right to acquire it has vested in some person other than the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 28.]

3. PUBLIC LANDS $\Leftrightarrow$ 54—SURVEYS—TITLE OF STATE PATENTEES.

Where defendants entered upon a school section established by a previous resurvey of public lands pursuant to act of Congress, and where such lands were claimed by the plaintiffs as state patentees, if the land in controversy was made a school section by the original government survey, the defendants could not defeat plaintiffs' title, since plaintiffs held by state patent of a certain tract delimited by such original survey; while, if the first survey was not efficient to render the tract school land so as to be subject to the grant of the state, it remained public land of the United States subject to the jurisdiction of Congress as to which the resurvey was authorized, and which resurvey identified the tract as school land belonging to the state or its grantees, and accordingly not open to entry by defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 152-164, 166-169; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 54.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; F. J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Augusta Z. Nichols and others against W. F. McCullom and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Leroy A. Wright, of San Diego, W. H. Larew, of Madera, J. S. Larew, of El Centro, Powers & Holland, of Los Angeles, and Wright & Winnick, of San Diego, for appellants. Eshleman & Swing and Conkling & Brown, all of El Centro, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to recover possession of a tract of land in Imperial county, with damages for the withholding. There was a jury trial, which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendants. From the judgment entered pursuant to the verdict, the plaintiffs appeal, bringing up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

The land in controversy is described as fractional section 16 of fractional township 17 south, range 15 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, containing 441.96 acres more or less. The land thus described was originally public land of the United States, and, being a sixteenth section, it passed from the United States to the state of California as a part of the school land grant. It is not disputed that the plaintiffs have acquired the state title as successors to the holders of a patent from the state, dated January 12, 1903. Nor is it questioned that the defendants are in possession of land which, according to the claim of plaintiffs, forms a part of the section granted by the state patent. The real point of contention is whether the plaintiffs have succeeded in establishing the identity of the land occupied by defendants with fractional section 16 of township 17 south, range 15 east, San Bernardino base and meridian. In other words, the defendants took at the trial, and now take, the position that, while the plaintiffs are unquestionably the owners of that section, the proof fails to show that the land claimed and withheld by the defendants is within the section thus described. The jury, by returning a verdict for the defendants, determined this issue in their favor. The appellants attack the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and assign as error certain instructions of the court.

The tract in controversy, with neighboring land, located in what is known as Imperial valley, was originally surveyed under the authority of the government of the United States in 1856. The survey was approved, and the approved plat filed in the Department of the Interior and in the local land office in 1857. It is a matter of common knowledge, and is, in fact, sufficiently shown by the record in this case, that the land embraced in this survey, or the greater part thereof, remained unoccupied for many years. When it was discovered that the apparently barren lands in Imperial valley could be rendered exceedingly productive by means of irrigation, an extensive settlement of the valley began. By that time the monuments referred to in the field notes of the survey of 1856 had, to a great extent, been obliterated, and it was difficult, and in many cases impossible, to trace upon the ground the boundaries of the governmental subdivisions as established by the survey. Moved, no doubt, by the knowledge of these conditions, the Congress of the United States passed an act, entitled "An act providing for the resurvey of certain townships in San Diego county, California." (The land is within the territory which has, since the passage of the act, been taken from San Diego county to form the new county of Imperial.) By this act, which was approved July 1, 1902, it was enacted:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized to cause to be made a resurvey of the lands of San Diego county, in the state of California, embraced in and consisting of the tier of townships 13, 14, 15 and 16 south, of range 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 east, and the fractional township 17 south, of range 15 and 16 east, all of San Bernardino base and meridian; * * * provided, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands to the lands so occupied."

Pursuant to this law resurveys of the townships described were ordered. Among others, instructions for surveying township 17 south, range 15 east, were issued to Legrand Friel, United States deputy surveyor. Mr. Friel made his survey, and filed his returns with the surveyor general. They were transmitted to the General Land Office for its approval. Such approval was refused for reasons stated in a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who returned the papers to the surveyor general for California with directions to except from approval the establishment of the alleged school sections; the Commissioner stating that the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each of the townships involved would be "platted and located in conformity with the claim lines of adjacent sections as shown by the resurvey." A corrected survey and plat were made, and were duly approved. The record contains a decision of the Commissioner, under date of November 4, 1910, adjudging that "tract 159" is a school section represented upon the plat of resurvey; i. e., section 16 of township 17. At the trial the defendants admitted that they were occupying "the tract of land on that map as section 16 by the new survey"—the land "marked as tract 159 on the plat."

It should be added that at the date of the approval of the act providing for a resurvey (July 1, 1902) the defendants had not gone into possession of the land, and had taken no steps toward acquiring any title thereto. They were not, therefore, within the scope of the proviso with which the enactment ends.

[1, 2] On the foregoing evidence, none of which is disputed, it seems clear that the plaintiffs made out a complete case of ownership and right of possession of the land in controversy, and that the verdict of the jury against their claim is unsupported.

The act of July 1, 1902, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be made a resurvey of certain townships. As we have already pointed out, the lines of the original survey could not with certainty be traced upon the ground. The purpose of the congressional enactment undoubtedly was that the new survey directed to be made should supersede the old one, which had become unavailable. It was intended that the dispositions of the public lands within the area affected should be regulated by the new survey, which, in theory at least, would reproduce the exact corners and lines of the old one. The Congress recognized, however, that some of these lands were held by occupants who claimed or might claim vested rights. Such claims were expressly saved from the effect of the act by the proviso at the end. But the very fact that this proviso was inserted lends added force to the view that, as to all persons not then in occupancy of any of the lands, the resurvey was intended to be binding. We see no constitutional objection to such an enactment. The public lands are under the exclusive control of Congress until title or a right to acquire title has, pursuant to some law, vested in some person or body corporate other than the United States. A person who claims no right in such public lands certainly cannot object to the act of Congress in abandoning a survey already made, and substituting another in its place. This would be true even if the monuments of the original survey were readily discoverable. The power of Congress to provide for a resurvey is much clearer where, as here, it has become impossible or exceedingly difficult to make a correct application of the original survey.

[3] But, say the respondents, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections were identified by the survey of 1856, and, upon the approval of that survey, they at once passed to the state of California. Higgins v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 252; Sherman v. Buick, 45 Cal. 656. They then, it is argued, ceased to be public lands, and the power of the federal government to exercise any control over them, by survey or otherwise, ceased. But the location of these sections was necessarily dependent upon the location of the adjoining sections of public land still undisposed of. In delimiting the boundaries of the adjoining sections, it was necessary that the boundaries of the school sections should be marked out and determined. Furthermore, this contention, it seems to us, can hardly be urged against the appellants, who are accepting the resurvey as accurately describing the land owned by them. Such appellants might, perhaps, be in a position to attack the resurvey on the ground that its effect was to take from them land to which they already had title. But they are the only parties entitled to make this point. When they rely upon the resurvey as an accurate designation of the school section owned by them, the respondents, who do not claim under the state, and who were not making a claim of any kind when the statute authorizing the survey was passed, cannot object. If, according to the survey of 1856, the land in controversy was the sixteenth section, the appellants have a perfect title to it, and the respondents clearly have neither title nor right of possession. If it was not school land, it remained public land of the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction of Congress. In that aspect, the resurvey was unquestionably authorized, and the respondents can have no valid claim to land which was identified by the resurvey as school land which belonged to the state or its grantees, and was accordingly not open to entry.

The authorities cited by respondents to the effect that the Land Department has no authority by means of a resurvey or otherwise to affect the title to land after such title has passed from the government to its grantees (Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530, 24 L. Ed. 848; Kean v. Roby, 145 Ind. 221, 42 N. E. 1012; Murphy v. Kirwan [C. C.] 103 Fed. 104) have no application to the facts of this case. In none of these cases had there been congressional authorization to make a resurvey which should take the place (so far as claims to be thereafter initiated were concerned) of an existing survey.

If the act of 1902 has been rightly interpreted by us, there is no occasion to consider the argument of respondents to the effect that the decision of the Land Department of the government fixing the location of section 16 was erroneous, and that said section was placed by the new survey at a different place from that occupied by section 16 under the survey of 1856. The new survey superseded the old one. Parties going upon the land after the passage of the act, and with constructive knowledge of the fact that such survey was to be made, took the chance that such survey might establish that the land occupied by them was a school section, and not subject to entry as vacant lands of the United States.

The foregoing views make it unnecessary to consider specifically the various points made by appellants in attacking rulings on evidence and instructions to the jury. These questions can readily be solved by the application of the principles outlined in this opinion. Nor need we discuss the claim that the court erred in overruling plaintiffs' challenge to a juror. The same situation will not, in all likelihood, be presented on a new trial.

The judgment is reversed.

Smith, Miller & Phelps, of Los Angeles, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Anderson & Anderson, Leslie R. Hewitt, John W. Sherk, City Atty., and A. P. Fleming, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment.

This case is similar to the series of nine cases begun by the State of California to determine the state's right and title to certain lands in the bay of San Pedro and mentioned in the opinion in People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 576, 138 Pac. 79. The complaint, in form, states a cause of action to quiet title to a tract of land containing about seven acres. The judgment is that the state of California is the owner of all that portion of the tract which lies south of the boundary line of the San Pedro grant to Manuel Dominguez of December 18, 1858, the same being tidelands, and that the defendants, other than William Banning, own all that part of the tract lying north of said boundary line, and that no adjudication is made as to the littoral rights, if any, of the defendants in or over the land adjudged to the plaintiff.

[1] The defendants claim as purchasers of tidelands from the state, under the provisions of the Political Code, §§ 3440 to 3493½, inclusive. The land lies within two miles of the town of Wilmington. A part of it is included in Tideland Location No. 57, being the location of that number referred to in the opinions in People v. California Fish Co., supra, and People v. Banning Co., 166 Cal. at page 632, 138 Pac. 100. The remainder is included in Tideland Location No. 53, application for the purchase of which was made in 1877, and a certificate of purchase therefor issued in 1880 to James McFadden, to whose rights the defendants have succeeded. Under the decisions above mentioned, all this land was withheld from sale by state officers by the law in force at the time the purchases were made, because of the fact that it was within two miles of the town of Wilmington. Upon the principle stated in those cases the sales and patents under which the defendants claim are void. The reasons were fully stated in the opinions in those cases, and it is unnecessary to consider them here.

[2] The defendants also claim that they established title to the tideland by prescription. The land here involved, so far as the tideland is concerned, is the same tract that was under consideration in the case of Patton v. Wilmington, 147 Pac. 141, this day decided. In the opinion in that case we have treated the subject at length. For like reasons we here hold that defendants did not obtain title by their adverse possession. No other questions are presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by the People against the Southern Pacific Railway Company and others. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, of Los Angeles (Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, Ward Chapman, Sheldon Borden, W. R. Millar, and E. E. Bacon, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leslie R. Hewitt, John W. Shenk, A. P. Fleming, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is one of the "tideland cases," so called, decided by this court in a number of opinions filed at the same time; the first of the series being People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 576, 138 Pac. 79. In the present case a rehearing was ordered.

The opinion originally filed was prepared by Shaw, J., and read as follows:

"In this case separate appeals from the order denying a new trial and from the judgment are presented, one by the San Pedro Lumber Company and the other by the other defendants. The action is in all respects similar to the action in People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 576, 138 Pac. 79 (L. A. No. 3060), in which we have fully discussed all of the questions involved in this action, except those hereinafter mentioned. The case involves the land embraced in tideland locations Nos. 63 and 64. Applications and surveys for these locations were approved on April 11, 1881, first payments were made on April 15, 1881, certificates of purchase were issued on April 23, 1881, to P. C. Learned, and a single patent was issued for both locations to said Learned on May 16, 1882. Certain wharf franchises and permits for railroad and wharf purposes, being those mentioned in L. A. No. 3056, People v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. et al., 166 Cal. 614, 138 Pac. 94, and also a wharf franchise granted by the city of San Pedro, were excluded from consideration by the court below, and all rights claimed thereunder were excepted from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff. A large part of the lands are, and always have been, above the high tide line. The court below found that this upland was the property of the defendant San Pedro Lumber Company, and gave judgment to that effect. That company, in its brief, does not claim by prescription. The remaining portion was found to be a part of the state tide and submerged lands and was adjudicated to be the property of the plaintiff. All of the land lies within two miles of the town of Wilmington as incorporated in 1872. The question of the validity of the patents under which the defendants claim the tidelands was fully discussed in the opinion in L. A. No. 3060 aforesaid; this case being one of the series of cases therein mentioned. Upon the principles there stated, the patent conveyed no title to tidelands or submerged lands.

"The Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company constructed an electric railroad over a part of the land, being a part of its line from Los Angeles to San Pedro, and operated the same for some time and then leased it to the appellant Pacific Electric Railway Company, which has ever since operated it. The railway was constructed less than five years before these actions were begun. It does not appear that either company ever obtained a permit to build and maintain the railroad, either from the state or the municipal authorities. The court below correctly decided that no right to the tideland was gained by this use for railroad purposes.

"An error was made in the judgment respecting the upland awarded to the San Pedro Lumber Company. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company have certain titles and rights therein which are not mentioned in the judgment. The parties have stipulated that this error may be corrected by this court by a specified modification of the judgment. This modification will be made in accordance with the stipulation, but without costs. In other respects the judgment is correct. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

"The following clause in the judgment appealed from, to wit, 'And as to said excepted portion above described it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the San Pedro Lumber Company is the owner thereof,' is changed and modified so as to read as follows: 'And as to said excepted portion above described it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the San Pedro Lumber Company is the owner thereof, except all that portion thereof described as follows: Commencing at a point on the center line of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, where said center line intersects United States bulkhead line between stations 52 and * * * of the survey of bulkhead lines which was established by the United States in July, 1908, in San Pedro harbor, and running thence southerly along said railroad following the curvature thereof and embracing a strip of land twenty (20) feet on each side of said center line to the southerly boundary of said last above-described land, and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is the owner thereof, also except an easement for right of way conveyed prior to the commencement of this action by the San Pedro Lumber Company to the Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company by deed dated February 25, 1905, and recorded in Book 4001, p. 13, of deeds, records of Los Angeles county, Cal.; and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company is the owner of said easement of right of way last described. And as so modified the judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondent.'"

The rehearing was ordered on the petition of San Pedro Lumber Company, which asked this court to pass specifically on its claim of prescriptive title, and on the question of its littoral rights. Although the first contention had not been advanced in the briefs, and the second was, as we thought, settled by the contemporaneous decision in People v. S. P. R. Co., 166 Cal. 627, 138 Pac. 103, the rehearing was ordered, for the reason, principally, that further consideration of the question of prescriptive title was deemed desirable.

[1] Decisions rendered by this court since the rehearing was ordered dispense with the necessity of extended discussion of either of the questions thus presented. In Patton v. City of Wilmington, 147 Pac. 141 (L. A. No. 3485), filed March 4, 1915, it was held that a title to tidelands, which have been withheld from sale by the state, cannot be acquired by adverse possession. It is true that the justices joining in the decision differed widely in their reasons for this conclusion, but five of them united in declaring that, on one ground or another, a prescriptive title to such lands could not be acquired against the state. The court has thus finally repudiated the doctrine that a qualified title (viz., a title to the fee, subject to the public easements) may thus be acquired. This view had been declared in People v. Banning, 140 Pac. 587 (L. A. No. 3077), and People v. Banning, 140 Pac. 591 (L. A. No. 3061), decided at the same time as the California Fish Company Case, but in each of these cases the judgment was vacated and a rehearing ordered. The two cases were subsequently disposed of upon stipulation of the parties; there being no decision upon the point now under discussion.

[2] The claim of littoral rights is met by a reference to Henry Dalton & Sons Co. v. Oakland, 143 Pac. 721, where it is held, on the authority of People v. S. P. R. R. Co., 166 Cal. 627, 138 Pac. 103, that the owner of upland bordering upon navigable waters cannot assert an interest in the intervening tidelands, as against the right of the state or its authorized agencies to hold and control such tidelands in furtherance of the public uses of navigation and fishery. The decree here appealed from adjudged merely that the plaintiff is the owner of the tidelands in question, and that the defendants have no interest therein. This is a correct determination of the respective rights of the parties in such lands. Whether the owner of the upland may occupy the tidelands until the state, or its agency, sees fit to take possession of them in furtherance of some plan to aid navigation, or whether, when that time comes, the San Pedro Lumber Company will be entitled to compensation on account of structures erected by it on these lands, are questions that are not presented by the record before us, and that may well be left to be decided when they arise. See People v. Cal. Fish. Co., supra.

[3, 4] The opinion heretofore filed is approved as a correct determination of the points therein decided.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is modified as provided in said former opinion, and as so modified is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Petition by Paul Stewart for probate of a foreign will of Florence E. Chase, deceased, contested by Ernest W. Chase and others. Petition denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Waldo M. York and Enyeart & Holton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. There was offered for probate in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles a foreign will of Florence E. Chase, deceased, which will, it was averred, had been duly admitted to probate in the probate court of the county of Penobscot, state of Maine, of which state it was also alleged Florence E. Chase was a resident at the time of her death. Elinor A. Chase Stevens was the sole devisee and beneficiary under this will. The petitioner for the probate thereof, Paul Stewart, asserts an interest in the will through assignment from Elinor A. Chase Stevens. This offer was met by a contest instituted by the beneficiaries under the will of Horace W. Chase, deceased, who in his lifetime had been a brother of Florence E. Chase, deceased. In their contest they alleged that another will of Florence E. Chase, deceased, had been duly admitted to probate in the superior court of Los Angeles county; that by this will the property left by Florence E. Chase was to be disposed of precisely as was the property of her brother Horace W. Chase; that they were beneficiaries under the will of Horace W. Chase, deceased, and thus interested in the will of Florence E. Chase; that to this will a contest had been instituted by Elinor A. Chase Stevens and Paul Stewart, and that their contest had been dismissed. In this contest Elinor A. Chase Stevens and Paul Stewart offered for probate this foreign will of Florence E. Chase. Further, the contestants pleaded an injunctive judgment obtained by them in an action prosecuted against Elinor A. Chase Stevens and Paul Stewart by which judgment Elinor A. Chase Stevens—

“and all her counselors, attorneys, solicitors, and agents and all others acting in aid or assistance of her, were required to absolutely desist and refrain from presenting for probate in this superior court the said alleged will of Florence E. Chase, deceased, purporting to be dated February 17, 1912, and alleged to have been admitted to probate in the probate court of the county of Penobscot, state of Maine, on the 29th day of May, 1912, and also were required to absolutely desist and refrain from in any way contesting the will of said Florence E. Chase, deceased, heretofore admitted to probate in this superior court on the 24th day of May, 1912; that the said judgment of said court was duly entered in said court in March, 1913; that thereafter, after the entry of said judgment against said Elinor A. Chase Stevens, she moved said court to vacate and set aside the said judgment, which said motion was denied by said court, and the said judgment against the said Elinor A. Chase Stevens, and the said order denying the same have become final, and no appeal has been taken therefrom.”

The order of the court in probate dismissing the contest of Elinor A. Chase Stevens and Paul Stewart, seeking a revocation of the probate of the will of Florence E. Chase, was made after and in pursuance of this judgment. To all of these matters so pleaded as grounds of contest to the probate of the foreign will of Florence E. Chase, so proffered for probate in California by Paul Stewart, Paul Stewart demurred, and, his demurrer having been overruled, he declined to answer. Upon this state of the record, after the making of voluminous findings in accordance with the allegations above set forth, the trial court decreed the probate of the will of Florence E. Chase, deceased, to be irrevocable and conclusive, and denied the application of Paul Stewart for the probate of the foreign will.

[1] The attitude of appellant in standing upon his demurrer without answer is, of course, in legal effect, an admission of the truth of all the allegations well pleaded in the contest. Thus, it stands admitted that he has acquired his interest in the estate of Florence E. Chase, deceased, through assignment from Elinor A. Chase Stevens, sole beneficiary under the foreign will, and that he took this assignment subject to the injunction above set forth. Indeed, appellant does not question this, but founds his right to a probate of the will upon the proposition that the so-called contest is not a contest at all; that the injunctive judgment does not raise an estoppel against him, and that the sole question with which the court will deal under his offer of probate is whether the instrument under investigation is the legally valid, free act of a competent testatrix, and upon this he argues, that, as it has been so decreed by virtue of its admission to probate in the courts of Maine, it must be so held here, under the provisions of article 4, section 1, Constitution of the United States, requiring that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state.

[2] Appellant's position, however, is a mistaken one. True it is that in terms our Code does not say that an estoppel by judgment may be pleaded as a ground of contest against the offer of probate of a foreign will, and true it is, also, that it specifies the general grounds of contest. But it would be beyond reason to hold that in the enumeration of these specific grounds of contest the law meant to declare that the principles of res judicata and estoppel by judgment were inapplicable in such a contest. By solemn and final decree equity has forbidden this appellant from doing the precise thing which he undertakes to do. It would verge upon the absurd to hold that the court, before which he seeks to do this thing, must disregard that decree when formally presented for its consideration. Marco v. Low, 55 Me. 553; Moors v. Ladenburg, 178 Mass. 272, 59 N. E. 676. Whatever informalities or irregularities may have attached to the original judgment for lack of due service upon Elinor A. Chase Stevens, it appears and is found that she subsequently came into the courts of California to cause that judgment to be reviewed and set aside. Her application was denied, her right to appeal is gone, and unquestionably that judgment is now final and binding. Lake v. Bonyng, 161 Cal. 120, 118 Pac. 535.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

1. BROKERS — 66—DIVISION OF COMMISSIONS — CONTRACT—SUBSTITUTION.

Plaintiffs and another real estate broker entered into a contract to divide any commissions obtained from the sale of specified realty. The property was intended to be sold to the county, and, as another broker was urging the county to purchase a different parcel, the three entered into a second contract reciting that, plaintiffs having obtained from their associate the sole agency for the property, and the two having agreed to divide the net commissions, all agreed that, in consideration of the third broker abandoning his project to sell the county a different parcel, the commissions should be divided equally among the three. Held, that the second contract superseded the original agreement.

2. BROKERS — 66—DIVIDING COMMISSIONS—CONTRACTS—ABROGATION.

A partnership or combination agreement between brokers to assist in selling land and divide the commissions held abandoned.

3. PARTNERSHIP — 262 — AGREEMENTS — ABANDONMENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 2, a partnership may be dissolved by the express will of the partners.

4. BROKERS — 66—DIVIDING COMMISSIONS—ABANDONMENT OF AGREEMENT.

Where brokers who had agreed to combine in an attempt to sell land and to divide the commissions abandoned their agreement, it was not a breach of faith for defendants, who were parties to the contract, to effect a sale without informing one of their associates, where the abandonment was made in good faith, and nothing was concealed from any of the parties.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by George N. Black and Julius R. Black, copartners doing business as Black Bros., against Cal F. Hunter and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Denis & Loewenthal and E. E. Mellette, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiffs sued to recover a portion of a fee received by the defendants for negotiating the sale of certain real estate situated in the city of Los Angeles. Defendants answered, denying liability. A trial was had upon the issues joined, and judgment was given in favor of defendants. From this judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

The court found that on the 26th day of January, 1909, the plaintiff copartnership and the defendant Cal F. Hunter entered into a contract which was in the following words and figures:

"This agreement by and between Cal F. Hunter and Black Bros., both of the city of Los Angeles, recites that, whereas said parties have combined to effect the sale for Frank P. Flint, G. Rupert Johnson, and Adloff & Hauerwass, respectively, of the properties in said city known as lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, and 9, respectively of the D. G. Stephens tract, and have secured or are securing for that purpose from the said owners of said properties certain contracts appointing said Cal F. Hunter as sole and exclusive agent for the sale of said properties, it is hereby agreed by and between said parties that whatever commission shall be received by said Hunter for effecting the sale of any or all of said lots shall be divided by said Hunter and said Black Bros. share and share alike, after deducting any necessary expenses accrued in effecting said sale.

"Dated at Los Angeles, California, this 26th day of January, 1909.

"Cal F. Hunter.
"Black Bros."

It was further found that at the time of the execution of this contract Hunter and Black Bros. were engaged in securing certain exclusive options or agencies for the property described in the agreement from the owners of said land, and that none of said owners contemplated a sale to any other than the county of Los Angeles; that prior to May 12, 1909, Hunter and Black Bros. obtained from the owners of the said property certain agencies and authorities empowering the said Cal F. Hunter to offer the entire tract, which was made up of the holdings of several different owners, to the county of Los Angeles; and that Hunter did make such offer to the county, but that the said county of Los Angeles did not accept it. The court further found that all of the written authorizations empowering Hunter or Black Bros. to sell the properties to the county contained conditions limiting the agencies to definite periods of time, in no case extending beyond the 10th day of June, 1909. There was a further finding that on May 12, 1909, Black Bros., Cal F. Hunter, and R. A. Rowan & Co. entered into the following agreement:

"May 12, 1909.

"This memorandum is to witness:

"That whereas Cal F. Hunter holds certain sole agencies for the sale of the following real property, situate in the city of and county of Los Angeles, state of California, described as follows: Lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, and 9, D. G. Stevens tract; and

"Whereas, Geo. N. Black obtained for said Hunter the sole agency for a part of the above-described property; and

"Whereas, said Cal F. Hunter and Geo. N. Black have entered into an agreement to divide the net commissions received after deducting all expenses from the sale of the above described property; and

"Whereas, Cal F. Hunter has offered to sell to the county of Los Angeles the property hereinabove described, for the sum of $220,000; and

"Whereas, R. A. Rowan & Co. have submitted and offered to the county of Los Angeles the following described property: Lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 in block A of the Ft. Hill tract, in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, for the sum of $341,500:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the said R. A. Rowan & Co. dropping their proposition above mentioned, and getting back of and assisting the said Hunter and Black to sell the property first above mentioned, to the county of Los Angeles, as submitted by said Hunter, it is mutually agreed between the said Hunter, Black, and Rowan that the net commissions so received from the sale of the property offered by said Hunter, shall be divided as follows: To the said Rowan, one-third of the net commission; to the said Black, one-third of the net commission; and to the said Hunter, one-third of the net commission.

"The said Hunter, holding said agencies for the sale of the property first above described, is hereby authorized to collect all of the said commissions, when said sale has been completed, and shall divide the same immediately upon the receipt of the same, after deducting such expenses as are incurred in making said sale.

"Cal F. Hunter,

"Geo. N. Black,

"R. A. Rowan & Co.

"By J. Hellonbar."

The consideration for this contract was found by the court to be the securing of the services of R. A. Rowan & Co. in carrying out the sale, the revocation of the contract theretofore made by Black Bros. and Hunter, and that the second contract was entered into as a substitute for the one between plaintiffs and Hunter. It was further found that, in spite of the efforts of the contracting parties, the sale to the county was not made under their agreement; that the county refused to purchase the land; that the agencies from the owners expired, and that they refused to renew said authorizations; that on or about September 28, 1909, the parties to the contract of May 12, 1909, with full knowledge of all of the facts and circumstances, agreed to abandon, and did abandon, that contract. The court found that in January, 1911, the owners of the property mentioned in the complaint and the owners of other adjoining land employed Cal F. Hunter and R. A. Rowan to sell the whole parcel to the county; that in April, 1911, they succeeded in making a sale; and that their commission amounted to $5,200, to no part of which plaintiffs were entitled, because the said sale was not made pursuant to any contract to which they were parties.

The position of appellants, in brief, is this: The first contract was one of copartnership; the second was not a substitute for it, but merely took Rowan & Co. into the transaction as an agent of the copartnership; and therefore the cancellation of the second contract (and appellants admit that it is no longer in existence) did not abrogate the original agreement of copartnership. Appellants also insist that Rowan (who was the efficient representative of his corporation, having full knowledge of the relations existing between Black Bros. and Hunter) was bound not to take advantage of the knowledge gained as their agent or employé in making a new contract detrimental to the interests of Black Bros., citing in this behalf Gower v. Andrew, 59 Cal. 119, 43 Am. Rep. 242.

for us to determine relates to the attack made by appellant upon the finding that the contract of May 12, 1909, was a substitute for that of January 26th of the same year. All of the parties to these contracts were men engaged in the business of buying and selling real estate. The evidence shows that G. Rupert Johnson, who owned some land near the corner of Temple and New High streets, in the city of Los Angeles, made some attempt to sell the property to the county of Los Angeles as the site for a hall of records. Being unsuccessful, he sought the professional services of Mr. George Black, one of the plaintiffs. After some investigation and effort, Mr. Black decided that the proper way to dispose of the property was to sell it to the county with two adjoining parcels owned, respectively, by Adloff & Hauerwass and by the State Loan & Investment Company, a corporation controlled by Senator Flint. Mr. Black broached to Senator Flint the matter of combining the properties for sale, and met with encouragement, but, on application to Adloff & Hauerwass, he learned that Mr. Cal F. Hunter had general charge of their properties. Mr. Black then talked to Mr. Hunter, submitted his plan, suggested that they work together, and the negotiations between them resulted in the contract of January 26, 1909, which we have quoted. Appellants insist that, since this contract was not, by its terms, limited to any particular period of time, it could only be abrogated by the solemn dissolution of the copartnership. Part of the consideration, they say, was Mr. Black's "idea" for the consolidation and sale of the properties. This was part of the capital, they affirm, and for such investment, as well as for Mr. Black's efforts to accomplish the sale, he acquired an interest in the adventure of which he has never been lawfully deprived. The contract itself does not reveal anything with reference to the authorship of the scheme of sale. It merely recites that the signers have combined to effect such sale, that they have secured or are securing certain authorizations looking to such desired consummation, and that such commissions as might be received for a sale of the premises would be equally divided between the parties. This copartnership, if we may so name it, was to have for its capital, so far as the terms of the agreement reveal its scope, the joint efforts of the copartners and the agencies from the owners.

Mr. Black and Mr. Hunter made an offer of the property to the supervisors, but they then learned that R. A. Rowan & Co. were agents for a rival tract. After consultation the Blacks and Mr. Hunter concluded that it would be good policy to take Mr. Rowan into the compact, and negotiations were opened with that end in view, culminating in the agreement of May 12, 1909. An examination of that agreement fully justifies the court's finding that it entirely superseded the contract between Hunter and the Blacks. It recites the fact that Mr. Black has obtained for Hunter the sole agency for a part of the property; that Hunter and Black have agreed to divide the commissions from the sale of the property; that Hunter has made a definite offer of the property at a certain figure to the county; that Rowan & Co. have submitted certain other property for sale to the county; and then names the consideration moving from Rowan & Co.—namely, the abandonment of the rival offer and the assisting of Hunter and Black in making the sale of the property “as submitted by said Hunter” to the county of Los Angeles. On their part Hunter and Black concede a part of their prospective commissions to Rowan & Co. This plainly shows the intent that the latter should be in lieu of the earlier contract. Black and Hunter took the Rowans into their venture on an equal footing to consummate that particular sale under the very options or authorizations that were being sought when the original agreement was made in January. By the terms of both contracts, reasonably construed, the copartnerships, or combined efforts, or whatever we may call the arrangements, were to be circumscribed by the authorizations then made or to be made, not to others which might be given under a different employment in the future. We conclude, therefore, that the second of these contracts was a complete substitute for the first.

[2, 3] Without reviewing it in detail, we may say that there was evidence justifying the court in the finding that the options or agencies from the owners of the property expired, but, even if this were not shown, there was abundant and uncontradicted evidence that the tripartite contract was wholly abandoned. It is not in dispute between Rowan, Hunter, and George Black that they met in the fall of 1909 and agreed to terminate the relationship evidenced by the contract of May 12th. They differ only regarding the method adopted. Mr. Black testified that they destroyed the written agreements themselves. (The contract had been drawn in triplicate.) The others denied this physical destruction, but agreed that nothing further was done looking to the sale of the properties until January, 1911, when the new contracts of agency were secured. Both Rowan and Hunter agreed that it was well understood between the three that the deal for which they had become associated had failed. The testimony of all of the participants justified the court in holding that the transaction was abandoned by common consent about September, 1909. Styling the relationship as one of partnership, as plaintiffs insist that it was, it could be, and was, dissolved by the expressed will of the partners. Section 2450, subd. 2, Civ. Code.

[4] There was no claim on behalf of plaintiffs that the defendants were guilty of fraud in the transactions of September, 1909. All of the parties knew that the supervisors of the county had refused to consider the purchase of the land at that time. The agreement to abandon the enterprise was made, therefore, in full view of all of the circumstances, and none of the parties to the original contract or to the one substituted for it was bound to consult or consider his former associates in making future business arrangements. When the contracting parties had agreed to dissolve their relations the obligation to confide the private affairs of one to another had ceased to exist. For this reason the cases cited by appellants in support of the contention that defendants owed the highest good faith to plaintiffs, are not in point. For example, King v. Wise, 43 Cal. 633, involved the misconduct of a person who, having been commissioned by his associates to acquire property, fraudulently took a profit from their funds. Humburg v. Lotz, 4 Cal. App. 438, 88 Pac. 510, was an action between persons who were admittedly partners, one of whom had made a secret gain from the funds of his associates. Berry v. Colborn, 65 W. Va. 493, 64 S. E. 636, 17 Ann. Cas. 1018, is based upon entirely different facts. That decision held that the person who consummated the sale and received the commission had assented to a cancellation of written authority to sell, hoping thereby to eliminate his associates. Then, under a verbal authority to dispose of the property, he immediately proceeded on his own account to carry through the transaction. In the case at bar there had been an abandonment of the enterprise for many months, and there was no showing of bad faith in such abandonment. There is nothing to prevent a party to an abrogated agreement which has been abandoned in good faith from negotiating independently for the property contemplated by the original contract. Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 602, 84 Pac. 171.

BOND v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 7224.)

APPEAL AND ERROR — 1217 — REMAND — STAY OF EXECUTION — JURISDICTION.

Where the court, on appeal from an order striking from the files a notice of intention to move for new trial, reverses the order and thereby remands the case to the superior court, an application for a writ of supersedeas to stay enforcement of the judgment cannot be made to the Supreme Court, but any relief must be sought in the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4717, 4718; Dec. Dig. ☞ 1217.]

In Bank. Action by Annie Bond against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Application for a writ of supersedeas prayed to be directed against the superior court. Dismissed.

See, also, 146 Pac. 688.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of supersedeas to stay the enforcement of a judgment against the defendant pending the determination of an appeal from an order striking from the files defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial. When this application was made, the judgment itself had become final. Bond v. United Railroads (App.) 140 Pac. 982. In the meanwhile, the then pending appeal has been disposed of; this court having, on February 11, 1915, reversed the order striking out defendant's notice of intention. Bond v. United Railroads, 146 Pac. 688. No appeal in the case is therefore now pending in this court, and there remains no power to grant a supersedeas. The writ is asked as one "necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction" (Const. art. 6, § 4), and that jurisdiction has been completely exercised. The reversal of the order last under review remands the proceeding for a new trial to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and any steps looking to a stay of execution on the judgment must now be sought in that court.

The proceeding is dismissed.

OVERAA v. KEENEY. (L. A. 3444.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ☞ 962—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—DISMISSAL—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

Where the complaint in an action for personal injuries was filed 11 days before the running of limitations, and summons was taken out almost a year later, or about 3 weeks before running of limitations, and the summons was served when all but 7 months of the time for service had expired, there was no such abuse of discretion as would warrant interference on appeal in dismissing the action for want of prosecution, though plaintiff, in opposition to the motion to dismiss, presented an affidavit giving, as his reason for failing to prosecute, his crippled condition, due to the injuries received as alleged in the complaint, and his consequent inability to earn money to enable him to proceed with the litigation.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Robert M. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Ole Overaa against Seth A.

Keeney. From a judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal of the action based upon his failure to proceed therein and want of prosecution thereof.

The action was one brought to recover damages for personal injuries which plaintiff alleged that he had received while in the employ of the defendant and acting under his orders. The date of the accident as pleaded was January 21, 1909. The complaint was filed January 10, 1910, 11 days before the expiration of the period of limitation prescribed by subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Summons was taken out December 30, 1910, almost a year later, or about 3 weeks before the end of the period limited by section 406 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Summons was served on June 19, 1912, when all but 7 months of the time within which it would have been possible, under the law, to serve said summons, had expired. On the following day, and without answering, defendant moved the court for an order and judgment of dismissal, accompanying his notice of motion with an affidavit showing the great delay, the fact that he had been present in Santa Barbara county practically all of the time following the filing of the complaint, the circumstances that during that time he had frequently met plaintiff and his counsel, and the additional fact that one of defendant's important witnesses, without whom he could not safely go to trial, had departed from the United States and was residing in a foreign country. At the hearing of the motion plaintiff introduced an affidavit giving, at his reason for failing to prosecute the action with greater diligence, his crippled condition, due to the injuries received in the manner alleged in the complaint, and his consequent inability to earn enough money to enable him to proceed with the litigation. After a hearing upon the issues thus presented, the court granted the motion and entered the judgment of dismissal.

Appellant insists that the court was without discretion to dismiss the case, citing as authority which he believes to be conclusive Johnston v. Baker, 167 Cal. 261, 139 Pac. 86. It will be noticed that the decision of the District Court of Appeal in that case, affirmed by this court, was based upon the authority of Romero v. Snyder, in the same volume of the California Reports, the opinion beginning on page 217 of 167 Cal., on page 1003 of 138 Pac., and on the authority of the latter case we feel constrained to hold that the court did have jurisdiction to dismiss the case for want of prosecution. Both cases related to dismissals after the filing of answers, and involved the construction of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure. It was held in each case that, by permitting the court, "in its discretion," to dismiss any action when plaintiff has failed for 2 years after answer filed to bring such action to trial, but making it mandatory upon the court to dismiss such cause after 5 years, the Legislature by section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, intended to deprive the court of all discretion to dismiss such an action before the expiration of 2 years from the filing of the answer. But Mr. Justice Shaw, the author of the opinion in Romero v. Snyder, was careful to limit the application of the rule to the case before him—one in which an answer had been filed. In the course of the opinion, among other things, he said:

"We think the language of section 583 supports the theory of the plaintiff that in cases where an answer has been filed the court should not dismiss the action for want of prosecution unless the plaintiff has delayed for two years thereafter to bring the action on to trial." (The italics are in the original opinion.)

Discussing the cited decisions regarding the discretion of the trial court, he used the following language:

"It is true that in several of the decisions above cited it is held that the provision of subdivision 7 of section 681, now separately sectionized as 681a, to the effect that an action must be dismissed if the summons is not issued, served, and a return made thereon within three years after its commencement, does not divest the court of discretionary power to dismiss an action for failure to serve the summons or to prosecute the action diligently, although the time is less than three years after the action is begun. Witter v. Phelps, 163 Cal. 655, 126 Pac. 593; People v. Jeffers, 126 Cal. 296, 58 Pac. 704; San Jose, etc., W. Co. v. Allen, 129 Cal. 250, 61 Pac. 1083; Marks v. Keenan, 148 Cal. 161, 82 Pac. 772; Stanley v. Gillen, 119 Cal. 178, 51 Pac. 183; Kreiss v. Hotaling, 99 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 1125. These decisions declare that the provision in question merely fixes a limit beyond which the court's discretion ceases and a dismissal becomes mandatory upon motion of the opposite party, and, further, that it gives the court the additional power to dismiss an action in such a case of its own motion. No minimum time is specified in that section, or anything to indicate that a period of delay less than that which makes a dismissal mandatory would be sufficient, if the court, in its sound discretion, thinks otherwise. There is no apparent purpose therein to regulate the exercise of the court's power, except to make it imperative that in the specified contingency the action shall be dismissed. Short of the mandatory period, the court's power to dismiss was left unaffected. Those decisions are inapplicable to the language of section 583. [In the printed decision from which the above language is quoted sections 681 and 681a are erroneously cited for 581 and 581a.] * * *

"The other defendants had not filed an answer. Section 583 applies only to the particular instance of delay in bringing the case to trial after answer filed. The court, as we have seen, has general discretionary power, without the aid of legislation, to dismiss an action for want of prosecution. This power remains in full force, affected only by the implied legislative determination of section 583 that two years' delay is not unreasonable in cases where an answer has been filed. Where an answer has not been filed, the court's power remains, as it was before, limited only by a sound discretion. There is no force in the argument of plaintiff that for the purposes of this section a demurrer is deemed to have the same effect as an answer. We must suppose that the Legislature meant exactly what the words express. The remaining question for consideration, therefore, is whether or not the court abused its discretion in making the order dismissing the case as to the defendants Snyder and Leonardt. We do not think it can be said that there was an abuse of discretion."

This is conclusive of the whole matter, unless we can say that the facts disclosed by the record in the case now before us show an abuse of discretion by the court. We cannot say that, under all of the circumstances disclosed, there was such abuse. While the allegations in the affidavit of plaintiff must have appealed powerfully to the sympathies of the judge, who, of course, would be affected by the maimed condition of a fellow creature, nevertheless the court was bound to consider the fact that both parties lived in the same county and the further circumstances of their frequent meetings. But trivial cost would have attended the service of summons. If after such service and an answer by defendant the plaintiff's poverty and physical disability should have stood in the way of an early hearing, the court doubtless would have considered those matters in the event of application for postponement of the trial. But we cannot say that, because the court refused to act upon plaintiff's excuse for failure to serve summons, there was an abuse of discretion.

Dan V. Noland, of El Centro, for appellant. Frank Birkhauser, of Calexia, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Respondent brought this action to recover for services performed under a written contract alleged to have been executed by defendant. He had judgment in the lower court, from which this appeal has been prosecuted by the defendant. In addition to the usual papers constituting the judgment roll, there is printed what purports to be a statement of the case presenting the evidence heard at the trial. It does not appear that this statement was ever settled by the trial judge; nor is there any stipulation attached thereto by reason of which this court would be authorized to take notice of the contents of that statement. It would seem from a note printed on the concluding page of the transcript that the motion for settlement of the statement was by the trial court denied. There is, therefore, nothing presented from which a review of the evidence can be made. Examining the judgment roll, we find no error which will warrant a reversal being ordered. The findings of the court seem to support the judgment, and to have been within the issues made by the pleadings.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROBERTSON. (Cr. 364.)

LARCENY —55—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where prosecutrix paid money to accused relying on his representation that it was necessary for her to pay the money, which should be paid over to third persons to induce them not to prosecute prosecutrix and accused, and accused admitted receiving the money, and denied that he received it as a loan, but converted it to his own use, the jury could find accused guilty of larceny of the money on the theory that title did not pass to accused, though prosecutrix in referring to the transaction referred to it as a loan.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge presiding.

W. L. A. Robertson was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Chauncey Gardner, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe and Robert M. Clarke, Deputies Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment entered pursuant to a verdict finding him guilty of the crime of grand larceny, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

According to the evidence, the defendant obtained from the prosecuting witness, Minnie Benner, the sum of $100 upon a representation made to her by the defendant that the money was to be paid over by him to black-mailers who, he told her, were threatening a criminal prosecution against the defendant and said prosecuting witness. The evidence tended to show, and the jury evidently believed, that there were no such persons threatening any prosecution and that the representations were falsely made by the defendant in order to impress fear upon the mind of Miss Benner and thereby induce her to give up possession of the money.

Although some assignments of misconduct on the part of the trial judge are contained in appellant's brief, it appears that no objections were made at the trial to the language used by the court, except in one instance. At that time the judge disavowed any intention to make any comment upon the testimony of the defendant, and instructed the jury that he was not to be understood as having made any suggestion, comment, or intimation whatsoever as to the truth or falsity of the testimony. Thereupon defendant's counsel expressed himself as satisfied. We also are satisfied that the defendant suffered no prejudice by the conduct complained of.

At the oral argument the defendant's counsel admitted that the only point that is really worthy of the serious consideration of this court is based upon defendant's contention that the money was paid over to him by the prosecuting witness as a loan whereby the relation of debtor and creditor was established, that the title to the money passed to the defendant, and that therefore there could be no larceny. Our examination of the record convinces us that there is no other question requiring our attention. There is ample evidence to sustain the jury's implied finding that the transaction was not a loan and that the prosecuting witness parted merely with the possession of her money and that the title did not pass. Although Miss Benner referred to the transaction as a loan, her testimony further shows clearly that she gave the money to the defendant under the influence of said representations, in order to prevent the making of public charges by the supposed detectives, and for the specific purpose of having it given to the detectives in order to keep herself and the defendant from being arrested. The defendant himself admitted receiving the money and denied that he received it as a loan. His testimony is that not one single word was said about a loan, and that "all she said was to give it to those men to keep their mouths quiet." Having so testified, the defendant is in the poorest possible position to contend now that the evidence necessarily proved the transaction to be in the nature of a loan.

The case is clearly within the principle of such decisions as People v. Rial, 23 Cal. App. 713, 139 Pac. 661, People v. Schenone, 19 Cal. App. 280, 125 Pac. 758, and People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729. By means of persistent misrepresentations the defendant took advantage of the ignorance and fears of the prosecuting witness and thereby secured possession of her money with the fraudulent intent of appropriating it to his own use. She consented to the change in its possession for a certain purpose that was never consummated and was never intended by the defendant to be consummated. Under these circumstances, it must be held that the jury was justified in finding that the title did not pass and that the defendant was guilty of the crime of grand larceny.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Geo. L. Jones, Judge.

Roger Clapp was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. McGlashan, of Truckee, and L. P. La Rue, of Grass Valley, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, J. Defendant was charged with the murder of Albert A. Taylor, committed in the town of Truckee, on June 9, 1914. He was convicted of manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment at San Quentin for the term of seven years. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant was an engineer in charge of a switch engine at the railroad yard of the Southern Pacific Company at Truckee. Deceased was yardmaster at the same place, and both were in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company.

[1] 1. The evidence was that defendant was a roomer at deceased's house, and that, prior to the day of the homicide, their relations had been friendly. They had some disagreement arising out of the switching of cars on the morning of June 9th, which culminated in an altercation on defendant's engine, deceased having gone aboard the engine in anger, where a somewhat violent quarrel ensued, deceased apparently the aggressor. He left the engine, however, and the parties did not come to blows. This was about 7 o'clock in the morning. Later, about 9 o'clock, a controversy arose between them which grew out of a collision of cars caused by defendant backing his engine too rapidly. He claimed that he was obeying the signals of the yardmaster, and the latter claimed that defendant was violating them. High and angry words and irritating epithets passed between them, and deceased jumped into the cab of the engine, going towards defendant in a threatening manner, but, before he reached defendant, the latter shot deceased, the bullet entering the head just below the left eye, passing through the brain—a mortal wound, from the effect of which he fell back out of the cab to the ground. Three separate wounds were disclosed by the autopsy.

Witness Thorp testified that he was standing near the lower end of the engine tender, and saw and heard what took place; that, from where he stood, his view of defendant was obstructed by the framework of the cab after deceased entered it, but he saw deceased get onto the engine, and heard the shot immediately after he had entered the cab. He testified:

"I was standing right here, and I heard the crack of the gun, and he fell out backwards. Q. As I understand you, the moment that he passed out of your view, you heard the shot of the gun, and he fell out? A. Yes. Q. Then what occurred? A. There was three or four shots fired into the body; that is, at the body as it lay on the ground. Q. Where were those shots fired from? A. Right from the engineer's cab window. Q. From the side window? A. Yes, sir; out this way and down towards the body on the ground. Q. Did you see any shots fired? A. I could see the gun in the man's hand, yes, sir, and the fire from the gun—the smoke. Q. The first shot, did you see that? A. No, sir; I didn't see that; that was shot around the cab. Q. What about the other shots? A. The other shots were fired out of the cab and from the outside, and I could see the gun then. Q. Could you tell who did the shooting? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who was it? A. Mr. Clapp, the engineer."

There was testimony that deceased had gloves or mitts on his hands at the time, and, so far as appears, he was not armed. There was evidence that deceased had been in some trouble with the men at other yards of the company, and defendant had been told of it, and cautioned "to look out for him," that he was "a dangerous man," and defendant testified that he believed his life was in danger when deceased came towards him, and that he shot him to save his own life. Defendant admitted that he fired three times, but testified that none of the shots was fired after deceased fell from the cab. The evidence on this point was conflicting, and an effort was made to discredit Thorp's account of the tragedy. The jury, by their verdict, acquitted defendant of murder, but they found from the evidence that he was not justified in killing deceased. Indeed, whether the killing was justified was the vital question for their consideration.

[2] The office of a reviewing court in a case such as this is very clearly stated in People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 563, 62 Pac. 1069:

"The principal ground of the appeal is that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence, and upon this point counsel contend that all the evidence—that introduced by the prosecution no less than the evidence of the defendant himself—shows clearly and without conflict that the killing (which is admitted) was done in necessary self-defense, or at least under circumstances which negative the existence of any deliberate purpose on the part of the defendant to take the life of the person slain. Necessarily, this contention as to the absence of any conflict in the evidence must be made good in order to sustain the appeal upon the ground stated; for, if the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact, upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive."

As was said in People v. Rongo (Sup.) 145 Pac. 1017:

"Undoubtedly the defendant's own story exculpates him, but it was for the jury to say whether or not that story should be believed."

See, also, People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 79, 122 Pac. 435. There was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict.

[3] 2. A photograph was taken of the scene of the homicide showing the engine and tender and the body of a person posed in the position which there was evidence tending to show was the position of deceased after he fell to the ground. This photograph was admitted as a diagram for the purpose of illustration only, and not as evidence of what, in fact, occurred. The following cases are authority for the use of the photograph for the purposes as limited by the court: People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 564, 56 Pac. 424; People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 133, 57 Pac. 785; People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 203, 82 Pac. 779; People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 161, 66 Pac. 202; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 598, 91 Pac. 515.

[4] 3. The court gave the following instruction:

"Although the jury may believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant without justifiable cause or excuse, as explained in these instructions, killed the deceased, still, if you entertain a reasonable doubt whether the killing was willful, deliberate and premeditated, or whether the fatal wounding was done with deliberate intent upon the part of the defendant, then you should find him guilty of murder in the second degree."

This instruction was one of a series defining the degrees of murder and distinguishing manslaughter from murder. Inasmuch, however, as the jury found defendant guilty of manslaughter, he could not have been prejudiced by any error, if error there was, in the instruction complained of. People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 364, 368, 92 Pac. 853.

[5] 4. In the course of the trial defendant offered in evidence a rule of the railroad company reading as follows:

"No person will be permitted to ride on an engine, or in baggage, mail, or express cars (except employees in discharge of their duties)."

Upon objection the court refused to admit the evidence as immaterial and irrelevant. Defendant contends that deceased was charged with knowledge of this rule, and that going aboard of the engine in violation of it had a tendency to show that he intended to attack defendant. The rule would seem to apply particularly to persons other than employees, and, while it may also apply to the latter, unless their duties require them to board an engine or baggage or mail car, we cannot see that it was relevant or that defendant was prejudiced in being deprived of this evidence. Deceased did not enter the cab of the engine under any claim of right to do so, and the evidence was undisputed that in going aboard the engine it was not in the discharge of his duty, but was to continue the quarrel that had begun between the two while deceased was standing on the ground. The existence of the rule or its violation, or the relative rights of the two men to be on the engine under it, could not by any possibility, it seems to us, have had any tendency to show the intent which impelled deceased to board the cab. People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 618, 44 Pac. 314.

[6] 5. Testimony was offered by the people to show the good character of the deceased for peace and quiet. Objection was sustained, and the evidence excluded. In his address to the jury the district attorney said:

"He [defendant] knew that Taylor was a good man. He knew everything good about Taylor, and when he says he knew Taylor was a dangerous man he is telling you absolutely a thing that is not so. I offered to prove to this court that the reputation of Mr. A. A. Taylor in the town of Truckee was good."

Whereupon the following took place:

"Mr. La Rue (interrupting): Just a minute, Mr. Arbogast. We note an exception to the remark of the district attorney concerning this matter.

"The Court: The jury will not in any way consider the statement just made by the district attorney, and not allow it in any way to enter into their deliberations as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

"Mr. Arbogast: It is the truth, your honor.

"The Court: The evidence was offered and objected to and the objection was sustained, and no further reference should be made to that matter.

"Mr. Arbogast: I am perfectly satisfied on that proposition.

"The Court: No further reference should be made to it by either side. When evidence is refused admission, that forecloses any further reference to the matter, and the jury will not consider that statement whatsoever."

The admonition of the court to the jury not to consider the statement of the district attorney, and "not to allow it in any way to enter into their deliberations," we must presume, was obeyed by the jury, and hence no prejudice came to defendant. People v. Burke, supra; People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 439, 66 Pac. 589, 863.

We discover no prejudicial error in any of the rulings of the court, and none in the instructions given. There was evidence sufficient to justify the verdict of manslaughter.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. CORPORATIONS — 309 — TRANSACTIONS ORDERED BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS — VALIDITY.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by F. Lackenbach against Thomas F. Finn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, for appellant. H. W. Glensor and Donald K. Siebert, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought against the defendant, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, for the alleged wrongful conversion of property by the taking thereof without having paid or offered to pay to the mortgagee the amount due on the mortgage.

The facts in the case are, in substance, as follows: It appears that Minnie Lackenbach, the daughter of the plaintiff, with others as partners, had been conducting the business of the Bellevue Hospital; that she bought out her partners, and later organized a corporation which took over the hospital business. It also appears that she was indebted to her mother, the plaintiff, in the sum of $1,500 for money she had borrowed from plaintiff, and which money had been actually used in conducting said Bellevue Hospital and in buying out the interests of her partners just prior to the formation of the corporation. It further appears that upon the organization of the corporation she transferred to it the furniture and equipment of the hospital; and, the plaintiff having demanded a mortgage upon the furniture and equipment as security for said indebtedness, the chattel mortgage in question was thereupon executed, to wit, on August 15, 1910, and delivered to plaintiff. No money was loaned to the corporation by the plaintiff, but the corporation assumed, it seems, the indebtedness owing from Minnie Lackenbach to plaintiff. The board of directors of the corporation consisted of the plaintiff, her daughter Minnie Lackenbach, and Mrs. R. P. Gabriel. A resolution authorizing the execution of the chattel mortgage was passed by the board, being carried by the votes of plaintiff and Mrs. R. Gabriel, Minnie Lackenbach not voting, having been excused at her own request. More than six months subsequently to the execution of the mortgage and in April, 1911, the defendant herein, acting under executions in the one case and an attachment in another, levied upon the mortgaged property and took possession thereof, but did not pay or tender to plaintiff the amount of the mortgage debt, or deposit the amount, as required by sections 2968 and 2969 of the Civil Code. In May, 1911, three creditors of the corporation filed a petition to have it declared and adjudged a bankrupt, and a writ of injunction was issued out of the United States District Court directed to the defendant herein, restraining him from proceeding to an execution sale of the property here involved pending the hearing and disposition of said petition. The corporation was subsequently adjudged bankrupt, and the property in question was delivered by the defendant to the trustee in bankruptcy. Upon the day of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the board of directors—the plaintiff not voting—passed a resolution ratifying the execution of the chattel mortgage.

[1] As before stated, the board of directors consisted of three members. Two, therefore, constituted a quorum (section 305, Civ. Code). At the meeting authorizing the execution of the chattel mortgage to the plaintiff all the directors were present, but one did not vote. The plaintiff, however, did vote; and, as she was an interested party, defendant contends that both the resolution and chattel mortgage were void ab initio. The authorities in this state do not go to that extent. They hold that a contract between a corporation and one of its directors, by which such director obtains property or some other advantage to himself, is not absolutely void, but is voidable at the instance of the corporation or its stockholders. Graves v. Mining Co., 81 Cal. 303, 22 Pac. 665; Fudickar v. East Riverside I. Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 41, 41 Pac. 1024; Marsters v. Umpqua Valley Oil Co., 49 Or. 374, 90 Pac. 151, 12 R. A. (N. S.) 825; 10 Cyc. 1195. It is thus seen that the rule defendant attempts to invoke is solely for the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders, and is not available to him as a defense. Of course, the defendant here, if regarded as standing in the shoes of creditors of the corporation, might question the validity of the mortgage on the ground of actual fraud; and the cases hold that fraud will be presumed in favor of a creditor of the mortgagor at the time the mortgage was made. But the question of the good faith of the transaction was not an issue in this case; and, if it had been, the findings of the court based on sufficient evidence negative the idea that the chattel mortgage was executed with any intention to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the corporation.

[2] We cannot agree with the defendant that the plaintiff was bound to follow the property into the bankruptcy proceedings for the purpose of proving her claim and minimizing the damages, or for any other purpose. The mortgage being valid, the levy of the writs and the taking possession of the property without having complied with the provisions of sections 2968 and 2969 of the Civil Code constituted a conversion, and vested the plaintiff at once with a right of action for damages as fixed by section 3336, Civil Code, although of course the recovery must be limited to the amount secured by the mortgage. Ritder v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127; Irwin v. McDowell, 91 Cal. 119, 27 Pac. 601.

The defendant persisted in holding the property under the writs mentioned, knowing of the existence of the chattel mortgage and the circumstances under which it was executed. The plaintiff was not required under the law in this state to go to the trouble and incur the expense and suffer the delay of following the property into the federal courts.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

4. ASSIGNMENTS ⇨73—CAUSES OF ACTION FOR FRAUD.

The assignment by W. to plaintiffs was not an assignment of a mere naked right to sue for fraud, but was a transfer of his interest in the lots which defendant agreed to convey; plaintiffs' cause of action arising from the dam-

Under Civ. While the modification of a judgment by deducting therefrom a part of the sum recovered ordinarily carries costs to the appellant, where respondents conceded that the judgment was excessive to the extent that it was reduced, and appellant, by a proper motion in the trial court, could have obtained such modification, neither party should recover the costs of the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by James Conlin and wife against the Emanuel Lewis Investment Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Dudley D. Sales and Harold H. Maundrell, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment, entered upon the verdict of a jury, against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiffs.

It appears from the evidence, and is not disputed by defendant, that the defendant entered into a contract in writing with Joseph Williams, whereby defendant agreed to sell to Williams lots 14 and 15 in block L of the Mission Street Land Company; that Emanuel Lewis, the president of the defendant company, took Williams to the property before the contract was signed, and pointed out to him what he supposed were lots 14 and 15, but which were actually lots 11 and 12. Williams went into possession of these lots, made improvements thereon, and paid a portion of the purchase price. Thereafter he assigned the contract to plaintiffs. Defendant consented to the assignment, and plaintiffs went into possession. Thereafter they paid to the defendant the balance of the purchase price in monthly installments, and received a deed to lots 14 and 15. Subsequently plaintiffs were notified by the Homestead Realty Company that they were in possession of lots 11 and 12 belonging to that company. Plaintiffs then moved their house and improvements to lots 14 and 15, and thus incurred the damages sought to be recovered in this action from the defendant. At no time prior to the date of the notification by the Homestead Realty Company did plaintiffs know or have cause to believe that they were located on the wrong lots. No evidence was offered by the defendant, nor was any motion made for a new trial.

[1, 2] Plaintiff admits that the verdict is excessive in the sum of $165, but it cannot be said, from the mere fact that the verdict is excessive because of the inclusion therein of improper items, that it was the result of passion and prejudice. Adcock v. Ore. R. Co., 45 Or. 173, 77 Pac. 78. Nor can the judgment be reversed merely because it was rendered for an excessive amount where, as here, the party in whose favor the judgment was given consents to a modification thereof. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 122 Cal. 220, 54 Pac. 731. In that case it is held that appellate courts will modify the judgment appealed from whenever it appears from the record, or from the admission of the parties, that their rights can be finally determined thereby.

[3, 4] The action is based on the ground of fraud and misrepresentation by the defendant, and defendant asserts that such an action is a personal one; that it does not run with the land; that it was not transferred to the plaintiffs by the assignment of the defendant's contract with Williams; and that therefore the court committed error in permitting Williams to testify that Emanuel Lewis, the president of the defendant company, on the occasion of the purchase by Williams of the two lots in question, pointed out to him lots 11 and 12 and told him that they were lots 14 and 15, and that he went into possession of the lots designated after contracting in writing to buy them from the defendant. It is not disputed that Williams went into possession of the wrong lots as the result of representations by Lewis; but the plaintiffs' cause of action is not necessarily and exclusively based upon these misrepresentations, for it is clear from the evidence that Lewis must be regarded as having made the same misrepresentations to the plaintiffs just before the assignment of the contract, and continued to make them up to and after the final payment on the contract and the delivery of the deed. These representations are sufficiently relied upon in the complaint. Under these circumstances the admission of Williams' testimony cannot be deemed prejudicial error. Nor was the assignment of the contract by Williams to the plaintiffs an assignment of a mere naked right to bring an action for fraud, but was the transfer of the former's interest in the lots agreed to be conveyed by such contract, and the cause of action for fraud arises from the plaintiffs' damage suffered through their reliance upon the representations made to them by the defendant's president.

[5] The defendant asserts that the evidence shows mistake and not fraud, and contends that the giving of instructions by the court on the subject of fraud was error. "False representations are legally fraudulent if made through ignorance, carelessness, or mistake, and the other party is deceived or misled thereby. Davis v. Driscoll, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 14, 54 S. W. 43. In the Civil Code, section 1572, the rule is declared as follows:

"Actual fraud is * * * (2) The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true."

The instructions complained of embraced the law as thus laid down, and left the question to the jury to decide whether or not the representations and mistake of the defendant, under all the circumstances of the case, constituted fraud. Such instructions were correct.

The testimony of Harold H. Maundrell, admitted over the objection of the defendant and now assigned as error, did not relate to an offer to compromise the matter here involved. When these plaintiffs were sued by the Homestead Realty Company for the possession of lots 11 and 12, Maundrell, acting as the attorney for the Conlins, called on the attorney for the defendant corporation with a view to settling the question of who would defend that action, and while in the office of such attorney some discussion took place, and steps were taken relative to settling the whole matter, but there was no offer made by the defendant here to settle with these plaintiffs.

We are unable to say that the evidence in any respect does not support the verdict of the jury.

The judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $165, and as thus modified is affirmed.

On Modification of Judgment.

[6] This court on the 22d day of January, 1915, ordered the judgment of the trial court in the above-entitled cause modified by deducting from the amount thereof the sum of $165. Under the rule of this court such modification carries costs to the appellant. It appearing, however, that the respondents conceded that the judgment of said trial court was excessive to the extent that it was so reduced, and that the appellant could, by a proper motion in the trial court, have obtained the said modification, we do not think that this is a proper case for the appellant to recover his costs of appeal. The opinion and judgment of this court filed on said 22d day of January, 1915, is therefore modified by adding thereto the words, "neither party to recover the costs of this appeal."

HLADIK v. ALLEN et al. (Civ. 1421.)

1. BROKERS ⇐82—COMMISSIONS—ACTIONS—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in an action by a broker against a broker for a half of commissions paid for procuring an exchange of real estate, which alleged that defendant acted as agent of both principals, making the exchange, with their knowledge, and that it was agreed that plaintiff should have a half of the commissions paid by both principals, states a cause of action, though it does not allege that both principals had any knowledge of the agreement for a division of the commissions.

2. BROKERS ⇐66—COMMISSIONS—AGREEMENT FOR DIVISION—VALIDITY.

Defendant employed as broker by two principals to procure an exchange of their real estate agreed to give plaintiff a half of the commissions. Plaintiff at the inception of the negotiations was an accredited agent of one of the principals, but was never an agent of the other principal, and never informed him of the agreement to divide commissions. Plaintiff's principal was informed of, and consented to, the agreement. Held, that the agreement between the brokers was enforceable, for the transaction did not contravene any rule regulating the duties of an agent to his principal, and both principals contracting to pay commissions to defendant on consummation of the exchange, which was done.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by J. C. Hladik against H. B. Allen and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert W. Harrison and Richard C. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Russell W. Cantrell and Robert H. Borland, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an action founded upon an alleged oral agreement between broker and broker for the recovery of one-half of the commissions paid to one broker by the principals to an exchange of two pieces of real property, which exchange was alleged to have been consummated as the result of the joint efforts of both brokers.

The facts of the case as pleaded and proven upon behalf of the plaintiff are substantially these: The defendants H. B. Allen and L. D. Allen, as copartners under the name of Allen & Co., were engaged in business as real estate brokers. J. H. Bohlrig and E. P. Wingerter were the owners of two parcels of real property, which they were induced to exchange as the result of the joint efforts of the plaintiff and the defendants. At the inception of the negotiations the plaintiff alone was the accredited agent of Bohlrig; but the defendants, although originally the sole agents of Wingerter, eventually, and before the transaction was closed, became with the knowledge and consent of Wingerter, the agents of Bohlig. The exchange was consummated in keeping with the terms and conditions of accepted written offers to exchange which passed between the owners of the property, under which Wingerter, in addition to conveying his property to Bohlig, paid the latter the sum of $3,000. Pending the negotiations for the exchange, it was agreed between the defendants and the plaintiff that, in consideration of the latter's assistance in promoting the exchange, he should receive one-half of the commission which might be paid to Allen & Co. by either or both of the principals. Although the double character of the defendants' agency was known to, and consented to by, both Wingerter and Bohlig, the former was not informed of the agreement to divide the commission. Plaintiff, however, informed his principal, Bohlig, of the agreement to divide the commission, and the latter not only consented thereto, but, at the request of the plaintiff, paid his share of the commission to the defendants. The defendants received as commission from both principals the aggregate sum of $2,250, but refused to pay the plaintiff any part thereof.

Upon these facts the plaintiff prayed for, and recovered, a judgment against the defendants in the sum of $1,125, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

[1] The sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings is not disputed, but it is contended upon behalf of the appellants that the complaint does not state a cause of action in this, that it does not affirmatively allege that the agreement to pool and divide the commissions was entered into with the knowledge and consent of both principals. In support of this contention the appellants invoke the familiar rule of the law of agency which, upon the ground of public policy, precludes a person from acting in the dual capacity of agent for two principals, without their knowledge and consent, in a transaction where their interests would naturally be antagonistic.

The rule relied upon has no application to the facts of the present case. The plaintiff's complaint, in effect, alleges that the defendants acted as the agents of both principals with their knowledge and consent. The dual character of the defendants' agency necessarily implied that they would be entitled to commissions from both principals, and, having knowledge of, and consenting to, the dual character of the defendants' agency, both principals presumably had knowledge of, and consented to, the defendants receiving a double commission.

[2] Passing to the facts of the case as adduced upon the trial, it is insisted upon behalf of the defendants that the evidence shows that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants to divide the commissions was not, in fact, known to Wingerter, and that therefore the agreement was void and unenforceable as being against public policy, notwithstanding the fact that the evidence shows beyond dispute that both principals knowingly consented to the dual character of the defendants' agency. More accurately stated, the defendants' contention in this behalf is that, although their contract with Wingerter was valid and enforceable because of the fact that both principals knew of, and consented to, the double employment of the defendants, nevertheless the agreement to pool and divide the commissions was void because Wingerter was not informed by either the plaintiff or the defendants of the execution and existence of such agreement. The evidence clearly shows that the relation of principal and agent never at any time existed between Wingerter and the plaintiff. This being so, plaintiff was under no obligation to inform Wingerter of the agreement to divide the commissions, and, as the evidence shows that Bohlig, the plaintiff's principal, was fully informed of, and consented to, the agreement to divide the commissions, it cannot be said that the plaintiff's position in the transaction contravened the rule relating to and regulating his duties as an agent. As a matter of course the plaintiff could not control the conduct of the defendants toward their principal, Wingerter, and, not occupying a fiduciary relationship towards Wingerter, it was no concern of the plaintiff whether or not the defendants informed Wingerter of the agreement in question. The duty, if any, in this behalf devolved upon the defendants alone; for, as was said in the case of Dearing v. Sears, 50 Hun, 604, 3 N. Y. Supp. 31:

"There was nothing in the contract which the law condemns, as between the plaintiff and the defendant. As we have seen, the plaintiff violated no obligation or duty towards his principal. He had the right to assume that the defendant was dealing as fairly with the principal, whom he represented, and that he had acquainted him with the proposed division of commissions. If the defendant failed to do this, or otherwise to observe the 'uberrima fides' which the law exacts from an agent towards his principal, he thereby imperiled his claim to compensation for his services, * * * but, after having received such compensation, he could not avail himself of his own wrongdoing as a means of defense against the demand for a part of the money, based upon a contract which was perfectly lawful, so far as the claimant was concerned."

Apart from the foregoing considerations, it is an undisputed fact in the case that the dual character of the defendants' agency was known and consented to by Wingerter, and there is in the record undisputed and convincing evidence that Wingerter knowingly consented to the defendants receiving double commissions. In this connection the record shows two paper writings offered and received in evidence upon behalf of the plaintiff, both of which, over the signatures of Win-gerter and Bohlig, are addressed to and authorize the defendants, as the agents of both Wingerter and Bohlig, to negotiate upon stated terms and conditions the exchange in question, and provided that a specified commission would be paid to the defendants by both Wingerter and Bohlig upon the consummation of the exchange. Under such circumstances the defendants' right to the commissions agreed upon could not have been successfully denied by either Wingerter or Bohlig (Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 518, 137 Pac. 254), and being legally obligated to pay the agreed and earned commissions, it was no concern of the public or of Wingerter and Bohlig what the defendants did or agreed to do with the commissions paid to them.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

A. L. Hunt was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Burns & Watkins, of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from the judgment upon conviction of the defendant of the crime of manslaughter, and from an order denying a new trial.

The first contention of the appellant is that the information is insufficient, and that the general and special demurrer thereto should have been sustained. This contention as presented in the demurrer is twofold: First, that the information is not in the language of the statute; and, second, that it is uncertain in that the defendant was not enabled to know therefrom whether he was being prosecuted for voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, and, if for the latter, whether he was charged with manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death in an unlawful manner, or in the commission of a lawful act without due caution or circumspection. Counsel for the appellant argue quite strenuously and forcibly, both in their opening and closing briefs, in support of this contention, citing cases from other jurisdictions to sustain their view. We think, however, that the ruling of this court is controlled by the case of People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 Pac. 376, wherein the Supreme Court has held an information in substantially the same language and form as that in this case to be sufficient.

[1, 2] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in denying the defendant's challenge to the juror Carl S. Poulsen for actual bias. This contention is involved in the further contention of the appellant that the judge of the court, during the examination of the jurors and the trial of the case, was guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, and that such misconduct consisted in the judge of the court undertaking to question jurors upon voir dire examination as to their qualifications, and also in the questioning of witnesses during the trial respecting certain essential elements and issues in the case. It is the contention of the appellant that the judge of the court by so doing placed himself in the attitude of a prosecutor to such an extent as to indicate to the jury that he was prejudiced against the defendant and that his sympathies were with the prosecution. We have examined the record in this case with great care in the light of these contentions, and in view of both of the constitutional inhibition against the right of courts to charge juries in regard to matters of fact, and of the express language of the Supreme Court in the early case of People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 147, followed in later cases, and especially commented upon and approved by this court in the recent case of People v. Conboy, 15 Cal. App. 97, 113 Pac. 703, wherein judges of trial courts have been repeatedly cautioned against the assumption of any attitude towards the parties or the evidence in the case which might tend to indicate to the minds of susceptible jurors the leaning of the judge in favor of or against either side. Upon such examination of this record we are unable to say that the judge who tried this case transgressed the proper limits of judicial discretion in essaying to put to the above-named juror certain questions touching upon his qualifications, and which resulted in what we hold to be a proper denial of the defendant's challenge of said juror for bias. Neither are we able to say that the judge overstepped the proper bounds of his judicial province in essaying on his own account to pursue the examination of certain witnesses in the cause beyond the distance gone upon their direct and cross-examination, with a view to elucidating certain facts touched upon but not fully brought out by questions of the respective counsel. Our attention has been called to no single question asked by the judge of the court either of a juror or of a witness, which was properly subject to any objection other than the objection that it was being asked by the judge instead of by counsel. In addition to this the record shows that at once upon the defendant's counsel making their first objection to the court's action, the judge directly and emphatically disclaimed any leaning upon his part in favor of or against either side, and instructed the jury that they were not to consider the questions put by him as indicating in any degree the interest or attitude of the judge of the court; and the court further, in its charge to the jury, again instructed them to the same effect. Presumably the jury regarded these instructions; and, this being the state of the record, we are constrained to hold that the action of the court in the foregoing respects was without prejudicial error to the defendant.

[3] With respect to the other alleged errors of the court during the examination of jurors, we think the contention of the appellant to be without merit. We are also of the opinion that the objections to the defendant to the rulings of the court upon questions put to Drs. Couey, Hopkins, and Maupin cannot be sustained. As to the action of the court in refusing to admit in evidence the diplomas of the defendant as a graduate of several colleges, and especially of the Los Angeles College of Osteopathy, we think there was no substantial error, especially since it had already affirmatively appeared in evidence that the defendant was a duly licensed osteopathic physician.

The next and most serious contention of the appellant is that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give certain other instructions requested on behalf of the defendant. In order to determine the issues raised by these contentions it is necessary to briefly review the facts of the case.

The defendant was charged with manslaughter in having caused the death of a married woman named Florence Saier. The evidence showed that the deceased, who, before her marriage bore the name of Florence Williams, was of the age of about 21 years, and that she had been residing for several months prior to her death in Merced county, where she had become acquainted with one Peter Saier, with whom on several occasions she went riding on a motorcycle. On one of these trips she was thrown from the machine and severely injured; and, after being confined to her bed in Merced for a period of about 10 days under the care of a physician and nurse, it was discovered that she was advanced in pregnancy about five months, and that Peter Saier was the cause of this condition. An immediate marriage with Saier was arranged for and consummated, whereupon the woman was removed to the home of her sister, Mrs. Leona Brown, in Fresno, where she remained for several days in a sick and suffering condition, complaining of pains in her back, stomach, abdomen, and sides, and during a portion of which time she had a considerable flow of blood from the vagina. This condition continuing for several days, and, apparently increasing, her sister, Mrs. Brown, became alarmed, and called in the defendant, who was then engaged in practicing as an osteopathic physician in Fresno. When the defendant came to see the deceased he was informed of her condition, and of the facts of her fall from the motorcycle and subsequent suffering. He gave her a hypodermic injection to quiet her, and then declared to Mrs. Brown that he was not the doctor for the case, but that a surgeon should be called in. There is evidence tending to show that an effort was made to secure the attendance of one or more regular physicians, but without result, probably owing to the fact that it was nighttime. Finally, and in view of Mrs. Brown's increasing alarm and insistence that he remain, the defendant said that he would do what he could to help the suffering woman. He then went away, returning in about half an hour with a valise; and, after requesting Mrs. Brown to furnish hot water and towels, was alone with the deceased for another half hour, at the end of which time he reappeared, stating to Mrs. Brown that he could do nothing for her sister, and that she must have a surgeon and be taken to some place where she would receive proper attention. He then went out in search of other doctors, and finally procured Dr. Couey to come to the apartments where the deceased was at about 2 o'clock in the morning. Upon his arrival Dr. Couey had the woman at once taken to a hospital, where she was examined by Drs. Couey and Maupin. They found her suffering from internal injuries which could only be reached by abdominal incision, which being made, exposed the fact that a shockingly unskillful operation had been attempted for the manifest purpose of procuring an abortion, but in the course of which vital organs had been so severed and injured that it was not likely that the patient could survive. She in fact died within the next two days from the effects of the operation which the defendant had attempted to perform.

[4] The foregoing facts were elicited upon the trial. The defendant did not take the witness stand, nor was there any evidence offered on his behalf, or otherwise, tending in any degree to show that the operation was performed with due or any caution or circumspection.

In its charge to the jury the court gave the following four instructions of which the appellant complains:

"(1) It is unlawful for any person, not a regularly licensed physician or surgeon, to operate upon or in any manner sever or penetrate any of the tissues of human beings, except the severing of the umbilical cord.

"(2) If you find from the evidence beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant, A. L. Hunt, did, at the time and place set out in the information, perform, or attempt to perform, an operation upon the person of Florence Saier for the purpose of delivering an unborn child, but that the operation or attempted operation was performed without due caution and circumspection, or, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the delivering of such unborn child was not necessary to save the life of Florence Saier, and you should also find and believe beyond a reasonable doubt that death resulted to said Florence Saier as the result of such operation so performed, then you should find the defendant guilty as charged.

"(3) You are further instructed that the proofs in this case show that the defendant, A. L. Hunt, is a fully licensed osteopathic practitioner, but is not licensed to administer drugs or practice major surgery. And, if you find from the evidence that he did, in an attempt to deliver an unborn child from the body of Florence Saier during her lifetime, and for that purpose performed or undertook to perform a major surgical operation for the purpose of so delivering said child, and if you further find that death resulted to said Florence Saier as the result of said operation, then it is your duty to find the defendant guilty as charged in the information.

"(4) If you should find from the evidence in this case to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, A. L. Hunt, did, on or about the 6th day of April, 1914, in the county of Fresno, state of California, knowingly and intentionally perform or attempt to perform an operation upon Florence Saier while she was pregnant, for the purpose of causing her a miscarriage, when such operation was not necessary to save her life, and that by reason of such operation, said Florence Saier died, it is your duty to find the defendant guilty as charged. You are also instructed, gentlemen, that, if it be true that Florence Saier was pregnant, and from some previous injury or cause was about to have a miscarriage, and the defendant as a physician was called upon to attend, and did attend, said Florence Saier, and undertook to aid her and assist her in her impending miscarriage, and while engaged in the performance of such service performed the same with such want of due caution and circumspection that said Florence Saier died, the defendant would be guilty as charged, provided he acted with gross ignorance of his art or with gross inattention to his patient's safety, or with such neglect or lack of care for her safety and welfare as shows upon his part an indifference as to whether she recovered at all."

It is conceded by the respondent that the first of these instructions is erroneous as embracing a legal proposition entirely too broad for the facts of this case; but the respondent contends that the instructions of the court should be considered as a whole, and when so considered the first of the foregoing instructions becomes innocuous; and, further, that the instructions as a whole fairly set forth the several theories of the case upon any one of which the prosecution was entitled to rely for a conviction.

As to the first of the above instructions, this view is probably permissible, although the giving of instructions of that character is not to be regarded with favor.

[5-7] As to the three succeeding instructions, when read together they will be found faulty in two main respects: The first of these consists in the omission to inform the jury that if the defendant believed, and as a reasonable person, under the circumstances of the case as presented to him at the time, had reasonable cause to believe, that the attempted operation was necessary to save the life of the deceased, and that if, acting upon such belief, he attempted to perform the operation in question, and acted with due caution and circumspection, in so doing he would not be guilty of manslaughter, and that whatever reasonable doubt the jury might have upon this subject they were to resolve in favor of the defendant. The second error in these instructions consists in the charge that the defendant was not, as an osteopathic practitioner, licensed to perform major operations, and that if he did attempt to perform such an operation upon the deceased, as the result of which her death occurred, he would be guilty of manslaughter. This is not a correct statement of the law. The right of persons to perform or attempt to perform surgical operations upon others, in the honest and reasonable belief that such operations are necessary in order to save the life of those needing such ministrations, is not confined to those who are licensed by the state to perform surgical operations of the nature of that attempted in this case. Any person actuated by the reasonable belief, based upon the circumstances, that such an operation is necessary to save life, and who acts with due caution and circumspection in the performance of such operation, cannot be held guilty of manslaughter. We think the foregoing instructions were erroneous in both the above respects, and that had the defendant asked for a proper instruction covering these points, and had there been any evidence tending to show that the defendant acted with due or any caution and circumspection in the performance of the operation in question, there can be little doubt but that the foregoing erroneous instructions would have entitled the defendants to a reversal of the judgment and a new trial in the case. The defendant did in fact request several instructions apparently intended to cover the two particular points in which the above instructions given by the court were defective; but each of the instructions asked by the defendant is also defective in the omission of an essential element, which is that the defendant must have believed, and been entitled as a reasonable man under all of the circumstances to have believed, that the operation was necessary in order to save the life of the deceased, before he would have been justified in attempting to perform it, whether he was a duly licensed surgeon or not. The omission of this essential element would have been sufficient to have justified the court in its refusal to give the instructions of the defendant in the form in which they were requested. Whether or not the court should, of its own motion, have amended these instructions of the defendant in the above respects, it is not necessary, under the facts of this case, to decide, for the reason that there was no evidence whatever before the jury which would have warranted a finding that the defendant acted with due or any caution or circumspection in the attempted performance of the operation in question, or which would have justified the jury or any member thereof in entertaining a reasonable doubt upon this branch of the case; but, on the contrary, the evidence affirmatively and indisputably shows that the defendant, in his attempted performance of the operation in question, acted with a shocking degree of unskillfulness, evincing an almost incredible ignorance of surgery and anatomy, and utterly wanting in those elements of skill, caution, and circumspection which the law requires and which should invariably attend upon such an operation. These being the undisputed facts and uncontradicted proofs in the case, the errors of the court in giving the instructions to which the defendant has objected become immaterial, as does also the failure of the court, if the same be error, to have amended and then given instructions covering the points ineffectively presented in the requested instructions of the defendant; and this for the reason that in any event it would have been the duty of the jury to have found the defendant guilty of manslaughter, and for the jury to have failed to have performed this duty in this case would have clearly amounted to a miscarriage of justice. This being so, it becomes our duty to sustain the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ☞159—APPEAL BOND—DEFECT IN FORM—PROPRIETY OF ADDITIONAL BOND.

Where appellant's undertaking for costs, with sureties, was defective in form, the respondent could not complain of such appellant's action in filing an additional bond, perfect in form, whether or not such additional bond was strictly necessary.

5. PROHIBITION ☞28—PROHIBITION TO TRY APPEAL—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

On petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from hearing an appeal from a justice's court on the ground that the undertaking for costs required by statute to be filed to perfect such appeal had been defective, the court could not consider the petitioner's objection to the action of the superior court in refusing to dismiss the appeal because of appellant's delay in bringing it to a hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. ☞28.]

Petition for writ of prohibition by M. Cohen against Clifton H. Connick, as Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Humboldt, and said Superior Court. Denied.

John F. Dufur and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for petitioner. Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner seeks to prohibit the lower court from proceeding with the trial of the case of Cohen v. Blum, on appeal from the justice court of Eureka township.

In response to the alternative writ heretofore issued out of this court, respondents have filed a demurrer and an answer; the latter containing a transcript of the testimony at the hearing, by the said superior court, of the motion made therein by petitioner to dismiss the appeal, and also some other exhibits. There is no controversy as to the facts, and it is stipulated that all the documents filed herein may be considered in determining this application.

The main question is whether a purported bond filed by appellant in said justice court was sufficient to confer upon said superior court jurisdiction of the appeal.

It is not disputed that an undertaking on appeal from a justice court is a jurisdictional prerequisite. Hall v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 24, 8 Pac. 509; McKeen v. Naughton, 88 Cal. 462, 26 Pac. 354. The statute itself is plain enough. Section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"An appeal from a justice's or police court is not effectual for any purpose, unless an undertaking be filed with two or more sureties in the sum of one hundred dollars for the payment of the costs on the appeal."

There is also a further provision in the same section as to an additional undertaking in order to accomplish a stay of execution.

[1-4] It is claimed, though—and justly so—that there is a vital difference between the case where a bond, merely defective in some matter of form, has been filed and the instance where there is no undertaking at all or where it is so defective as to be entirely invalid. This distinction is clearly recognized in the decisions, and it has been held that, where an imperfect though not void undertaking has been given, another one may be filed in the appellate court. This seems to be true on appeal to the superior court, as well as to the Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court.

In Billings v. Roadhouse, 5 Cal. 71, the bond was defective by reason of the omission of the words "to pay to," and the county court dismissed the appeal. The Supreme Court said:

"The defect pointed out is so trifling that the obligation of the bond would not be affected by it. Even if it were otherwise, the court should have given the party leave to file a good bond."

In Cunningham v. Hopkins, 8 Cal. 34, the bond on appeal to the county court was defective—but in what respect does not appear—and it was held that plaintiff should have been permitted by the county court to file a good one before the motion to dismiss the appeal was determined.

In Gray v. Amador County, 61 Cal. 337, the Supreme Court approved of the action of the superior court in permitting the appellant to file another undertaking in lieu of an undertaking insufficient in form filed in the justice court from which the appeal was taken. It was said:

"With respect to a question of practice, like that here presented, we do not feel authorized, at this late day, to disturb a ruling intended to assist parties to a hearing in the appellate court."

In the recent case of Werner v. Superior Court, 161 Cal. 209, 118 Pac. 709, it was said:

"An undertaking on appeal from the justice's court, taken by the plaintiff, which erroneously provides that the sureties will pay all costs and damages awarded against 'the defendant,' instead of 'plaintiff,' * * * is defective merely and not a nullity. Such defect may be cured by the filing in the superior court of a sufficient undertaking, in pursuance of leave first obtained from that court."

Other cases cited to the point by respondents are Rabe v. Hamilton, 15 Cal. 32; Moyle v. Landers, 78 Cal. 107, 20 Pac. 241, 12 Am. St. Rep. 22; Chicago v. Moore, 34 Okl. 199, 124 Pac. 989; Roberts v. Converse, 37 Okl. 169, 131 Pac. 539; Harper v. Pierce, 37 Okl. 457, 132 Pac. 667, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1144; Churchman v. Payte, 37 Okl. 649, 133 Pac. 178. To these we deem it unnecessary to devote specific attention.

In Jarman v. Rea, 129 Cal. 158, 61 Pac. 790, some light is thrown upon the consideration of the character of the infirmity in the bond that may be corrected by a new undertaking filed in the appellate court. Therein it is said:

"The above provision of section 954 contemplates that, although an undertaking has been filed, it may be of such a character or in such a form as not to fully indemnify the respondent against the costs and damages which he may sustain by reason of the appeal. The use of the phrase 'insufficiency of the undertaking' indicates a distinction between an undertaking which does not fully comply with all the terms of section 941 and the entire absence of an undertaking. An undertaking may be filed which is so defective as not to constitute any obligation upon the sureties therein, and which is in reality no undertaking at all. In such a case there is more than mere 'insufficiency.' There is an entire want of indemnity to the respondent, and section 954 has no application."

It is true that said section 954 specifically refers to appeals to the Supreme Court and to a district court of appeal, but the Supreme Court, in considering appeals from the justice court, has approved the same practice as that expressly authorized by said statute. And, in the decisions of the question whether a new undertaking may be filed in the superior court, the same distinction has been made between a void undertaking, or one that "is in reality no undertaking at all," and one that is merely "defective" in not fully complying with the requirements of the statute.

The vital consideration, then, is whether the bond in question filed in the justice court was and is an undertaking in reality at all, and that would seem to depend upon the question whether it is sufficient to indemnify respondent and to impose upon the sureties the obligation to pay the costs of appeal.

The said bond was prepared on a regularly printed form designed for use as an undertaking for costs and also to stay execution and, after title of the court and cause, was in the following form:

"Whereas, M. Blum, the defendant in the above-entitled action, has appealed to the superior court of the county of Humboldt from a judgment made and entered against him in the said action, in the said justice's court, on the 17th day of August, A. D. 1910, in favor of M. Cohen, said plaintiff, for or for the sum of forty-three ($43.00) dollars and costs of suit: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, we, the undersigned, do hereby jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of one hundred dollars. And whereas, the appellant is desirous of staying the execution of said judgment, in so far as relates to the delivery of, we do further, jointly and severally, undertake and promise, in the further sum of dollars being the amount for that purpose fixed by the justice of said court, that during the so as aforesaid fixed by the said justice of said court by which the said judgment was rendered and that appellant will pay any judgment and costs that may be recovered against him in the said action in the said superior court, not exceeding one hundred dollars, as fixed by the justice of said court."

We have italicized the only written words in said instrument; the printed form having been taken as the basis of the obligation, as already stated.

In considering the sufficiency of the foregoing, it is well to recall that, while there may be a stay bond and an undertaking to pay the costs on appeal embodied in one instrument, only an undertaking for the payment of costs is essential to confer jurisdiction upon the appellate court. Section 978, C. C. P.; Edwards v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 115 Pac. 649.

We observe, also, that manifestly there was no attempt to complete the blank form of the undertaking to stay execution, and that portion of the instrument may therefore be disregarded. Rejecting the printed matter relating to a stay of proceedings, we think it sufficiently appears that the document was intended as a bond for the costs on appeal. Indeed, it is perfectly clear that such was the intention, and we believe that the expression of that intention is definite enough to be legally enforced.

The bond was properly entitled and designated, "undertaking on appeal from a judgment directing the payment of money." It was signed by the principal and two sureties, each of whom properly justified. It recites that the defendant has appealed to the superior court from a judgment entered against him in said action, on the 17th day of August, 1910, in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $43 and costs. With the omission of the redundant portion as aforesaid, we have the obligation of the parties expressed as follows:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, we, the undersigned, do hereby jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of one hundred dollars that appellant will pay any judgment and costs that may be recovered against him in the said action in the said superior court, not exceeding one hundred dollars."

It is difficult to conceive how the sureties could more effectually express their purpose to be responsible for the payment of the costs than to declare that they "undertake" that the appellant will pay said costs. Nor is there less doubt as to what "costs" are referred to. As said in Jones v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 591, 91 Pac. 506:

"It is somewhat difficult to imagine what 'costs' are alluded to in the undertaking, unless costs on appeal be intended, for the costs incurred at the trial in the justice's court had become inserted in and were a part of the judgment, and were therefore included in the promise to pay the 'judgment.' However, it is quite clear that 'all costs' include costs on appeal."

We think it equally clear that "any costs," referred to herein, would embrace all costs that might be incurred by reason of the appeal.

Petitioner contends, though, that this position cannot be maintained in view of the following decisions: Duncan v. Times Mirror Co., 109 Cal. 607, 42 Pac. 147; Estate of Fay, 126 Cal. 457, 58 Pac. 936; Zane v. De Onativia, 135 Cal. 440, 67 Pac. 685, and Lane v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 762, 91 Pac. 405. In the first of these it was held that:

"An undertaking on an appeal from a judgment, which fails to contain a stipulation for the payment of damages and costs in the event of a dismissal of the appeal, as required by section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is ineffectual."

In Estate of Fay, supra, the same rule was declared, and the Duncan Case was cited as authority therefor.

In Zane v. De Onativia, supra, the appeal was taken by only one party to the action, and the undertaking purported on its face to be given on an appeal taken by several appellants, and it was held that the undertaking was insufficient to support the appeal, since, "standing upon the strict letter of their contract, the sureties could never be liable for anything upon this undertaking."

In Lane v. Superior Court, the sureties failed to justify when required to do so, and it was therefore held that the appeal must be regarded as if no undertaking had been given.

Of the foregoing, it is manifest that only the first two can be regarded as at all in point, and of these it is to be observed that they involved an appeal from the superior court. In such appeal the statute (section 941, Code Civ. Proc.) specifically provides that the undertaking must be "to the effect that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal, or on a dismissal thereof," while, as stated in the Jones Case, supra:

"The law governing the matter of undertakings on appeal from a justice's court to a superior court is found in section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

And as to this section it is to be observed that it seems to exact the specification, "if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed," only when the undertaking is for a stay of execution.

But, conceding that this provision is applicable to a bond for costs, it would still follow, under the authority of Jarman v. Rea, supra, a later case than Duncan v. Times Mirror Co. or Estate of Fay, that the undertaking is not entirely void. Therein it is declared:

"It cannot be said in the present case that there is an entire want of the undertaking provided by section 941. The sureties undertake that the appellant 'will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal.' The omission of a similar provision in case of a dismissal of the appeal does not defeat or impair the undertaking in case there should be an affirmation of the judgment. The undertaking is merely defective in failing to provide for indemnifying the respondent in case the appeal should be dismissed. This must be held to be only an 'insufficiency,' which may be remedied by the filing of another undertaking."

The latest expression of the Supreme Court to which our attention has been called is found in Edwards v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 115 Pac. 649. Therein it is said:

"The undertaking is in more than the sum of $100, and is conditioned for the payment of the costs on the appeal. It thus contains all that is required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to make the appeal effectual. Its validity as an appeal bond is not destroyed by the fact that it also purports to be given to stay execution. * * * Whether or not it is effectual to operate as a stay bond is not here involved."

It is true that the appeal bond therein contained the provision as to the dismissal of the appeal, but, if it had been otherwise, we think the decision would have been the same.

We think, as said in Pacific Window Glass Co. v. Smith, 8 Cal. App. 768, 97 Pac. 901, that:

"The conclusion we have reached responds to the spirit and corresponds with the trend of modern decisions on points of practice in general, which is that causes should be permitted to be heard on their merits where, in so ruling, positive violence is not done some rule or rules of procedure and practice."

We conclude that the bond was sufficient to bind the sureties and to give the superior court jurisdiction of the appeal. If this conclusion be sound, it would probably follow that no additional bond in the superior court was necessary. But respondent was thereby afforded greater security, and of this he cannot complain.

[5] Petitioner's objection to the action of the court in refusing to dismiss the appeal because of the long delay of appellant in bringing it to a hearing cannot be considered on this application. Clearly the court had jurisdiction to deny the motion as well as to grant it. It was addressed to the discretion of the court, and, while the excuse for the protracted delay does not seem very satisfactory, the court's action is not subject to review here.

The peremptory writ is denied.

BECKWITH-ANDERSON LAND CO. v. AL-
LISON. (Civ. 1259.)

1. BROKERS ⇐60—COMMISSION — LIABILITY OF OWNER—RECOGNITION OF CONTRACT.

Where the contract of sale procured by real estate brokers left the purchaser free to refuse to complete the transaction, subject to forfeiture of earnest money paid, the act of the owner in entering into a written agreement with the purchaser after he had refused to comply with the contract of sale, reciting that the earnest money was forfeited and that by reason thereof the parties were released from further obligation, did not constitute a recognition of the validity of the contract of sale, such as rendered him liable to the brokers for a commission.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐57—CONTRACT OF SALE—CONSTRUCTION—OPTION.

A contract of sale, providing that if the purchaser failed to comply with the contract the earnest money should be forfeited to the vendor and that the vendor should be released from the contract and the purchaser cease to have any rights thereunder, gave the purchaser an option to purchase without any obligation beyond the forfeiture of the earnest money if he failed to complete the transaction.

3. BROKERS ¶71—COMMISSION—CONTRACT—COMPLIANCE WITH CONDITION.

A contract binding the owner to pay a commission of $1,500 "out of the first cash payment of $15,000" does not obligate the owner for the commission where only $1,000 is paid by the proposed purchaser.

4. BROKERS ¶73—COMMISSION — RIGHT TO RECOVER—PARTNERSHIP—CORPORATION.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Beckwith-Anderson Land Company against W. B. Allison. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. L. Russell, of Tulare City, for appellant. Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, and G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. It is presented upon the judgment roll and a transcript of the evidence.

The plaintiff is a corporation. S. B. Anderson and H. H. Beckwith are partners doing business under the name of Beckwith & Anderson. The action is by the corporation, which seeks to recover the sum of $1,500 on an alleged contract to pay commissions for services rendered in procuring a purchaser for certain real and personal property of the defendant. The material facts are as follows: On October 4, 1910, the defendant gave "to the Beckwith-Anderson partnership" the exclusive right for the term of three months to sell the property in question for $33,500. According to the undisputed testimony, this contract was by subsequent agreement continued in force until on and after March 25, 1911. Plaintiff's action is upon an alleged written contract between plaintiff and defendant of date March 25, 1911, concerning which the evidence is as follows: On March 22, 1911, a letter signed Beckwith-Anderson Land Company was sent by Mr. Beckwith from Tulare, Cal., to the defendant at Mesa, Ariz., in which the former writing is referred to as "our option," and stated an offer received to purchase said property for $30,000, payable $15,000 cash on the making of the transfer and the balance in one, two, and three years at 6 per cent. The letter says:

"If you should consider this we would want to retain as a commission for ourselves 5 per cent. being fifteen hundred ($1,500.00) dollars out of the first cash payment of fifteen thousand ($15,000.00)."

Under date of March 25th defendant telegraphed:

"To Beckwith and Anderson, Tulare, California. Accept offer, and write me when deal is closed."

On or about April 3d and under that date an agreement was entered into "between S. B. Anderson and H. H. Beckwith," parties of the first part, and the proposed purchaser, J. E. Davidson, party of the second part, and signed by those parties. According to this agreement, the first parties agreed to sell and convey to the second party the said property for the sum of $30,000, of which $1,000 was paid forthwith; $14,000 was to be paid on execution and delivery of deed, and $15,000 in three equal installments of one, two, and three years at 6 per cent. There were recitals showing that the title to the property was in the defendant and the agreement made subject to his approval and ratification and that it was made by the first parties as his agents. It was further provided that upon failure of the second party to comply with the terms of the agreement, both as to depositing in the First National Bank of Tulare the said sum of $14,000 and as to the mortgage for the other installments, "then the said parties of the first part and their principal W. B. Allison, shall be released from all obligations in law and equity to convey said property, and all rights of said second party herein shall cease, and the said sum of $1,000 paid hereunder shall be forfeited as damages for the nonfulfillment of the conditions hereof by said second party."

On or about April 6th the defendant arrived at Tulare and examined said agreement. Although he did not sign any approval of it, the evidence shows that it was acceptable to him and that he was at all times ready and willing to convey the property if the purchaser complied with the terms of agreement. On or about April 23d, Mr. Davidson decided to abandon his purchase and so informed the parties of the first part named in his said agreement. On or about May 5, 1911, a writing was signed between defendant and J. E. Davidson referring to said agreement and its terms; to the fact that Davidson did not complete the purchase and that said sum of $1,000 thereby became and was "forfeited to said Allison under said agreement, and as the only penalty thereof," and it was mutually agreed that by reason of the premises and of said forfeiture the parties were released from the obligations thereof.

[1, 2] It is contended on behalf of respondent that this last-mentioned agreement is not only a recognition of the validity of the contract of April 3d, but it is also a voluntary act of the defendant which gave consent to the nonperformance thereof. There would be much force in this contention if Davidson's obligation as to completion of the purchase had been dependent upon the consent of Allison. But the abandonment which had previously taken place was within Davidson's rights under the contract which he had made, and the agreement of May 5th added nothing to that situation. The case is clearly distinguishable from North Stockton Town Lot Co. v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 100, 70 Pac. 1082, 71 Pac. 438, cited by respondent's counsel. There it was provided in the contract that on default in payment of any installment of the purchase price the whole of the balance should immediately become due and payable, at the option of the plaintiff, and the amounts already paid should be forfeited. It resulted, of course, that the forfeiture also was optional with the vendor, since his exercise of the right to demand complete and immediate payment would necessarily be inconsistent with forfeiture of the payments that had been made. But in the present case it was, as is above shown, unconditionally provided that, upon failure of Davidson to comply with the conditions to be performed by him, the $1,000 payment should be forfeited as damages for nonfulfillment of those conditions. Under such circumstances, the proposed purchaser has an option to purchase, without any obligation beyond the fact that he is subject to the loss of his forfeit money if he does not complete the transaction. Pehl v. Fanton, 17 Cal. App. 247, 252, 119 Pac. 400.

There is nowhere in the record any writing signed by the defendant in which he recognizes the plaintiff corporation as the agent with whom he was dealing. The defendant Allison afterwards recovered judgment against Beckwith and Anderson for said sum of $1,000. In that action they claimed the money personally as Beckwith and Anderson, and after the judgment against them they paid the amount thereof to W. B. Allison, plaintiff in that action and defendant here.

On the facts shown by the record, of which we have stated the material parts, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any commissions from the defendant.

[3, 4] If the letter of March 22d and the defendant's reply telegram of March 25, 1911, could be treated as an agreement between plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff could not recover herein for two reasons: First, the letter proposed that the commission should be paid "out of the first cash payment of $15,000." No such payment has ever been made, nor can the failure to make it be chargeable as caused by any fault of the defendant. The condition so stated under which the commission might become due has never occurred. Second, the plaintiff did not perform any service in connection with the proposed sale. The transactions which followed in the making of the contract with Davidson were conducted solely by the Beckwith and Anderson partnership.

A considerable portion of the evidence was received against objections made by the defendant, which objections, under the view of the case which we have stated, should have been sustained. It is, however, not necessary to review the rulings on evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

MERCHANT et al. v. GRANT. (Civ. 1266.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 5, 1915.)

1. DEDICATION ⇐20—EVIDENCE—USE AS HIGHWAY.

Evidence that the owner of a strip of land lying between a warehouse and highway treated it for years as a public highway shows an intention to dedicate it to the public, notwithstanding a second grant by him to the owner of the warehouse of a part only of the strip.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 17-30; Dec. Dig. ⇐20.]

2. BOUNDARIES ⇐20—DESCRIPTION—METES AND BOUNDS.

Where a grantor conveyed part of his land for a warehouse site, and dedicated the strip between the warehouse and the road as a highway, and thereafter the boundary of the highway was so located as to leave a strip between the warehouse site as described and the road, so that access to the warehouse from the road would be cut off, the boundary of the site was the highway, though it was described by metes and bounds with no reference to the highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 123-130, 132; Dec. Dig. ⇐20.]

3. BOUNDARIES ⇐20—HIGHWAYS—CONVEYANCE OF FEE.

Under Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Mary L. Merchant and another against John D. Grant. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Coffman, of Healdsburg, for appellant. T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to quiet plaintiffs' title to a strip of land 243 feet long, 13 feet wide at its eastern end, and 16 feet wide at its western end, and alleged to be bounded on the south by the county road running from Healdsburg to Santa Rosa, in Sonoma county. The court made findings in favor of plaintiffs and entered its decree accordingly. Defendant appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is conceded that defendant is the owner of the land in dispute, unless the court was justified from the evidence in finding that two certain deeds under which plaintiffs claim title were intended to make the said county road the southern boundary of the land.

On June 11, 1887, John D. Grant and S. Cohn conveyed to William Van Alen a block of land 36 feet wide and 168 feet long, bounded on the north by the right of way land of the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company, and from the point of beginning at the railroad land the line ran at right angles to the railroad track southerly 36 feet, "thence at right angles parallel with said railroad 168 feet, thence at right angles northerly 36 feet to railroad property, thence westerly at right angles along railroad property to place of beginning, and canning rights," etc. This block of land had been in use for, and on it had been erected, a warehouse covering nearly the entire tract. On November 7, 1887, Grant and wife conveyed to Van Alen a strip of land described as "commencing at the southeast corner of the warehouse lot, thence 6 feet southerly on line with easterly line of warehouse lot, thence westerly 243 feet parallel with south line of warehouse lot, thence northerly and at right angles 42 feet to railroad line, thence easterly 75 feet to the northwesterly corner of warehouse lot, thence southerly and easterly following line of said warehouse lot to the point of beginning." By this deed a strip of land 6 feet wide was added to the south side of the warehouse lot first above described, and also a piece on the west 42 feet wide and 75 feet long; the two deeds thus conveying a block of land 42 feet wide and 243 feet long. The land in controversy is an additional strip, as above stated, along the southern boundary of this block of land, 13 feet wide at its eastern end, and 16 feet wide at its western end. No mention is made, in either of these deeds, of the county road, or reference to it in any way as constituting the south boundary of the land in question.

Appellant contends that the block of land, described by these two deeds, cannot be extended beyond the metes and bounds mentioned therein; that the strip of land in controversy lies between the highway and the land conveyed by these deeds, and is part of a tract of land to which he holds title from the same ancestor in estate as the one through whom plaintiffs claim title. Plaintiffs claim that the county road was in fact the southern boundary of the land conveyed by these deeds, and although not made so by their terms the fact that the southern boundary coincided with the northern boundary of the road—i. e., that the land conveyed was intended to be so bounded—the result is the same as if the deeds had so declared. There was evidence that a county road leading from Healdsburg to Santa Rosa and passing south of the land in controversy has been in existence and traveled by the public for more than 50 years; that a warehouse was built on the land described in the deed dated June 11, 1887, about the time the said railroad was completed to Healdsburg, in 1872 or 1873, and the land had been known thereafter as the "warehouse lot." The established location of the north and south lines of the county road at this point was not shown farther than it seems to have been conceded that the southern boundary of the county road was marked by a fence and this boundary remains unchanged. There was evidence that the warehouse was used by the public for storing grain and hay for several years—up to 1887, and probably a little later (the witnesses were not certain as to dates), when Van Alen converted it into a cannery, and so used it until it burned down about 1894, since which time the land has been unoccupied for any purpose and has been open on all sides except on the line of the railroad. Describing the situation, witness Petray testified:

"South of the warehouse and this parallelogram (referring to the plat of ground as shown on the map used at the trial) there was just a country road and open space. The county road was wider there, all of what we called the county road, and it went up to the platform of the warehouse. * * * As long as I can remember (he had been familiar with the premises for 40 years) there was no obstruction between the warehouse lot and the county road. People going to and coming from the warehouse just simply pulled off a little to one side of the road to get to the platform of the warehouse. The platform of the warehouse was next to the county road. I never heard of any objection to the public traveling there. I have traveled there myself, and I have passed on the road and rode up to the warehouse with my father many times. No objection was made to my going there. I know it was a public warehouse, and neighbors hauled and stored there."

Witness Pettis testified:

"When the warehouse was put there, there was nothing to the south of it but a wagon road. The width of the wagon road there at that time was the whole thing just from the warehouse—the warehouse was 30 feet wide and 150 feet long. * * * The space next to the warehouse, the 13 feet on the east and 16 feet on the west, was never used for anything since I can remember, that I know of. People got to the warehouse by driving along the wagon road, they had no other way than over this strip of land. * * * I never knew of any objections being made to the people traveling on that road. I traveled over it myself for the last 42 years."

[1, 2] There is abundant evidence that while Grant, Sr., owned the land and warehouse, and while Van Alen owned it, the owners treated the space south of the tract occupied by the warehouse as part of the county road, and the evidence would seem to warrant the conclusion that they intended to and did dedicate to the public for the purposes of a highway the land south of the warehouse lot. Barnes v. Daveck, 7 Cal. App. 487, 94 Pac. 779. Appellant suggests that the second deed, made in November, 1887, indicates a contrary purpose. Why this deed was made does not appear. It is altogether probable that this additional 6 feet was conveyed to make more certain that the tract was intended to extend to the highway. We cannot say, from any evidence in the record, precisely where the north boundary of the road was with reference to this tract of land, for there was no evidence of its definite location. All we know is that the land south of the warehouse lot was given over by its owners to the public for, and was used by the public as, a public road from 1872 to about 1894. This would seem to fix the status of the land, and if the north line of the road has since been definitely located along the south boundary of the strip of land in controversy, and this latter is no longer used or needed by the public, it would seem but just that it should belong to plaintiffs, and that the southern boundary of their land should be the highway. Any other view would make their land absolutely inaccessible from any direction. Furthermore, it is not probable than Van Alen would have purchased the land, if it had been surrounded by lands of his grantor, with no access to the land he purchased.

[3] In its decree the court described the property claimed by plaintiffs so as to locate the south boundary along "the center of said Santa Rosa and Healdsburg road 243 feet." This was on the theory that the intention of the grantors was to make the road the boundary of the land, and hence conveyed the fee to the center of the road, subject, of course, to the easement enjoyed by the public. The evidence would seem to justify this conclusion. It is undoubtedly the rule that where a public street or public highway is made a boundary of land the owner is presumed to own to the center of the street or road (Civ. Code, § 831); and "a transfer of land, bounded by a highway, passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway in front of the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant" (Civ. Code, § 1112).

We do not think that where the land as described in fact abuts upon a street or highway, though the street or highway be not mentioned as the boundary, the grant necessarily shows "a different intent." The rule is well established that the conveyance of a lot bounded upon a street in a city carries the land to the center of the street. And it was held, in Bissell v. N. Y., etc., R. Co., 23 N. Y. 61, "there is no distinction in this respect between streets of a city and county highways." The rule, it was said, "seems to be based on the supposed intention of the parties, and the improbability of the grantor desiring or intending to reserve his interest in the street when he had parted with his title to adjoining land, such intention will never be presumed." Devlin on Real Estate (3d Ed.) vol. 2, § 1028a. In Sizer v. Devereux, 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 160, it was held that, "when in the deed of land the description of the lines is by courses and distances and no road is named, but by proof on trial it appears that one line must be on a road, the land to the center of the road is included." In Champlin v. Pendleton, 13 Conn. 23, the south line of the land conveyed was the same as the north line of the highway, although the highway was not mentioned or referred to in the deed, and it was held that the fee passed to the center of the highway. It would seem to us to be unreasonable to hold that the grantors of Van Alen intended to retain in themselves the ownership of the land included in the highway which could have been of no possible use to them and might result to the serious injury of their grantee. All the circumstances and facts are opposed to any such presumption.

There are some other questions presented by appellant's brief, but the case in fact turns upon the effect of the deeds above considered and the evidence in respect of the intention of the grantors. All other questions are of minor importance and do not call for special mention.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by John Benedict against the Greer-

Robbins Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Neighbours, Sproul & Hoag, of Los Angeles, for appellant. James, Smith & McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal taken by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant. By his action plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $800 alleged to be the value of a certain automobile which it was alleged had been appropriated and converted by the defendant.

Plaintiff, in January, 1913, entered into an agreement with the Hollywood Garage Company to purchase a six-cylinder automobile truck. The machine was not a new one. He agreed to deliver certain personal property other than money in part payment therefor, which arrangement was carried out. He then took possession of the truck, and, to provide for the payment of the additional consideration required of him, he executed the following instrument:

"For value received, on or before the 15th day of May, 1913, I or we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Hollywood Garage Company at their office in Los Angeles, California, three hundred and fifty and no/100 dollars ($350.00) payable in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest thereon from date until paid, in like coin, at the rate of seven (7%) per cent. per annum. In case a suit or action is instituted to collect the money above mentioned, or any part thereof, I promise to pay such additional sum as the court in which said suit or action is instituted may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in such suit or action.

"This note is given upon and for the consideration that the said Hollywood Garage Co. has agreed and promised that upon the payment of this note, principal and interest, at maturity (time being the essence of the contract) they will sell and transfer to the undersigned at the price of said principal and interest, the Mitchell truck #22,175 which the said Hollywood Garage Co. has this day intrusted to the care of the undersigned.

"It is admitted and agreed that the said property so intrusted is the property of the said Hollywood Garage Co. and shall remain in said company until it shall make the aforesaid sale and transfer.

"Demand, presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest are hereby waived.

"This note is payable in installments of one hundred dollars ($100.00) per month commencing February the 15, 1913, and last payment $50.00 on May 15, 1913.

"Maker's P. O. _____

"[Sign here] J. Benedict."

Some time prior to June 11th the Hollywood Garage Company sold and transferred to respondent all of its interest in the contract above set forth and the automobile, and thereafter plaintiff dealt with the defendant and made payments to it. The contract matured on May 15, 1913. On that date but $150 had been paid by appellant. On June 11th appellant paid the sum of $100 on account, which left him still in arrears in the sum of $100. He requested of respondent's agent at that time that he be allowed to pay the balance in two payments of $50 each. This agent said that he would see his employers about that matter. Subsequently respondent wrote to appellant the following letter:

"July 9, 1913.

"J. Benedict, c/o Sherman Heights Grocery, Sherman, Cal.—Dear Sir: On June 10th our Mr. Hartley granted you an extension of time on payment of your note which was $100.00, giving you the privilege of paying one-half of this amount $50.00 on July 10th and the other $50 August 10th. Will you please arrange to let us have this $50.00 to-morrow July 10th promptly when due as we have given you all the extension of time it is possible for us to do and we must have the money.

"Very truly yours,

"Greer-Robbins Co., by _____"

This letter appellant testified he received "after the 10th or 11th, somewhere right about there." A check dated July 18th for the sum of $50 was sent to respondent and received by the latter on July 19th, and the amount of money represented thereby was collected. Nothing more was paid, and on August 1st respondent took possession of the automobile. The property was later sold for an amount sufficient to pay the remainder of appellant's indebtedness.

[1, 2] That the contract provided for a conditional sale and reserved title to the property in the vendor until performance had been fully made is not disputed by the appellant. His claim is that the letter of July 9th, written by respondent, and the acceptance of the payment of $50 made on July 19th, worked a waiver of the right to terminate the contract. There was no consideration furnished for the alleged agreement to extend the time. The $100 was all then due, and a promise to render what a person is already under legal obligation to render cannot amount to a sufficient consideration as will support a new contract. Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 474, and cases cited thereunder. See, also, Liening v. Gould, 13 Cal. 598.

[3] The second contention, that a vendor under a conditional sale contract, by accepting partial payment of money then overdue, waives the right to take the property, is not sustained by the decisions. Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 597; Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 56 Pac. 339. The last decision cited is very pertinent to the claim of estoppel urged against respondent here. In that case the vendor allowed the possession of property to be transferred to a third party and accepted payments from the latter with apparently full knowledge of all of the facts and without notifying the new party that the original vendee was in default. The Supreme Court held that the original vendor was not estopped from taking possession of the property on account of the default committed by its vendee as to payments due prior to the time the new party obtained possession of the property. Under the evidence in this case, even conceding validity to the agreement as to the extension of time, it is plain that appellant did not live up to the conditions of that understanding. He did not send in the $50 required of him on July 10th, until July 19th, which was a delay of more than one week. This fact alone would have authorized respondent to have treated the agreement for extension as being abrogated and to insist upon taking advantage of appellant's default, which had already continued for more than two months. It has been noted that the partial payment of an amount due will not operate to prevent a vendor from retaking possession of property contracted to be sold. Appellant could not have bound respondent by remitting a partial payment on account with the express stipulation that the payment was made on condition that time be extended for payment of the remainder of the money then due. The appropriation of the money so remitted could not work an acceptance of a new offer, because the respondent, under its contract, was already legally entitled to collect that money.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

WAGNER v. EUSTATHIW. (Sac. 2139.)(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1915.
Rehearing Denied April 19, 1915.)1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨51—CONTRACTS
ENFORCEABLE—FAIRNESS.

Under Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 2, declaring that specific performance cannot be enforced against a party when the contract is not, as to him, just and reasonable, a contract, whereby defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff his interest in a restaurant and lodging house property, owned jointly with plaintiff, for $15,000, a fair valuation, without any fraud or unfair practice, upon payment of $100 at the date of the contract, $400 on delivery of the deed, and the balance by note payable in installments of at least $100 a month, with interest at 7 per cent., the note to be secured by a first mortgage on the real property, was not so unjust and unreasonable to defendant as to be unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. ⇨51.]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨28—CONTRACTS
ENFORCEABLE—DEFINITENESS.

A contract for the purchase and sale of real and personal property, to be paid for by installment notes secured by mortgage on the realty, not setting forth all the terms and conditions of the mortgage, was sufficiently definite, because the usual and reasonable terms found in such mortgages are, in contemplation of the parties, part of their contract, and because the contract itself clearly showed what the terms were to be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-68; Dec. Dig. ⇨28.]

3. INTEREST ⇨23—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION —TIME OF PAYMENT.

An executory contract of sale, fixing the interest on the unpaid balances at 7 per cent. per annum, without any definite provision as to the payment of interest monthly or annually, would be construed as a contract that the interest should be paid as customary in contracts of that kind.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by William Wagner against N. K. Eustathiw. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. T. Manwell, M. T. Brittan, and J. E. Ebert, all of Marysville, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action for the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land. Judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff and defendant were friends and neighbors, and had been such for many years. They owned adjoining lots of land on Third street in the city of Marysville. Upon these lots buildings had been erected, the plaintiff using his building as a saloon, the defendant using his as a restaurant. There was an opening in the dividing wall which allowed access to and from the saloon and restaurant. In 1908 they agreed to build jointly two stories over the one-story buildings on their properties. These stories were built and were used without boundary wall or division, as a single building. They were maintained as a lodging house and contained 54 rooms. The management and control was simplified by plaintiff leasing to defendant the lodging house and its business, while defendant leased to plaintiff his ground floor used as the restaurant. In October, 1911, defendant became possessed of a desire to sell his property. He stated this desire to plaintiff's witnesses. He had made repeated efforts to sell the property to plaintiff, and plaintiff had declined to consider the sale upon the ground that he did not have money enough to purchase it. Defendant approached plaintiff in his place of business upon October 9th and urged him to purchase his interest in these properties, saying that he would be content with a small payment and an extension of time for later payments. He said he would take $15,000 for his properties, with $500 paid at the time of the execution of the deed, and $100 a month thereafter, the unpaid balance to bear 7 per cent. interest, secured by mortgage. Defendant labored with plaintiff for five hours to induce him to purchase upon these terms. Finally plaintiff assented, and a formal executory contract of sale was entered into. An attorney was asked to draw this paper and did so. The document signed by defendant was an agreement to sell to plaintiff the property above sufficiently described, with the furniture contained in the lodging house, the price being $15,000. "Said Wagner is to pay said purchase price as follows: $100.00 at this date; $400.00 to be paid at time of making and delivery of deed; the balance to be paid by a promissory note from said Wagner to me payable in installments of at least $100.00 per month or more at option of said Wagner with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, said note to be secured by a first mortgage on the real property hereby agreed to be sold." Defendant accepted the $100 and went his way. Several days elapsed, during which defendant expressed no dissatisfaction with the contract, but, to the contrary, declared himself quite satisfied with it. But afterward he informed Mr. Ebert, the attorney who had drawn the contract for both the parties and at the request of both, that he did not desire to carry it out, and asked Mr. Ebert to show the contract to Mr. Carlin, his (defendant's) attorney. This was done. Mr. Carlin, for the defendant, sought a modification, to which plaintiff would not agree. Essentially, the modification desired was a larger monthly payment on account of the principal. The note, the mortgage, and the $400 to be paid upon the execution of the deed, were tendered to the defendant for signature and acceptance. He declined to proceed with his contract and this action was brought. No word is offered by the defense of advantage taken or unfair practices.

[1] The defense rests solely upon the terms of the contract itself, from which terms it is contended that as to the defendant, against whom specific performance is sought, the contract is not just and reasonable. Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 2. Even the question of the value of the property, as compared with the price fixed in the contract, is not here in dispute. The contract price was $15,000 for the real property, with the personal property in the building. Defendant offered to stipulate that the reasonable value of the property was $15,000; $13,500 representing the value of the real property, and $1,500 representing the value of the personal property. In addition to this there was uncontradicted and abundant evidence to establish the fact. The price being adequate, we must turn to the terms and the conditions of the payment of that price to find support for the judgment of the court that the contract was unjust and unreasonable as to the defendant. The court manifestly, we think, based its decision upon an erroneous construction which it put upon that contract. This is clearly indicated by the opinion of the learned trial judge, wherein he says:

"Such a contract I believe to be unfair and unreasonable. It would take the plaintiff a long time to complete the payment for this building. The first year he would reduce the principal a little over $200. The monthly payments amount to but little more than the monthly interest on the principal."

Under this construction of the contract, the court's conclusion was not unwarranted. But the construction itself is erroneous. What the contract called for was a payment upon the principal sum of the indebtedness of not less than $100 a month exclusive of interest, the indebtedness to be secured by mortgage.

[2] True, all of the terms and conditions of the mortgage are not set forth in this executory contract, but there is no principle of equity requiring this to be done: First, because the usual and reasonable terms found in such mortgages are, in contemplation of the parties, a part of their contract; and, second, because this contract clearly evinces what those terms are to be.

[3] True it is that while it fixes the interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, there is no definite provision as to the payment of interest monthly or annually. But in such a case custom steps in, and it would be considered that in contemplation of the parties the interest would be paid as is customary in contracts of the kind. In precise point upon this may be cited Ehrenstrom v. Phillips (Del. Ch.) 77 Atl. 81. The trial court did not hold, nor is it conceivable that it would hold, that a contract providing for the payment of $100 a month upon a principal indebtedness of $14,500, with interest upon all sums due, this indebtedness secured by mortgage upon the property acquired, the price being the full value of the property, presents any feature of injustice or inadequacy. To the contrary, while one man might greatly desire that the full cash price should be paid immediately, another might much prefer to treat the debt secured by mortgage as an investment, with payments covering the period of time contemplated by this contract.

The peculiar situation of these parties to the land in question affords an especial reason, over and above those ordinarily present in an action specifically to enforce a contract for the sale of real estate, why in this case the plaintiff should be allowed to appeal to a court of equity, rather than be sent into a court of law for legal damages.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by John A. Stanwood and others against J. M. Carson and another. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, Charles S. Burnell, Kemper B. Campbell, and Frank P. Doherty, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by certain property owners in the city of Ocean Park to secure a decree declaring null and void the proceedings under which Lake avenue in that city was improved. Plaintiffs seek to remove the cloud cast upon their respective titles by the assessments upon their properties for the work done. The trial was had upon a stipulated statement of the evidence, most of which consisted of the records of the proceedings on file in the office of the city clerk of Ocean Park. In certain instances the stipulation touching the evidence bearing upon a given matter was coupled with an objection by plaintiffs to the admissibility of this evidence. The trial court in its decision declared as follows:

"The court herewith makes its findings of fact and conclusions of law as follows:

"Findings of Fact.

The whole of the stipulation of the parties, including their objections to the admissibility of certain portions of the evidence, is then set forth in extenso. Then, so declares the court, "as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts found, the court finds" that each of the assessments is valid and is a valid lien upon the respective lots against which it is levied.

Judgment for defendants followed accordingly. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] The appeal from the judgment was taken too late; more than six months having elapsed between the entry of the judgment and the date of the appeal taken. That appeal, therefore, is not entitled to consideration. Henry v. Merguire, 111 Cal. 1, 43 Pac. 387; Brownlee v. Reimer, 147 Cal. 641, 82 Pac. 324.

[2] The first proposition advanced is that the order must be reversed for the failure of the court to rule upon the objections to the admission of evidence and to make any findings of fact whatsoever. To illustrate the first of these contentions, it is shown that the stipulation is to the effect, "that it may be considered that E. A. De Camp, a witness for the defendants, being duly sworn, would testify as follows, and that said statements may be considered as in evidence subject to the objection of plaintiffs that they are incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." Again, it is stipulated that copies of the Evening Journal, issued during the period involved in these street proceedings, "purported to be published in Ocean Park, and bore the following headings, 'Evening Journal,' and under that, 'The Official Paper,' and under that, 'Ocean Park, Cal.,' followed by the date of the paper, but that plaintiffs object that such facts are incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and are declarations made by one not a party to the action." The stipulation contains numerous other declarations of evidence, accompanied by like objections upon the part of plaintiffs to its admissibility. Upon no one of these objections did the court make a distinct ruling. For its failure so to do it is insisted that a new trial should be granted, and such cases as Mayo v. Mazeaux, 38 Cal. 442, City of Stockton v. Dunham, 59 Cal. 609, and Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 471, 55 Pac. 398, are relied on. It is true, and always has been, that the practice of deciding a case without in terms declaring upon reserved rulings touching the admissibility of evidence is a practice to be reprobated and deplored. In some cases it may work substantial injustice to a litigant. In any case where it can be shown that such a result follows, the error is of sufficient gravity to call for a reversal. But it does not follow that injury is worked in every such case, and it is quite plain that it is not worked in the present case. It may be assumed as being the assumption of greatest benefit to appellants, and as being borne out by the decision which the court reached and expressed in its conclusions of law and judgment, that every one of plaintiffs' objections was overruled. The next matter for consideration is whether any of them of material consequence to plaintiffs' case was erroneously overruled, and, finally, whether by this method plaintiffs were denied the opportunity of introducing other evidence to meet, rebut, and overcome the evidence to the admission of which they objected. But it would unduly and unnecessarily prolong this consideration to discuss at length all of the objections advanced by plaintiffs to the admission of evidence. For the most part the evidence was record evidence. The objections were all founded upon the contention that for various omissions and irregularities this record evidence was inadmissible and void. Thus the stipulation declares:

"That it may be considered that defendants have put in evidence the original of the reissued assessment, warrant, and diagram, all, however, subject to plaintiffs' objection that it is irrelevant, immaterial and incompetent; that, there is no showing that the warrant after its alleged reissue was ever recorded," etc.

Again, plaintiffs alleged that the assessment was invalid because it did not describe in any way the pieces and lots of land upon which it was supposed to be levied. It is here apparent that these objections directed against the admissibility of evidence really involve the consideration of questions of law, namely, the legality and regularity of the proceeding, which questions of law were resolved against the contention of plaintiffs in the conclusions of law which the court made; the essential conclusion being that the assessments constituted valid liens against plaintiffs' property. To reach this conclusion the court necessarily must have considered these proceedings and the record of them to be valid. It must, therefore, of necessity have overruled plaintiffs' objection to the introduction of these records. We may reserve for later consideration the legal questions presented by these objections, and conclude this branch of the discussion by saying that, assuming the rulings to have been correct, plaintiffs were not injured. Their case is quite different from that of Raymond v. Glover, supra. There it happened, as it may sometimes happen, that the evidence to the admission of which objection was made was of such character that, if the objection was overruled, the objecting party might be compelled, and should have the right, to meet it by rebutting evidence. And so in Raymond v. Glover it was declared:

"That in the present case appellant, if advised by a decision of the court admitting the evidence, might have rebutted such evidence."

No such situation is here before us. All of the evidence which either party could introduce upon any of the issues was introduced, and therefore we repeat, considering the court's action as being a ruling in each instance against plaintiffs' objection, they were not injured, unless some one or another of those rulings was erroneous upon an issue vital to their cause, which matter will meet with consideration hereafter.

[3] Much of what has been said is applicable to the second proposition advanced by plaintiffs, namely, that the court failed to find upon any of the matters in issue; that the stipulation was but an evidentiary stipulation; and that it was still incumbent upon the court to weigh the evidence and declare by its findings the result of such weighing, namely, the proof or absence of proof. But here again it is to be remembered that all of the evidence is in the stipulation; that the questions presented at the trial, while in a sense questions of fact, were questions of fact precisely as the construction and meaning of a contract is a question of fact. It is a question of fact mixed with and determinable upon more or less intricate questions of law. Thus, to illustrate by one example, plaintiffs alleged that the so-called assessment was invalid for the reason that it did not in any way describe the pieces or lots of land upon which it purported to be levied. This was denied. The stipulation sets forth what is agreed to be a correct copy of the assessment in so far as the assessment describes or attempts to describe the property. The complaint is made that the court did not in terms find whether the assessment did so describe the property. But what was the court called upon to do? It was called upon to inspect and analyze the assessment, and, applying to this inspection and analysis the governing principles of law, finally to declare as a fact that the assessment did or did not do this thing. The conclusion which the court would reach, while it may be described as a finding of fact, manifestly was the determination of a mixed question of law and fact. What the court did do in its conclusions of law was to sustain the assessment as constituting a valid lien, and in so doing necessarily to determine and declare that the property was sufficiently described. But we need not elaborate further upon this matter, for it is well settled that, where a stipulation embraces all of the evidence, specific findings upon that evidence are not necessary. The conclusion of law that the assessments were valid is itself a determination of the ultimate fact. The matter is satisfactorily and conclusively disposed of by such cases as Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 364; Muller v. Rowell, 110 Cal. 318, 42 Pac. 804; and Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 155, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057. Indeed, in Gregory v. Gregory it is aptly said that the order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial cannot be reviewed, because a new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact, and "in this case all of the facts were agreed upon. There was no issue of fact to be re-examined; the only question being as to what was the law applicable to those facts." Were it not for the circumstance that plaintiffs' objection to the admissibility of certain of this evidence still remain to be considered, this discussion could be ended here.

[4] To that consideration we now come. It is not questioned but that the notices by the Vrooman Act required to be published were, in fact, published. The newspaper in which they appeared was printed in a building on the boundary line between the cities of Santa Monica and Ocean Park. That boundary line went directly through the printing office. The presses were situated in Ocean Park. The front office and editorial room and business office were situated in Santa Monica. The paper was entitled the Evening Journal, was designated as the official paper of Ocean Park, and purported to be published in Ocean Park. Appellants' contention is that, the presses being situated in Ocean Park, the paper was, of course, there printed; that "publication," as used in the act, means the precise place from which the paper is initially issued for circulation. Thus it is contended that the place from which this paper was issued for circulation—that is to say, was published—was not from the pressroom in Ocean Park, but from the business offices across the imaginary line and in Santa Monica. There is no manner of doubt but that the paper in question was circulated, and widely circulated, in Ocean Park. Having in mind the purpose to be effected by the law, we hold appellants' view of the word "publication," as used in the statute, to be entirely too narrow. It is quite as rational to say, since the fact is that the circulation and distribution of the paper was in the city of Ocean Park, that the publication which followed the printing came immediately from the pressrooms in Ocean Park. It is wholly unnecessary to picture the physical transportation of these papers from the press in Ocean Park across the imaginary line into the business offices, and a primary publication being made in another room in the same building, to the end of defeating the plain purpose of the law. We will not review the authorities. None uphold plaintiffs' contention; while, to the contrary, the general principle is well established that, the vital consideration being notice by publication, such publication is the publication contemplated by law, with little or no regard paid to the mere place of printing, even when the word "printing," coupled with publication, is embraced in the statutory requirement. State v. Hoboken, 44 N. J. Law, 131; Ricketts v. Hyde Park, 85 Ill. 111; Brown's Estate v. West Seattle, 43 Wash. 26, 85 Pac. 854; Hinchman v. Barns, 21 Mich. 558; Greenlee v. Marks, 62 Ind. 420; Hart v. Smith, 44 Wis. 229. The objection to the introduction of the evidence upon this matter was, therefore, properly overruled, and the legal question involved as to the regularity of the publication in a properly authorized journal was correctly decided in defendants' favor.

[5] The award was by a three-fourths vote of the trustees. This award did not contain the approval of the president of the board. But, having been made by three-fourths of the board of trustees the approval of the president was not necessary. McDonald v. Dodge, 97 Cal. 112, 31 Pac. 909; Greenwood v. Morrison, 128 Cal. 350, 60 Pac. 971; Clarke v. Jennings, 98 Cal. xvii, 32 Pac. 1049.

[6] To the objection of appellants that the resolution of award is insufficient because it did not bear the certificate of the clerk, suffice it to say that the law does not require such certificate. To this and other like objections it may be answered, in the language of Hellman v. Shoulters, supra, that the validity of the procedure, unless made mandatory by law, does not depend upon whether or not proof was made a matter of record, but upon the fact that due notices and awards were, in fact, properly made.

[7] Extensions of time were awarded by the trustees. The objection to these extensions is that they were not certified to by the city clerk. The phraseology of each resolution was that:

"The city clerk shall certify to the passage of this resolution, and shall thereupon notify the street superintendent of the said extension of time."

But this form of certification and this form of notification were not of the essence of the extensions. Similar contentions upon like questions have been reviewed by this court and uniformly held untenable. Oakland Paving Co. v. Barstow, 79 Cal. 49, 21 Pac. 544; Gay v. Engebretson, 158 Cal. 25, 109 Pac. 876, 139 Am. St. Rep. 67. The cases cited by appellants are cases where the power to order a publication is vested with the board, and where, therefore, the publication itself is without validity, unless so ordered, and consequently a publication ordered by a clerk without authority from the board is nugatory. Of this character of cases are Donnelly v. Marks, 47 Cal. 187; Donnelly v. Tillman, 47 Cal. 40; Himmelmänn v. Townsend, 49 Cal. 151; Himmelmänn v. Satterlee, 49 Cal. 387, and Napa v. Easterby, 61 Cal. 509. Of like character is Chase v. Treasurer, 122 Cal. 545, 55 Pac. 414, where the statute required a publication in a paper designated by the council. It was held to be a nondelegable duty of the council so to designate the paper, and it had not done so. These cases, of course, have no bearing upon the question here presented, where extensions of time became operative by action of the council duly made, and the irregularity, if it can be said that it rises even to the dignity of an irregularity, was occasioned by a failure to observe the formal method indicated for giving notice that such extensions had been made.

[8, 9] Appellants' contention that the work was not completed in time arises from the following facts: Upon appeal to the council it was decreed that the work had not been performed in accordance with the requirements of the contract, and further work was ordered to be done within a fixed time. It was so done. Appellants' contention is that, because of the failure to complete it to the satisfaction of the council within the original period covered by the contract and its legal extensions, it was never fully performed within the meaning of the law, and the assessments are therefore void. This matter is fully disposed of against appellants' contention in Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 62 Pac. 500. In like manner appellants' argument that a demand could not be properly made by the contractor, Mr. Mulherron, because he had made an assignment, is answered by Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 240, that the property owners are not concerned over this matter. The method followed by the street superintendent in making the assessment in this case is that approved in Creed v. McCombs, 146 Cal. 449, 80 Pac. 679. The uncontradicted facts stipulated show that the old assessment, diagram, and warrant were properly reissued by the superintendent of streets.

[10] Certain provisions in the specifications, it is contended, render the contract invalid. Thus the contractor was required "to dig all stake holes and preserve all stakes for the lines, levels, or measurements of the work in their proper places, until authorized to remove them by the city engineer." This, it is contended, was an onerous provision, giving room for the play of oppression upon the one hand and favoritism upon the other; that an unfriendly city engineer could thus unduly burden and oppress the contractor in his work. A like provision is found, declaring that the contractor shall not disturb any monuments or stakes until ordered to do so by the engineer. Another is that all loss or damage arising from any unforeseen obstruction or difficulty which may be encountered in the prosecution of the work, or from the action of the elements, shall be sustained by the contractor. It is said that these specifications come within the condemnation of Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 664, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213; Grant v. Barber, 135 Cal. 188, 67 Pac. 127; Wollacott v. Meekin, 151 Cal. 701, 91 Pac. 612; Stansbury v. Poindexter, 154 Cal. 709, 99 Pac. 182, 129 Am. St. Rep. 190, and True v. Fox, 155 Cal. 534, 102 Pac. 263. No good purpose would be subserved by an elaborate analysis of these cases. The earlier tendency toward a rigid strictness in these matters which has found expression in some of the cases, such as Blochman v. Spreckels, supra, has been much relaxed by later decisions, and wisely so, because it became apparent that a strict enforcement of the street law to its very letter often resulted in depriving street contractors who had honestly performed their work of their just compensation. The inevitable result was that subsequent contracts would not be undertaken by such contractors, owing to the hazard arising from such strict construction, excepting at largely increased prices, and in consequence, while in an individual case a property owner might through some technicality escape paying what he should in equity have paid, property owners generally would be compelled to pay excessive prices because of the imminent peril of total loss which confronted contractors. So we may say generally that no reason appears, or is shown, why the inhibition against removing stakes and monuments, without the consent of the city engineer, is unduly oppressive. There is the presumption that this officer will perform his duty. There is reason for such provision, in that the engineer and street superintendent may have an opportunity to see that the work is properly done to grade. For the other objections touching the burden cast upon the contractor to bear the loss due to the nature of the work and the action of the elements, it is sufficient to refer to Gay v. Engebretsen, 158 Cal. 23, 109 Pac. 876, 139 Am. St. Rep. 67, McQuiddy v. Worswick Paving Co., 160 Cal. 11, 116 Pac. 67, and Haughwout v. Raymond, 148 Cal. 311, 83 Pac. 53, where similar, and, in some instances, the precise, specifications are upheld. The objection that the city engineer is given discretion is answered by the case of McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 209, 103 Pac. 924, where this court points out that after the exercise of the engineer's discretion the work must still be inspected and approved by the street superintendent. The description in the assessment was sufficient; the assessment being in this respect similar to that in Hewes v. Reis, 40 Cal. 261, and the objection to this assessment being answered by what is said in that case.

[11] In September disaffected property owners appealed to the board of trustees against an acceptance of the work, alleging improper and faulty construction. This appeal was sustained, and the street contractor was ordered to do additional, definite, and specified work in accordance with the contract. This the contractor did, and in December the street superintendent and an expert inspector reported to the board that the work had been fully completed in accordance with the contract and specifications, and recommended an acceptance of the work. Following this the board took action, finally accepting the street. Thereafter disaffected property owners filed a second appeal, which at first the board of trustees showed a disposition to hear. Later, the board advised by its attorney that it had no authority to consider this subsequent appeal, it was formally overruled and disallowed. Section 11 of the Vrooman Act contemplates just such an appeal as was taken by the disaffected property owners in September. Their appeal went to the character of the work, and the board of trustees, in sustaining their appeal, ordered that the work be completed in accordance with the contract. This was done, and thereafter, upon due report made to the trustees that it had been done, they finally accepted the work and the street. Section 11 of the Vrooman Act itself declares that:

"All the decisions and determinations of said city council * * * shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal."

The law nowhere contemplates successive appeals, and the general principle is that, where special jurisdiction of this character is conferred upon a board or tribunal, when it has once finally exercised that jurisdiction, all further powers over the matter are at an end. Belser v. Hoffschneider, 104 Cal. 461, 38 Pac. 312. Appellants therefore have no just complaint over the refusal of the board of trustees to entertain their second appeal.

The foregoing disposes of all of the matters arising under the objections of appellants to the admission of evidence. It appears herefrom that their objections were properly overruled.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., et al. v. ENTERPRISE CANAL & LAND CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 19, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1202—ORDER FOR NEW TRIAL—EFFECT—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Though entry of judgment pursuant to mandate of the Supreme Court on appeal from a judgment was subsequent to an order granting motion for new trial pending the appeal from the judgment, the order vacated both judgments, and when affirmed on appeal the trial court could try the case anew.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐138—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION.

A title by prescription cannot be acquired against a tract of riparian land by diverting the water from the stream at a point below the land and not interfering with the stream at the riparian land.

3. DEDICATION ⇐38—PUBLIC USE—EFFECT.

Where one has suffered property belonging to him and under his control to be taken and devoted to a public use by one engaged in administering such use, and the beneficiaries rely on the continuance of the use, the owner, having knowledge thereof and making no objection or protest, will be deemed to have dedicated the property to the public use, and he cannot subsequently interrupt nor prevent the same, but his remedy is to seek compensation for the property he has allowed to be taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78; Dec. Dig. ⇐38.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐79—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DIVERSION FOR PUBLIC USE.

Though a right of action does not exist in favor of an upper riparian owner against one diverting water from the stream below his land, yet in case of a diversion for public use the upper proprietor is chargeable with knowledge of the fact that the people below may rely on his disuse and expect a continuance thereof, and is chargeable with knowledge that, except where the water is abundant, a subsequent taking by him for use on his own land will deprive the others thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 70, 71; Dec. Dig. ⇐79.]

5. EVIDENCE ⇐8—JUDICIAL NOTICE—FACTS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

The court will take judicial notice of the operation of the law of gravity as to the flow of water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

6. ESTOPPEL ⇐93—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—PUBLIC USE.

Plaintiffs diverted water from a river into a canal and devoted the same to public use for more than 20 years. In reliance on the continuance of the water supply, towns and villages grew up, and hundreds of irrigated farms were established in the district supplied by the canal. A riparian owner knew the facts, but gave no warning of any objection to the use of the water and suffered it to continue. He could have prevented any interference with the flow of the water to his land. Held, that plaintiffs could continue the diversion of the water for public use, and the riparian owner could not interfere with that use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 264-275; Dec. Dig. ¶93.]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶79—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DEDICATION TO PUBLIC USE.

Where a riparian proprietor has, by acquiescence in the public use of the water of a river by another riparian proprietor, dedicated to that use the riparian rights pertaining to his land to the extent required therefor, neither he nor his successor can regain those rights by going up the river above the place of diversion for the public use and there diverting water.

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶79—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—PUBLIC USE—STIPULATIONS.

A canal company took water from a stream into a canal, and it and other riparian owners stipulated that the canal company had, for five years immediately preceding the commencement of an action to determine water rights, continuously diverted into its canal and appropriated a specified quantity of water, that all of the water during all of the time was sold, rented, supplied, and distributed to others, including a part thereof to the company, for purposes of irrigation, watering of stock, and domestic and other beneficial purposes and that beneficial use was made of all the water so appropriated. Many thousands of acres of land, occupied by a large number of persons as owners or tenants, were irrigated with water from the canal, and there were growing crops on the lands. Villages had grown up along the canal, and the inhabitants received water for their lands and for domestic use. Held, that the use was a public use.

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶79—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

As against a lower riparian proprietor, an upper riparian proprietor may go above his land and the land of intervening owners to divert water for a riparian use, provided he does so without interference with the rights of the lower riparian proprietor.

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶44—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—RIGHT OF IRRIGATION.

The right of irrigation is a part of a riparian owner's rights in the use of water, and an upper riparian proprietor, by virtue of his superior location, may not use all of the water for that purpose to the destruction of the rights of riparian proprietors below to use their due proportion of the water for the same purpose.

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶40—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

A riparian proprietor's title to water in a stream begins only when it reaches his land, and lasts only so long as it is flowing past his land, and until it reaches his land he has no right other than the protective right to see that the full flow past his land, to which he is entitled, is not illegally diminished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. ¶40.]

12. COURTS ¶93—STARE DECISIS.

Decisions defining the rights of riparian proprietors are a rule of property and will not be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 336-339; Dec. Dig. ¶93.]

13. ESTOPPEL ¶93—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DIVERSION OF WATER.

A riparian proprietor may not, over the objection of an upper proprietor, divert the water of the stream above the latter's land.

14. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶87—DIVERSION—ACTIONS—COSTS—PREVAILING PARTY.

A riparian proprietor, recovering judgment against another riparian proprietor diverting water above his land and the intervening land of the former proprietor, is entitled to his costs in the trial court under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 77-81, 83, 89, 90; Dec. Dig. ¶87.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and another against the Enterprise Canal & Land Company and others, to determine water rights. From a judgment establishing water rights and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Order denying new trial affirmed, judgment modified, and cause remanded.

J. P. Langhorne, of San Francisco, Frank H. Short, of Fresno, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for appellants. N. C. Caldwell and W. C. Graves, both of San Francisco, and J. M. O'Brien, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs have appealed from certain parts of the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] This action was begun in 1890 by the predecessors in interest of the present plaintiffs. Judgment was entered against the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff canal company, it appealed therefrom, and on appeal the cause was on February 12, 1904, remanded by the Supreme Court with directions to the lower court to enter a certain judgment in favor of said plaintiff. Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal Co., 142 Cal. 208, 75 Pac. 770, 100 Am. St. Rep. 115. On March 28, 1904, the lower court entered judgment in accordance with the aforesaid mandate. Pending this appeal the defendants had instituted a motion for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to support the decision, and the lower court had, on June 27, 1902, ordered a new trial accordingly. From this order an appeal had been taken and on January 3, 1905, the order granting the new trial was affirmed by this court. Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal Co., 145 Cal. 652, 79 Pac. 439. Although the entry of the judgment in pursuance of the mandate of this court was in point of time subsequent to the order granting the new trial, nevertheless that order, in effect, vacated and set aside that judgment, as well as the original judgment which was the subject of the former appeal. As a result, the order granting a new trial set the entire case at large and gave the lower court authority to try the whole case anew. 1 Hayne on New Trial, §§ 2, 167; San Jose Bank of Sav. v. Bank of Madera, 121 Cal. 545, 54 Pac. 85; Knowles v. Thompson, 133 Cal. 247, 65 Pac. 468; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325; Naglee v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 10; Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 Pac. 527. There was a new trial of the cause, resulting in the judgment now under review.

The original plaintiffs were corporations, named, respectively, Miller & Lux and the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company. The names of the present plaintiffs are the same, except that the word "Incorporated" is added to each name. Since the action was begun, the defendant, James Canal Company, has succeeded to the interests of the Enterprise Canal & Land Company, and the J. G. James Company has succeeded to the interest of Jefferson G. James. Substitutions of parties have been made in accordance with these changes in interest.

To an understanding of the issues a statement of the facts is necessary. Many of the facts are set forth in the cases within cited, and others in the case of Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 99 Pac. 520, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823. The hydrographical and geographical situation presented by this case is exceptional, if not unique. The San Joaquin river, having its source in the snowclad mountains of the Sierras, flows westerly on to the level plain or valley bearing its name. At a point near the center of the valley it makes an abrupt turn northerly. At this point, and immediately below the turn, plaintiffs have for many years maintained a dam to check the flow and impound the waters of the river. On the left or westerly bank of the river, and immediately in line with the center of the stream in that part of its course above where it makes the turn northerly, is the headgate or intake of a large canal belonging to the plaintiff canal company, through which for many years it has diverted the waters of the river for useful purposes. A short distance above this headgate, and in line with the course of the river as it flows northerly from its turn and on the left or southwesterly bank of the stream, is the junction of the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough. Fresno slough is a well-defined channel extending southerly from its junction with the river for some 12 or 14 miles. During times of extreme high water the waters of Kings river flowing into the San Joaquin valley from the Sierras some 30 miles south of the San Joaquin, are carried northerly into Fresno slough and thence on down to the San Joaquin river. At such times, of course, Fresno slough is a channel of Kings river and the lands abutting upon it are riparian to Kings river. But at such times the San Joaquin river itself is carrying an abundance of water, the excess waters are not needed and are not used, and are rather a detriment than a benefit to the landowners. Such excess waters are not here in controversy. In all other stages of the San Joaquin river its waters find their way into and up Fresno slough and rise and fall, or stand there, at practically the same level as that of the San Joaquin river itself. It is at these times and under these conditions that the ownership and right of use of the waters of the San Joaquin and of Fresno slough become important. Fresno slough has no source of supply other than the San Joaquin river except a small portion of surface water flowing into it from its immediate watershed during ordinary rains and the occasional floods from Kings river. These surface waters, however, do not seem to have been considered important in the consideration of the case and may be dismissed without further remark. The necessary effect of these conditions is that, except during the unusual floods from Kings river, and except said surface waters, the waters of Fresno slough remain stationary or rise and fall precisely as do the waters of the San Joaquin river; the waters of the slough being absolutely governed and controlled thereby. The lands of the J. G. James Company, the rights pertaining to which give rise to this litigation, are not riparian to the San Joaquin river proper, but are riparian to Fresno slough. By virtue of that fact they are also riparian to the San Joaquin river itself, except when the waters of Kings river are flowing therein. Turner v. James Canal Co., supra. The plaintiffs are owners of large tracts of riparian land situated both above and below the connection of Fresno slough with the San Joaquin river, and are appropriators of large quantities of water, in part taken out by means of said canal and devoted to beneficial uses upon the lands of persons to whom said water is sold, and in part by other canals and sloughs and used upon their own lands. The J. G. James Company asserted the right to go above the intake of the said canal and above the riparian lands of the plaintiffs, Miller & Lux, abutting on the eastern bank of the main river above the junction of the slough, and by a canal, owned by the James Canal Company, to take water away from the main stream and to carry it to and use it upon the lands of the James Company riparian to Fresno slough. The plaintiffs contested this right. They insisted that even if there were riparian rights pertaining to the lands of the James Company by reason of their situation upon Fresno slough, such rights could be exercised only by taking water from the slough itself, in subordination to the rights of the plaintiff canal company, and to the riparian rights of the plaintiffs' land situated above the junction of the slough and the river. The court below awarded to the James Company the right to take out of the San Joaquin river at the head of the James Canal Company's canal, above the land of the plaintiffs, and carry through said canal to the James Company's land, the reasonable quantity of water to which said land was entitled by reason of its situation as land riparian to Fresno slough, and declared that this right was superior to the rights of the intervening lands of the plaintiffs, and also to the right of the plaintiff canal company, to take water out of the river through its said canal. It is this claim which constitutes the gravamen of these appeals.

The principal contention of the appellants regarding the canal is that, by means of their dam below the northerly turn of the San Joaquin river and said canal heading near the junction of the river and Fresno slough, the plaintiff canal company has diverted from the river and put to beneficial uses a stream of 760 second feet of water, for a period of time sufficient to give it a prescriptive title or right to continue such diversion, and that this right is superior to any riparian right pertaining to the lands of the J. G. James Company abutting on Fresno slough. That said plaintiff has acquired such prescriptive right or title against all persons as to whom the said diversion has been hostile and adverse is shown by abundant evidence, and is practically conceded. See Stevinson v. San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co., 162 Cal. 141, 121 Pac. 398, where this right was established against a lower riparian proprietor. The claim of the defendant J. G. James Company is that the diversion of water by the plaintiffs' canal and dam has not interfered with the riparian rights pertaining to its lands abutting upon Fresno slough, and hence that it has not been hostile or adverse to those rights, and therefore that it has not created a title against them by prescription. The court below sustained this claim of said defendant. In support thereof in finding 44, it declared as follows:

"From time immemorial all of the water flowing from the said San Joaquin river into said Fresno slough has been accustomed to naturally flow, and does now naturally flow, from said river into said slough, and over, upon, along, and by the lands of the defendant J. G. James Company, in these findings before particularly described, and out of said slough into said river, at a point on the course of said river above the point on said river where said main canal of said plaintiff commences and has its place of diversion. And the construction, maintenance, and operation of said main canal does not now impede or prevent, and never has impeded or prevented, the natural flow of any water from said San Joaquin river into the said Fresno slough."

The main canal here referred to is the canal of the plaintiffs above mentioned, heading into the San Joaquin river immediately below its junction with Fresno slough.

The theory of the court below was, and that of the defendants is, that, so far as said canal is concerned, the owners of lands on Fresno slough are upper riparian proprietors not affected by the lower diversion and use of the waters of the stream, and, pursuant to this theory, in finding 46 it further said: "The taking and diversion of such water, either out of said slough, or out of the main channel of the said San Joaquin river," when the river is flowing into the slough, "does not cause and will not cause * * * any damage to plaintiff, * * * or to either of them."

The question thus presented relates only to the waters of the San Joaquin river. It does not relate to the waters of Kings river or to the surface waters above mentioned when such waters flow northerly through the slough into the San Joaquin river, and no controversy over the right of the J. G. James Company to a reasonable share of such waters appears to exist.

It should be further noted that the rights claimed by Miller & Lux to receive water from said canal for use on its lands are derived through and depend upon the title of the coplaintiff to the canal and water and need not be separately considered. The plaintiff canal company is the sole owner of the canal and of the right to divert water therein.

[2] Under the established law of riparian rights, a title by prescription cannot be acquired against a tract of riparian land by diverting the water from the stream at a point below such land, and not interfering with the stream at the riparian land. Thus it is said in Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 141, 58 Pac. 444 (77 Am. St. Rep. 158):

"The lower appropriator invades no right of the upper riparian proprietor. The latter has no right of action to prevent such use, for he is in no wise injured, and the former should not be permitted to acquire a right in this manner which the latter is powerless to prevent."

See, also, Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 78, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 310, 10 Am. Rep. 299; Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 183, 22 Pac. 76. Under this rule, assuming that the land of the James Company is riparian land situated above the point of plaintiffs' diversion, without further qualifying conditions or circumstances, the claim of a prescriptive right against the James company cannot be sustained.

[3] Recognizing the force of this rule, the appellants make the further claim that the water taken into the canal is devoted to public use, and that the defendants cannot now prevent such use, but are confined to a claim for damages estimated by the value of their riparian rights. It appears from the findings that said canal is 75 miles long, and that a large part of the water taken into it has been for many years carried down and applied to the public uses of supplying several farming neighborhoods with water for irrigation and five or six towns or villages along its course with water for domestic use. It further appears from the evidence that Jefferson G. James, who, up to the time the action was begun, was the owner of the James lands, was at all times fully aware of the fact that this water was taken for public use and was so applied, and also of the method and place of diversion from the river. It does not appear that he ever made any objection to such diversion or use until this action was begun. Upon these facts, the plaintiff canal company contends that the interests of the public have intervened so as to prevent the James Company from asserting a right to take and use on its land the waters of Fresno slough, if such taking will interrupt or destroy the said public uses, and that said defendant, as against said public uses, cannot take the water, but can only sue for compensation for its riparian rights thus appropriated by the public.

The general doctrine thus invoked is well established in this state. It has been applied and defined in the following cases: Fresno, etc., Co. v. S. P. Co., 135 Cal. 202, 67 Pac. 773; Southern C. Ry. Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 342, 71 Pac. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 58; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 136, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 Pac. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940; Newport v. Temescal W. Co., 149 Cal. 531, 87 Pac. 372, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 160 Cal. 709, 117 Pac. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185; Burr v. Maclay, etc., Co., 160 Cal. 280, 116 Pac. 715. These cases for the most part relate to public uses which involved a physical entry upon the land of the private owner, or an actual invasion of property rights belonging to him. It is now insisted that the reasons upon which it is founded justify and demand the extension of the rule to cases of an upper riparian owner who, without using the water himself on his riparian land, has knowingly stood by while the water has been diverted from the stream after it had passed his land, and applied to a public use in quantities inconsistent with the use by him of the water of the stream on his own land. It is also claimed that, even if the rule cannot go to this extent, yet that, under the circumstances of this case, it should be applied to the defendants and should debar them from other remedy than an action for damages.

The importance of these questions demands a careful examination of the decisions on the subject to ascertain the principles and reasons upon which they rest. The cases of Fresno, etc., Co. v. S. P. Co. and Sou. C. R. Co. v. Slauson, supra, each involved the use of a right of way over a parcel of land, the road having been built thereon either by agreement with, or with the consent and acquiescence of, the landowner. Speaking of the right to sue in ejectment, the court, in the Fresno Case, says:

"A failure to bring an action, where the right exists, until after public interests have intervened, will prevent its successful prosecution. Acquiescence for a considerable period after the railroad company has entered upon its duties will defeat the action to recover possession."

In the Slauson Case, on the same subject, it is said: "A railroad is, in a sense, a public highway," and if the owner of the land consents to its use for a railroad, and it is thereupon so used, this "is a dedication of the same to a public use," the operation of the road thereafter is in the interests of the public, "and cannot be interrupted by an action to recover possession of any part thereof in the interest of a private party." In Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, supra, the land in question was used as a right of way for the extension of an irrigating canal for four years, without any objection by the owners and with their tacit consent. Speaking of the effect of the extension of the canal upon the community enjoying the use of water therefrom, the court said:

"The establishment of such a community with the improvements and expenditures necessarily involved was one of the results of the acquiescence of Poyser and Johns in the extension and increased efficiency of the canal. They may have had a right to demand and receive a reasonable compensation for any damage to their lands caused by such extension. But they had no right to abate the canal by action, and no right to injure or destroy it."

In Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra, speaking of the right of one owner of land underlaid by water-bearing strata to enjoin another from pumping out the water for the irrigation of lands outside the water-bearing area, the court says:

"Where the complainant has stood by while the development was made for public use, and has suffered it to proceed at large expense to successful operation, having reasonable cause to believe it would affect his own water supply, the injunction should be refused. * * *"

The same question arose in Newport v. Temescal, etc., Co., supra, and Barton v. Riverside, supra. Newport sued to enjoin the pumping of water from a tract of land situated some five or six miles from his own land, such water being carried away and applied to public use outside of the watershed. This had continued for three years with his knowledge and without objection by him. The court stated the rule in these words:

"Where the interests of the public are involved and the court can arrive in terms of money at the loss which plaintiff has sustained, an absolute injunction should not be granted, but an injunction conditional merely upon the failure of the defendant to make good the damage which results from its work. Such an action, if successful, should be regarded in its nature as the reverse of an action in condemnation. The defendant in effect would be held to be damaging private property without just compensation first made to the owner, and, failing to make such compensation, should be enjoined from further damage."

In the Barton Case the court bases the rule upon the facts that the landowner knew, or had reason to believe, that the water tended to exhaust the landowner's supply; that it was being used outside of the common basin by a community which had established itself there in reliance upon that supply; that it was being used there in reliance upon that supply; and that the owners had stood by for nine years without complaint or protest. These two cases referred to the taking of percolating waters from water-bearing strata common to lands of both plaintiff and defendant, which injured the plaintiff, by drawing the water from under his own land.

A similar condition existed in the case of Burr v. Maclay, supra. The court there said that the rule "has for its basis chiefly the inconvenience to the public if the service is interrupted by the issuing of an injunction to restrain the use."

The question was more thoroughly considered in Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., supra, than in any previous case. Under a franchise from the board of supervisors the defendant had built and maintained a power line over lands of plaintiff which he had dedicated to the public solely for use as a public highway. The power line was erected without his permission, but with his knowledge and without objection from him. It did not interfere with any use he was making of his land or of the highway, but the court held that it constituted an additional servitude and was an invasion of his property right in the soil. Referring to the cases above cited, the court said that the principle upon which the right to maintain ejectment was denied in such cases was—

"that as public interests had intervened through the construction and operation of these public agencies before the actions in those cases were commenced, any right of the parties to disturb them in their possession of the property was thereby lost, and only an action to recover compensation for the land taken could be available. In principle there can be no difference, as far as the application of the rule of public policy is concerned, whether the entry is by the original consent of the owner, or he permits it to be made and attempts to assert no right until after the public interests have intervened. * * * The principle which underlies this rule is not based upon any considerations of rights pertaining to the public service corporation itself, but solely upon considerations of public policy. * * * This rule is not based so much on the application of the doctrine of estoppel, under which an owner of land, who remains inactive and permits a public service corporation * * * to enter upon his land without right and expend large sums of money in constructing and building the work, will be deemed to have acquiesced in the entrance, so that all remedies save one for compensation will be denied him. It is based mainly on the great principle of public policy under which the rights of the citizen are sometimes abridged in the interests of the public welfare. * * * Public policy requires that, under such circumstances, the remedy of ejectment should be denied to plaintiff, when the effect of a judgment in such an action would be to destroy the efficiency of the electric line system," by taking possession of part of it, "and thus destroying the public rights which have intervened."

583, 15 N. E. 446. In that action the owner of land had knowingly permitted the railroad to build its main line over his land and to operate the same for many years, so that the use by the public had become fixed therein. The court said:

"This principle does not rest upon the right of the railroad corporation so much as upon considerations of public policy. The rights of citizens are often abridged in order that the public welfare may be promoted. Chief among the fundamental maxims of jurisprudence is that which declares 'that regard be had to the public welfare as the highest law,' and this maxim underlies the rule we have under discussion. * * * It goes far enough with us to supply ample ground for denying one who has slept upon his rights a right to dispossess a railroad company charged with a service public in its nature, and important to the social and commercial interests of the country. Compensation he may recover, possession he cannot."

And again:

"All these interests, and more, combine in demanding that a citizen, who has stood by until after the completion of a line of road has involved public interests, shall not be allowed to sever the line and destroy its efficiency by wresting possession of part of it from the company. The case does not stand upon the ordinary doctrine of estoppel. The great principle of public policy enters as an important factor and controls the judgment of the court. Nor is there any great hardship upon the landowner in yielding to its dominion. Ample remedies are open to him. He may demand and secure full compensation. He may do more, for he may invoke the strong arm of the courts, but, to do this with success, he must move before public interests are involved. If he remains inactive, better that he suffer, if some one must suffer, than the community. But he need not suffer, for compensation, if seasonably asked, will always be awarded him, although possession will be denied."

And, further, referring to the argument that the defendant was a married woman, under the disability of coverture, so that her action in ejectment was not barred, the court denied this claim and said:

"In cases of condemnation and dedication, as shown by the authorities (citing Indianapolis v. Kingsbury, 101 Ind. 219 [51 Am. Rep. 749]), the ordinary rules do not apply. Certainly this must be so where public policy controls, for no one can do what public policy demands shall not be done. Once it is granted that the public welfare demands that a line of railway shall not be severed by a possessory action, it must inevitably follow that the disability of coverture will not avail, since the rights of the public are paramount to all others. No one can do what public policy forbids. Coverture may prevent the running of the statute of limitations in jurisdictions where it is recognized as a disability; in ours it is doubtful whether it can do so much, but surely, it may not, in any jurisdiction, prevail against a rule of public policy."

There are many cases in other states declaring the same reasons for the rule. McAulay v. Western, etc., Co., 33 Vt. 321, 73 Am. Dec. 627; Mitchell v. New Orleans, etc., Co., 41 La. Ann. 368, 6 South. 522; Bourdier v. Morgan, etc., Co., 35 La. Ann. 947; Reichert v. Railway Co., 51 Ark. 500, 11 S. W. 696, 5 L. R. A. 183; Hanlin v. Chicago, etc., Co., 61 Wis. 530, 21 N. W. 623; Goodin v. Cincinnati, 18 Ohio St. 169, 98 Am. Dec. 95; Roberts

v. Northern P. R. R. Co., 158 U. S. 11, 15 Sup. Ct. 756, 39 L. Ed. 873; Northern P. R. R. Co. v. Smith, 171 U. S. 271, 18 Sup. Ct. 794, 43 L. Ed. 157; Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Murray, 87 Fed. 651, 31 C. C. A. 183; Saunders v. Memphis, etc., Co., 101 Tenn. 206, 47 S. W. 155; Buckwalter v. Atchison, etc., Co., 64 Kan. 403, 67 Pac. 831; Holloway v. Louisville, etc., Co., 92 Ky. 244, 17 S. W. 572; Provolt v. Chicago, etc., Co., 57 Mo. 262; Chicago, etc., Co. v. Englehart, 57 Neb. 447, 77 N. W. 1092; Omaha, etc., Co. v. Redick, 16 Neb. 313, 20 N. W. 309; Kakeldy v. Columbia, etc., Co., 37 Wash. 680, 80 Pac. 205. Upon similar reasons it is held that a part of the right of way of a railroad cannot be severed from the remainder of the public franchise and sold on execution against the railroad company, or for local taxation, unless it is expressly authorized by statute. Southern C. R. Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 84, 79 Pac. 586, 82 Pac. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583.

In substance, the doctrine established by these decisions, though not, strictly speaking, the doctrine of prescription, at least amounts to this: That where a person has suffered property belonging to him and under his control to be taken and devoted to a public use by one engaged in administering such use, and the matter has gone on so far that the beneficiaries thereof rely on its continuance and adjust their affairs accordingly, such owner having knowledge thereof and making no objection or protest, this conduct will be regarded by the courts as a dedication by such owner of the property to the particular public use, and he cannot thereafter interrupt nor prevent the same, his only remedy being to seek compensation for the property he has thus allowed to be taken, or as indicated in the Newport Case, supra. Upon this statement of the doctrine we proceed to examine into the circumstances of the case.

It is to be observed that in all of the above cases the public use involved an interference with the property rights of a private owner sufficient to give such owner an immediate right of action to abate or prevent the same. In the Gurnsey Case, the power line in the public road did not interfere with any private use which the owner desired to make of the land constituting the road, but it was an appropriation of the soil in which he owned the fee to uses to which he had not originally dedicated it.

[4] In the percolating water cases, the pumps would draw water from under the plaintiff's land and lower the water level thereunder. This, in effect, was a direct invasion of the plaintiff's rights which he might have enjoined by suit as soon as the injury was threatened. Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra. This right in the owner to enjoin the public use before it had become established appears to have constituted an important factor in the statement of the doctrine in all of the above cases. This right of action, as we have seen, does not exist in favor of an upper riparian owner against one who diverts water from the stream at a point below his land. It is true that, in case of a diversion for public use, such upper proprietor must be supposed to take cognizance of the fact that the people below may rely on his disuse, expect a continuance thereof, take the water which he has allowed to pass, and adjust their affairs to that condition, as if possessed of a permanent right. He must also know that, except where the water is abundant, a subsequent taking thereof by him for use upon his own land will deprive the public of it, and that the consequences of such deprivation will usually be exceedingly grave. These questions present serious practical difficulties, and, as we think that the circumstances of this case place the defendants in a different situation from that of an ordinary upper riparian owner, we prefer to express no opinion concerning the application of the doctrine to such owners in general, but confine our decision to the particular case shown by the evidence herein.

[5, 6] There is no direct evidence to support the finding that the operation of the plaintiffs' main canal does not impede or prevent the natural flow of water from the San Joaquin river into Fresno slough, or the finding that the taking of water out of such slough by the James Company will not cause any damage to plaintiffs. The evidence on the subject is merely to the effect that when from any cause the level of the water in the river is higher than the level of the water in the slough, the water will flow from the river into the slough, and that when the conditions are the opposite, the water will flow from the slough into the river. No evidence was necessary to prove either of these propositions. They are the necessary result of the operation of the natural law of gravity, the level of the river and slough being practically the same, and judicial notice would be taken thereof. It was also shown that the effect of the dam placed in the river by the plaintiff canal company, when kept at its usual height, was to raise the water of the river above its natural level and force it back up the river about three-quarters of a mile, and also to back the water up the slough and along by the land of the James Company to a distance of 10 miles above the dam. The findings mentioned are really conclusions which the court deduced from these facts. The facts do not justify the conclusion. The force of gravity must, of necessity, control the action of water under given circumstances. The case is not like unto that of a stream permitted to pass the land of a riparian owner. On the contrary, the dam stops it in its course and forces it back a long distance up the stream and up the slough until it reaches approximately the level maintained at the dam. In this way the dam impounds the water designed to be taken, and it is the water so impounded that the plaintiff canal company has taken. The space at the common junction of the river, the slough and the canal is nearly square and about 600 feet each way across. This space, with that between the banks of the river and slough, respectively, as far up as the backwater extends, form a reservoir which the plaintiff has made and used for the purpose of diverting this water thereby, as one part of its system. This reservoir is partly upon the land of the James Company and extends for a distance of several miles up the slough over its land. This use of the James land for the purposes of plaintiff's canal was continued for many years with his knowledge and without objection. It must be conceded that these operations of said canal company have and do materially interfere with and change the natural flow of the water in the river and in the slough in its course through the James land. If the flashboards be placed in the dam so as to raise the water of the river above its natural level, the headgate of the canal being closed, the water will, of course, back up into the slough, forcing more water into it than it would receive by the normal action of the stream. If, then, the headgate be opened, it will relieve the back pressure and the slough will receive less. If the dam is maintained so as to allow all the natural flow to pass down the river without raising its level, some water will pass into the slough to replace natural evaporation and seepage and, if the river is then rising, to fill the slough to the level of the river. At such times, if the headgate is opened it will take a large quantity of water from the river at the junction, lower its level accordingly, and cause less water to flow into the slough. Measuring around what may be called the perimeter of the junction, the headgate may be as much as 300 feet from the mouth of the slough, but it is not so far away, the lines of the banks and the rate of flow of the stream being considered, that the taking out thereat of a flow of 760 second feet would not lower the surface level at the mouth of the slough. Such a flow is no insignificant stream, being the equivalent of a stream 200 feet wide and 3.8 feet deep moving at the rate of 1 foot per second. When from any cause the water runs out of the slough into the river, the headgate of the canal is, with respect to that current, below the James lands. But when the water runs from the river into the slough, it is, with respect to that current, above the James lands, and it is so near to the course of the current from the river into the slough that the diversion of 760 second feet through the headgate must of necessity draw water from that current and diminish the quantity passing into the slough. When the water at the junction is stationary, it is similar to a lake or pond, and the diversion of so large a quantity into the headgate must lower the level of the entire body and draw water both from the slough and the river. Duckworth v.

Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 528, 89 Pac. 338; Turner v. James Canal Co., supra, 155 Cal. 91, 99 Pac. 520, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823. These consequences would be more plainly apparent if the James Company should actually take water out of the slough and use it on its lands. This would at once start a current from the river into the slough to replace the water so taken. This current would pass very near the headgate of the canal. The opening of the headgate at such times would inevitably divert into the canal water that would otherwise pass into the slough. This would be the result alike when water stands at the natural river level, and when it is backed up the slough by the dam. The two uses, if made simultaneously, would necessarily be inconsistent and antagonistic. For these reasons, the finding cannot be true that the natural flow of the water from the river into the slough is not and never has been impeded by the operation of said canal.

Likewise, the statement that the taking of water out of the slough by James to be used upon his lands would not damage the plaintiff, cannot be true, except upon the hypothesis that the plaintiff has no right to the water. In that case it would suffer no legal damage, but actual damage must of necessity ensue. If the plaintiff has a right thus to take the water, such diversion by the defendant would cause it legal damage.

These conditions have been maintained by the plaintiff canal company at all ordinary stages of the river, for more than 25 years before this action was begun. In reliance upon the continuance of this water supply, towns and villages have grown up, and hundreds of irrigated farms have been established in the district supplied by said plaintiff's canal. With all these circumstances James was familiar, and he gave no warning of any objection to such use, but suffered it to continue. His land along the slough was used by the canal company as a part of its reservoir in which to collect the water for distribution. By that means the water has been taken all these years, with his knowledge and tacit consent. To permit him or his successor now to take out the water therein stored for diversion by said canal company would, in effect, permit him to destroy or seriously impair and injure the water system of which his property has constituted an important part and in the establishment of which he has acquiesced. Every consideration of regard for the general welfare and public good, so much emphasized in the decisions above mentioned, applies with the greatest force to the conditions here shown. He was not, as in the case of an upper riparian owner, powerless to interfere with the use of the water. He could have maintained an action to prevent the backing up of the water on his land to form the reservoir and force the water into the canal and to prevent any interference with the flow into the slough. The doctrine is applicable to him and to the James Company as his successor.

Therefore the plaintiff canal company is entitled to continue its diversion for public use as it has heretofore done, and the J. G. James Company cannot be allowed to interfere with that use. The part of the judgment which declares that the J. G. James Company may, when the water of the river is flowing into Fresno slough, take the same and use it on its riparian land along the slough, regardless of the effect of such taking to diminish the flow into said plaintiff's canal to an amount less than 760 second feet, is, to that extent, erroneous. The defendants cannot be allowed to divert the water so as to cause such diminution, or so as to prevent that quantity from flowing into said canal.

[7] What has been said with respect to the taking of water from Fresno slough by the J. G. James Company for the irrigation of its land applies also to the taking of water for the same purpose from the San Joaquin river through the Enterprise canal, now maintained by the James Canal Company. As Jefferson G. James, by his acquiescence in the public use of the water by the plaintiff canal company has, in effect, dedicated to that public use the riparian rights pertaining to the James land, to the extent required therefor, he, or his successor, cannot be allowed to regain those rights by the expedient of going up the river and there diverting the water to the same riparian land through the Enterprise canal. If the James Canal Company be regarded as a mere appropriator of water from the stream above the plaintiff's dam, its diversion is, on well-settled principles, unlawful as against the plaintiff's prior appropriation below, so far as it is injurious thereto.

[8] The respondents question the proposition that the plaintiff canal company is devoting the water it takes into its canal to public use. The parties stipulated in writing, for the purposes of the trial, that the said canal company had, for the five years immediately preceding the commencement of the action, continuously diverted into its canal and appropriated the 760 second feet of water in controversy, and that:

"All of said water during all of said time was sold, rented, supplied and distributed to others, including a part thereof to the plaintiff, Miller & Lux, for purposes of irrigation, the watering of stock and domestic and other beneficial uses, and that beneficial use was made of said water so appropriated, and all thereof."

This was incorporated into and made part of the findings of the court. The court also found that many thousands of acres of land, occupied by a large number of persons as owners or tenants, were irrigated with water from said canal, and that they had thereon many thousands acres of growing crops of grain, fruits, and other crops. The evidence shows that there were many hundreds of such persons. And, as before stated, a number of villages have grown up along the canals, the inhabitants of which receive water therefrom for their lands and for domestic use. The use described in the stipulation, and the facts disclosed by the uncontradicted evidence, show that the water was devoted by the canal company to public use. There is no merit in the contention to the contrary. It may be that some of it has been disposed of to Miller & Lux at rates more advantageous than to others, but that is an abuse which the proper public authorities may prevent or regulate; it does not convert the use into a private use.

[9] Upon a former hearing of this case an opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Henshaw was rendered by the court in bank in pursuance of which the judgment was modified in certain particulars. This opinion embraced all of the points involved in the case. A rehearing was granted by the court, solely for the purpose of again considering the questions relating to the public use of waters taken by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated; upon which we have now reached the conclusions heretofore stated. The portions of the opinion relating to the other matters presented by the appeals were and are satisfactory to the court, and we now adopt the same as the opinion of the court upon this hearing. They are as follows:

Entirely different are the questions presented by the second branch of this appeal. The James Company was not alone awarded the right to the use of a reasonable quantum of water from Fresno slough, but was given the further right to divert this water from the San Joaquin river proper, the point of diversion being, by the meanderings of the river, some 20 miles above the junction of Fresno slough with the San Joaquin river, and something more than 10 miles above in a direct line. There was thus accorded the right to the James Company to go above their lands and above the lands of intervening owners to divert water for riparian use. That this may be done when it may be done without interference with the rights of the lower riparian proprietors, that is to say, lower than the land upon which the water is to be used, has been decided and is not questioned. Turner v. James, supra. But it is contended that the permission thus awarded the James Land Company here works an illegal and unwarranted interference with the plaintiffs as intervening riparian proprietors, as well as an interference with their rights to water through the canal. Before entering upon this consideration something more needs to be said of the geographical conditions. The court decreed that this reasonable quantity could be diverted through the Enterprise canal, now controlled by the James Canal Company. Between the intake of the Enterprise canal to the east and the junction of Fresno slough with the San Joaquin river to the west, a distance of some 20 miles by the meanderings of the river, plaintiff Miller & Lux owns large tracts of riparian land on the northerly bank of the stream. Three sloughs, originally natural channels of the San Joaquin, take out of the river and cut through these northerly riparian lands. The first of these and nearest to the head of the Enterprise canal is Aliso slough. It formerly took water out of the river only at high stages, but it has been deepened and improved so that it is now able to and does take water out at lower stages. Two or three miles below the head of Aliso slough is Brown slough, also a natural water channel and taking water out of the river under about the same conditions as does Aliso slough. A few miles below the head of Brown slough the channel known as Lone Willow slough leaves the San Joaquin. Into Lone Willow slough flow Aliso slough and Brown slough. Lone Willow slough carries these commingled waters until it returns them to the main channel of the San Joaquin some 13 miles below Fresno slough. It is asserted by appellants, but it is against the findings, that Lone Willow slough carries water at all stages of the San Joaquin, the amount being about 10 per cent. of the total flow of the river. The waters of each of these sloughs are controlled by weirs or gates and conducted by canals and ditches to the irrigation of lands. Two canals have been constructed leading out of Lone Willow slough. The Chowchilla canal diverts water in a northerly direction to the lands of plaintiff and to the distant nonriparian lands of others. The Columbia canal diverts water out of the slough for purposes of irrigation, and for many miles conducts this water along or near the bank of the San Joaquin river, distributing it over the riparian land of plaintiffs.

The further findings declare that the three sloughs above described were originally "high water" sloughs, that is to say, that their beds were so far above the bed of the San Joaquin river at their junctions therewith that they originally received water from the San Joaquin river only during periods of high water and at only such times as Fresno slough was carrying the waters of Kings river into the San Joaquin; that these sloughs, more than 10 years ago, were by plaintiffs and others "developed, improved, cut down, enlarged, and the course and direction thereof changed, and their natural condition changed, and the flow of water therein so regulated, controlled, increased, and diminished by artificial means and all of the water flowing therein conducted to and upon the lands, in, over, and upon which said sloughs did not naturally run and take their course, whereby the said Brown slough, Aliso slough and Lone Willow slough ceased to be natural sloughs and natural water courses, and the land, in, over, and upon which said sloughs naturally ran, ceased to be riparian lands bordering upon said San Joaquin river, or any branch, water course or channel thereof, and said sloughs are not now, and for more than 10 years before the commencement of this action have not been, natural branches of water courses of the San Joaquin river." The findings proceed to declare that Miller & Lux have for more than 10 years used these sloughs in their changed and artificial condition, taking water from the San Joaquin river to irrigate lands which they own that never bordered the sloughs while the sloughs were in their natural condition, and to irrigate and supply with water lands not bordering upon the San Joaquin river, and to supply water for stock, domestic, and other purposes. But it is further found that the taking and the use of these waters through these sloughs "has never prevented and does not now prevent the flow of water from said San Joaquin river into said Fresno slough, and over, along, and upon the lands of the defendant J. G. James Company"; and the waters of the San Joaquin river "continued to flow and do now flow into the said Fresno slough and fill the same as the same were accustomed to do before the taking and diversion of any water from the river through the sloughs." The purport of these findings is, of course, that these sloughs which naturally took water from the river at its high stages have, by artificial means, been converted from their character of natural water courses into the character of irrigation ditches or canals, but that neither in their natural state nor in their changed artificial condition did or do they prevent the natural flow of the San Joaquin river into Fresno slough. True, if, by their changed condition, they were enabled to take and did take more water out of the San Joaquin than when they were in their natural state this would have a direct tendency to reduce at such times the amount of water which would flow from the San Joaquin into Fresno slough. But it is further found that before and after this change of character in the sloughs the San Joaquin river always continued to flow and to fill Fresno slough in its accustomed manner. The court finds that the defendant James Company has been diverting, and has the right to divert, to its lands through the Enterprise canal a reasonable quantity of water, and that this water can be and is and may in the future be so diverted without injury to any of the lands of plaintiff.

Appellants insist that under the common-law doctrine of riparian rights, as that doctrine is expounded, not alone by the common-law courts and the courts of sister states, but as accepted and declared by the decisions of this state, this may not be done, for that it is well settled that each riparian proprietor is entitled to the full flow of the stream, saving as that flow is reduced by the reasonable use of reasonable quantities of water by upper riparian proprietors, and, second, that the right to such flow is a property right of great value. Respondent answers that it recognizes that the common-law doctrine accepted in sister states is as appellants declare, but that this court has over and over asserted (as it has) that it would not be bound by that doctrine where it was found unsuited to our radically different conditions and needs; that the use of water for irrigation is so highly necessary a use as to demand a modification of the common-law doctrine and the declaration that the lower riparian proprietor may go above an intervening riparian proprietor and take water for use upon his lower lands; provided he can do so without substantial injury to the intervening proprietor; that whether or not substantial injury results is a question of fact to be determined in each case by its circumstances, and that in this case the findings of the court, fully supported, declare that the taking could be made without injury. To this appellants make reply that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to conceive of a case where this could be done without injury, that is to say, without an impairment or destruction of a right of property which has by this court repeatedly been declared to rest with the upper riparian proprietor by virtue of the situation of his lands and his right to the uninterrupted flow of the stream. But that even if a case could be imagined where such a diversion could be made without injury, this is not such a case, and the findings so declaring are without support.

With this epitome of the diverse contentions of the parties, we may the better proceed to a consideration of the matter. And, first, it is to be remembered that we are here dealing with the correlative rights of riparian proprietors in the matter of irrigation.

[10] Since the leading case of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 256, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, the right of irrigation has been declared to be a part of the riparian owner's rights in the use of water. In many respects, too, definitions and limitations have been put upon the right to use water for irrigation. Thus an upper riparian proprietor, by virtue of his superior location, is not entitled to use all of the water for that purpose to the destruction of the rights of riparian proprietors below to use their due proportion of the water for the same purpose. Thus it is said: "The common-law rule, as interpreted in this country, is that the right to the waters of the stream, with certain exceptions not material here, belongs to the riparian proprietors in common and equally, and may be exercised by each as the necessities of the situation may require only so as not to infringe upon the equal rights of the others." Charnock v. Higuerra, 111 Cal. 473, 44 Pac. 171, 32 L. R. A. 190, 52 Am. St. Rep. 195. And again it is said: "It is accordingly well settled here that each riparian owner has a right to a reasonable use of the water on his riparian land for the irrigation thereof, and that the so-called common-law right of each to have the stream flow by his land without diminution is subject to the common right of all to a reasonable share of the water." Turner v. James Canal Co., supra. And so in such cases as Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 681, 29 Pac. 325, and Wiggins v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 190, 45 Pac. 160, 32 L. R. A. 667, 54 Am. St. Rep. 337, instead of dividing the flow of the stream in portions, the full flow was apportioned amongst the riparian owners during specified periods of time; and in Rose v. Mesmer, 142 Cal. 322, 75 Pac. 905, it is said: "A riparian owner may, for the more convenient use of the water on his riparian land, go upon the land of another farther up the stream, with the consent of such landowner, and there divert the water for use upon land below, or he may raise it to the surface of his land by pumps or other artificial means. In either case his act in so doing is not necessarily different from the exercise of his right as a riparian owner, and such a diversion above his land may or may not be considered as an attempt to make an appropriation of the water independent of the riparian right, according to the circumstances that appear with respect to the particular case." Of the language of our opinions, which respondent insists favors its contention, these are the strongest and are for that reason quoted. But in no one of them, it will be noted, is there any declaration that a lower riparian proprietor may so go above an upper riparian proprietor and take water without his consent.

In Charnock v. Higuerra the exercise of the common and equal right of the riparian proprietors to take and use the water is carefully limited by the declaration that it must be done "so as not to infringe upon the equal rights of others." In Turner v. James Canal Co., supra, the lands of the objecting riparian owner were entirely below the James lands upon which it was proposed to use the water. In Rose v. Mesmer the right of the lower riparian proprietors to go above his lands to take water is put under the limitation that it be done with the consent of the upper proprietors. Therefore it is certain that there is no declaration by this court that a lower riparian proprietor may so take his water as matter of right, and in truth the decisions are otherwise.

[11] It is to be remembered that a riparian proprietor's title to the water begins only when it reaches his land and lasts only so long as it is flowing past his land. Until it reaches his land he has no title whatsoever, and no right other than the protective right to see that the full flow past his land to which he is entitled is not illegally diminished. Thus it has been said: "Neither a riparian proprietor nor an appropriator has title or ownership in the water of the stream before it reaches his land or point of diversion respectively. This has been expressly decided with respect to appropriators. Parks C. & M. Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 46; Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 89 Cal. 410, 26 Pac. 889; McGuire v. Brown, 106 Cal. 660, 39 Pac. 1060, 30 L. R. A. 384. The same rule applies to a riparian owner." Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., 150 Cal. 520, 89 Pac. 338. Moreover it is to be noted that as to an upper riparian proprietor the effect of a diversion above him is the same whether it be said that the diversion is but a mere appropriation or whether it be said that the diversion is to place and use the water upon lower riparian lands. That an appropriator could not so take the water is not disputed. The riparian proprietor, as we shall see, would not even be called upon to prove the direct damage. He would be protected against such a taking because such a taking is an impairment and destruction of his right of property in the water, which right of property, as has been frequently said, is the right to its full flow past his land. Thus, as early as 1886, in the case of Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249, 16 Pac. 900, objection was made by a lower riparian proprietor to the unwarranted use of the water by an upper riparian proprietor, in that the upper riparian proprietor did not permit the surplus waters to return to the stream, and this court in bank there declared: "By the common law of England, the right of the riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream is inseparably annexed to the soil, and passes with it, not as an easement or appurtenance, but as part and parcel of it. Use does not create the right, and disuse cannot destroy nor suspend it. The right of such proprietor extends to the natural and usual flow of all the water of the stream, unless when the quantity has been diminished as a consequence of the reasonable use or appropriation of it by other riparian owners for proper and legitimate purposes. * * * Nor is the owner lower down the stream required to show, in order to procure an injunction, any actual present damage." In Heilbron v. Water Ditch Co., 75 Cal. 117, 17 Pac. 65, in an action to restrain a diversion, it is said: "And it seems clear, upon principle and authority, that the diversion of natural water from land is 'an injury done to the inheritance.' The flow of natural water over land is a continuous source of fertility and benefit; and its withdrawal is followed by consequences which are perpetually injurious to the freehold. * * * The flow of the water of a stream, whether it overflows the banks or not, naturally irrigates and moistens the ground to a great and unknown extent, and thus stimulates vegetation; and the growth and decay of vegetation add, not only to the fertility, but to the very substance and quantity of the soil." In Southern California, etc., Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 68, 77 Pac. 767, the action was to quiet title to the waters of a certain stream. Both plaintiff and defendant were riparian owners, the plaintiff being the inferior riparian proprietor. Defendant was taking waters beyond the watershed of the creek, which were thus lost to plaintiffs' lands, precisely as here; respondents seek to take waters which from time immemorial have flowed past plaintiffs' lands and to carry them around and below them. In speaking of such attempt the court said: "As such riparian owner, it has the right to have the stream continue to flow through its lands in the accustomed manner, and to use the same to irrigate an additional area thereof, undiminished by any additional or more injurious use or diversion of the water upon the stream above. This right is a part of the estate of the plaintiff—parcel of its land,—and whether it is or is not as valuable in a monetary point of view, or as beneficial to the community in general, as would be the use of a like quantity of water in some other place, it cannot be taken by the defendants without right, or, in case of a public use elsewhere, without compensation. It is not necessary in such cases for the plaintiff to show damages, in order that it may be entitled to a judgment. It is enough if it appears that the continuance of the acts of the defendants will deprive it of a right of property, a valuable part of its estate." Again, in Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, where the contention was made that the riparian lands of plaintiff were not injured by an upper diversion, and that he must show injury to enjoin such diversion, the rule and doctrine of the cases previously cited are, after a review of all of them, strongly reaffirmed. And, finally, in the case of Shurtleff v. Kehrer, 163 Cal. 24, 124 Pac. 724, it is declared: "The diversion of water of the stream is an injury to the freehold of the riparian owner and may be enjoined without a showing of other immediate monetary damages." Again, calling attention to the fact that the diversion of the lower riparian proprietor for use of the water upon his lands is, in its effects, no different from those which would result if the water were taken by a mere appropriator for any other purpose, the conclusion may not be avoided that this court from the first has declared that this may not be done and has in this respect affirmed and adopted the common-law doctrine that the riparian proprietor is entitled to the full flow of the stream, reduced only by the proper riparian uses which may be made of the water by proprietors above him. It has said that he may restrain such a taking without showing damage, upon the broad doctrine of riparian rights; that the taking itself is an interference with his freehold which he is entitled to restrain lest it ripen into a prescriptive right. And, finally, some of the reasons for the doctrine are set forth in the quotation of Heilbron v. Water Ditch Co., supra. And it may be added in this connection that the findings in this case declare: "And by such natural flow of the waters of said San Joaquin river, a large part of plaintiffs' lands have been naturally wet and irrigated and made fit for cultivation and pasture and have been supplied with water for stock and other agricultural purposes and for all other purposes for which owners of land bordering upon a running stream have the right to use the waters thereof, and the waters which have been diverted by the defendants in this action would, but for such diversion aforesaid, actually flow in and through the main channel of said San Joaquin river, along, by, through, over, and upon a large part of plaintiffs' lands in the complaint mentioned and herein found to be riparian to said San Joaquin river."

[12] Respondents, in yielding a reluctant acknowledgment of the force of these decisions, in effect, request that they be swept aside, and ask why "if a diversion made by a lower owner should defeat in part the natural irrigation of his upper neighbor's land, upon the policy of our laws, it should not be so." The answer is this: Many questions touching the use of waters arise in this state which were never known to the common law. As those questions arise they will be treated as cases of first impression and the common-law doctrine will or will not be followed as shall seem best for our changed conditions. San Joaquin, etc., Co. v. Fresno Flume Co., 158 Cal. 626, 112 Pac. 182, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 832. But this precise question in other forms has been frequently presented and as frequently determined. The rights of the riparian proprietor in this respect have often been defined, and his right to this uninterrupted flow of the full stream has been declared to be a valuable right and a part of his title to the soil, as at common law it was also declared. These decisions, therefore, have become and stand as a rule of property, and at this day to overthrow them would not only work a destruction of property rights, but would result in interminable confusion and litigation in the scrambling efforts of every riparian proprietor to go as far up the stream as possible to get water. The cases at common law, or where the common law was applied, which dealt with this question, were naturally not cases of irrigation. Generally speaking they arose over the diversions of water around an upper proprietor for power or mill purposes. Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288, 42 Am. Dec. 739; Kimberly Co. v. Hewitt, 75 Wis. 371, 14 N. W. 303; Shamleffer v. Peerless Mill Co., 18 Kan. 24. But in Miller v. Baker, 68 Wash. 19, 122 Pac. 604, the Supreme Court of Washington, in a case like this, involving rights of irrigation, announces the doctrine here declared.

lands, even under the findings made by the court, renders unnecessary any detailed consideration of those findings. In certain respects the findings are declared to be against evidence, as, for example, the finding that Lone Willow slough is a high-water slough. The evidence tending to show that Lone Willow slough was not a high-water slough, but that at all stages of the river drew water from the San Joaquin is pointed out, and respondents are challenged to produce evidence to the contrary. They do not accept the challenge nor point out such evidence, and it is not to be supposed that this court, under these circumstances, will itself study the record to determine whether or not there be such supporting evidence. Again, the tenor of the court's findings as to the three sloughs—Aliso, Brown, and Lone Willow—seems to be that because they were deepened, and because their waters were controlled by weirs or floodgates, and because some of their waters by ditches and canals were carried to lands not riparian to the sloughs, and therefore not riparian to the San Joaquin river, their whole character as natural water courses was changed, with the result that those lands which still lay along their natural channels ceased to be riparian, and those lands strictly riparian to the San Joaquin river, and which were supplied by its waters through the ditches and canals leading out of these sloughs, also ceased to be riparian in character. This of course could not be. Moreover, the deepening of the sloughs so that they could and did take water from the San Joaquin at lower stages than their natural state permitted did not change their character as natural water courses, nor can it be said that to control the water of such sloughs by dams, weirs, and floodgates can have the effect of destroying their natural character so as to render the lands fronting on them nonriparian. Logically, if this was so, the dam which plaintiffs have maintained for many years across the San Joaquin river would have the effect of destroying the riparian character of all the lands below. And finally upon this point it should be said the court's findings disclose that by these sloughs, superior in location to Fresno slough and thus to the James land, large quantities of water for many years have been taken and devoted to beneficial purposes; some to irrigation and domestic use on lands unquestionably riparian; others for like uses on land nonriparian either to the river proper or the slough. But this last use, open, notorious, and in interference with the flow of the river waters to Fresno slough and so to the James land, has given to these appropriators a prescriptive right to continue this use. The finding of the court that these sloughs in their natural state took water from the San Joaquin river only during the time when the Kings river was flowing into the San Joaquin river through the Fresno slough does not militate against this: First, because the deepening and improvements of the sloughs whereby they took water at very much lower stages of the river were made more than 10 years before the commencement of the action, and the use of the water under the changed conditions has ripened into a prescriptive right; and, second, because the finding itself is not supported by the evidence.

[14] Appellants were entitled to their costs in the trial court as of course against the Enterprise Canal & Land Company and the James Canal Company, since the action against them involves the title to real property. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5.

Our final conclusions upon these opinions are as follows: The J. G. James Company is entitled to take from Fresno slough its reasonable quantity of water for use upon its riparian land, except that such diversion and use must not interfere with the diversion by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, by means of its dam, headgates, and canals at and near the junction of the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough, from said river, of a stream of water equivalent to a flow of 760 cubic feet per second for public use. The right of said San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, to take said quantity of water from said river and devote the same to public use is paramount to the riparian rights of the J. G. James Company as owners of lands riparian to Fresno slough. The defendants are not entitled to divert water for said lands, or at all, through or by means of the Enterprise canal, or the James Company's canal, but may take the same only from Fresno slough.

The findings are full and complete and, with the exceptions stated, are sustained by the evidence. Those which are not are, according to the views which we have expressed as to the law, unimportant and may be disregarded. Those remaining are sufficient to support a judgment in harmony with our conclusions. We see no reason to believe that a retrial would or should produce essentially different findings of fact. A new trial is not necessary.

It is therefore ordered by the court that the order denying a new trial be affirmed, that the parts of the judgment appealed from be vacated and the cause remanded to the court below, which shall thereupon proceed to modify its judgment to make it conform to this opinion. Appellants to recover costs.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., et al. v. ENTERPRISE CANAL & LAND CO. et al. (S. F. 6085.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1913.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐78—DIVERSION OF WATER—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

A riparian proprietor may not divert water from the stream at times when more is carried than is actually put to economic use, where the diversion will injure the freehold of another riparian proprietor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and another against the Enterprise Canal & Land Company and others, to determine water rights. From a judgment establishing rights, defendant James Canal Company cross-appeals. Affirmed.

The opinion on rehearing (147 Pac. 567) on the appeal of plaintiffs, setting forth the issues involved, supersedes in part the original opinion on appeals of both parties, but without affecting the opinion on the cross-appeal of defendant James Canal Company, which is as follows:

HENSHAW, J. The foregoing discussion materially shortens the consideration of this appeal. The nature of it has been outlined. It is a request upon the part of the court to overthrow the decisions previously considered and the decisions of Miller & Lux v. Madera C. & I. Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391, and Miller v. Bay Cities Water Co., 157 Cal. 256, 107 Pac. 115, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772, and to decree that notwithstanding the injury to the freehold of the respondents worked by the diversion, the appellants may still divert waters from the San Joaquin river at times when more is carried than is actually put to economic use. This proposition does not present a question of first impression where the action of this court would be free. The proposition has been decided repeatedly against appellants' contention, and for the reasons given in the foregoing consideration those decisions must be adhered to and this appeal denied.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TURNER et al. v. EAST SIDE CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. (Sac. 2268.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐194 — REVIEW — PLEADINGS AND DENIALS.

Where complaint alleged illegal diversion of water of a stream, which the answer denied, which allegations of the answer by express operation of Code Civ. Proc. § 462, were deemed controverted so as to form an issue, and a cross-complaint merely restating the affirmative allegations of the answer was not denied, and the case was tried on the theory that the facts alleged in the cross-complaint were in issue, the objection that its allegations were admitted by failure to deny them could not be first urged on appeal.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐87 — DIVERSION — INJUNCTION — FINDING — CONTRADICTION.

A finding that the defendant had no right to divert any greater quantity than 281 second feet was not contradicted by finding that defendant had occasionally, since 1890, diverted 400 second feet, and at times when the flow was less than 400 and more than 281 second feet had diverted all the water, or by a finding that its diversion of 400 second feet was made uninterruptedly with plaintiffs' knowledge, and occasionally since 1890, since neither of the latter findings declared that the taking of more than 281 second feet was adverse, or under a claim of right, or was continuous.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐87—ACTION TO ENJOIN DIVERSION—FINDINGS AND JUDGMENT.

Findings that defendants had no right to divert more than 281 second feet; that it had not continuously since 1890 diverted 400 second feet, and when the flow was less, but more than 281 cubic feet, had diverted all; that the diversion of 400 second feet was uninterrupted and known to plaintiff, and was occasional since 1890; that the excess above 281 second feet was not beneficially used, because applied where it was not needed, or not used at all, and permitted to run to waste, were harmonious, and insufficient to sustain defendant's claim that it was entitled to judgment for water in excess of 281 second feet.

A prescriptive right to water to a stream cannot be obtained against a riparian owner, unless such use is adverse and under claim of right.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞143—ADVERSE USER—BENEFICIAL USE.

To establish a right to divert water from a river adverse to the right of a riparian owner, the water diverted must be actually and beneficially used continuously for five years; and the adverse user of 281 second feet and the occasional hostile diversion of all, when there was only 400 second feet or less flowing, did not entitle defendant to continue taking 400 second feet, when only 281 second feet was actually used.

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞138—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—ADVERSE USER—CLAIM OF USER—NOTICE OR APPROPRIATION—"BENEFICIAL USE."

A riparian owner has a vested right to the use of water before his appropriation begins, which cannot be divested by the mere assertion of another's intention to claim the water, nor by posting notices of appropriation or beginning work in pursuance thereof, nor by the actual diversion for less than five years, with a view to a future public use, if the water is not used in the meantime or not applied to a public and beneficial use; and the taking of the water for a canal and allowing it to run to waste in the expectation that customers would be found to use it at some future time was not such a present "beneficial use" of the water as would initiate the period of prescription.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action for an injunction by Elizabeth Turner, as administratrix of the estate of William C. Turner, and another, against the East Side Canal & Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, for appellant. George F. Buck, of Stockton, for respondent Thomas C. Turner. Frank H. Short, of Fresno, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for other respondents.

SHAW, J. The record presents an appeal by the defendant from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone. The same judgment roll was before the court heretofore upon an appeal by the plaintiffs from that part of the judgment declaring that the defendants were entitled to divert from the San Joaquin river 281 second feet of water. Turner v. East Side, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 103, 142 Pac. 69. Upon the appeal by the plaintiffs above referred to the part of the judgment appealed from was reversed, and the cause was remanded for a new trial to determine whether or not the defendant was entitled to divert from the river a flow of water exceeding 75 cubic feet per second, or second feet, as it may be called for brevity, and not exceeding 281 second feet. The order of remand left the judgment below standing, in so far as it adjudged that the defendant was not entitled to divert more than 281 second feet. The claim of the defendant here is that under the findings it is entitled to divert at least 400 second feet of water from the river.

[1] The defendant makes the preliminary claim that the allegations of the cross-complaint were not denied, and that upon these allegations, which, in contemplation of law, as it claims, stand admitted the defendant is entitled to a judgment declaring its right to take 500 second feet of water from the river. This contention cannot be sustained. The complaint, in substance, alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners of land riparian to the river and as such entitled to the benefit of its natural flow, that the defendant had the right to divert therefrom 75 second feet of its waters, and no more, but that it claimed the right to take 500 second feet of water, and that it threatened to do so. The answer denied the alleged limitation upon defendant's right to take said water, and averred that it had the right to divert 500 second feet of water from the river, and that whenever less than 500 second feet was flowing therein, defendant had the right to take it all. These allegations, by operation of law, were deemed controverted, and an issue was thereby formed. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. The cross-complaint merely restated the affirmative allegations of the answer. It presented no new issues. The defendant went to trial on the pleadings thus framed, and the findings of the court completely cover every fact presented by the cross-complaint. The failure to answer was a technicality wholly without effect, and in no wise prejudicial to defendant in the trial of the case. It does not appear that it was suggested to the lower court as a reason for demanding such judgment, no default was taken, and the findings conclusively show that the case was tried below upon the theory that all the facts stated in the cross-complaint had been put in issue. In such cases the objection that the allegations were admitted by a failure to deny the same cannot be successfully urged on appeal. Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 110, 103 Pac. 332.

[2-4] The defendant also urges that the judgment should be reversed because the findings are contradictory. We think they are harmonious, but as this question involves the facts upon which it is claimed that the judgment should have given the defendants a right to divert 400 second feet of water, it is proper to state it more elaborately. Finding No. 20 is as follows:

"The defendant has not, and never had, the right to divert from said San Joaquin river at any time, any greater quantity of water than 281 cubic feet per second."

The part of the findings claimed to be contradictory of this is a portion of finding 25 reading as follows:

"The defendant, not continuously, but occasionally, since the year 1890, has diverted from said San Joaquin river at the head of its said canal at said river 400 cubic feet per second of the water flowing in the said San Joaquin river at that place, and at times when less than 400 and more than 281 cubic feet of water per second was flowing in said river at said place, the said defendant diverted all the water then flowing in said San Joaquin river at said place."

Also a part of finding 26, which is as follows:

"The said diversion of said 400 cubic feet of water per second from said San Joaquin river was made openly, notoriously, peaceably, and uninterruptedly, with the full knowledge of said plaintiffs and their predecessors and grantors, and has been made occasionally ever since the said year 1890."

It will be observed that neither of these findings declare that the taking of the water in excess of 281 second feet was adverse to plaintiffs or that it was under a claim of right to do so, nor that it was diverted continuously. A prescriptive right to water from a stream cannot be obtained against a riparian owner unless such use is adverse and under claim of right. Without this element the finding cannot be considered as contradictory of the explicit statement in finding 20 that the defendant's right does not exceed 281 second feet. Furthermore, other parts of the findings show that the excess above 281 second feet was not beneficially used. Finding 25 proceeds to state that this excess was caused to run down the canal of defendant to distances unknown, and that no greater amount was intended to be used at the particular time than was necessary to irrigate the lands described as having been irrigated with said quantity of 281 second feet, and that "the application of any greater amount of water to said lands than 281 second feet would have been waste." As to the 281 second feet the court, in finding 26, found expressly that it was made openly, notoriously, exclusively, uninterruptedly, and adversely to plaintiffs, under a claim of right against plaintiffs and with plaintiffs' knowledge, ever since the year 1890, and the latter part of finding 27 states that all of the said 400 second feet "so diverted occasionally by defendant from said San Joaquin river could be beneficially applied to the irrigation" of lands along the canal, but that at such times, when all the water diverted was not used for irrigation, stock, and domestic purposes, "the quantity not so used was permitted by the defendant to escape from" the canal into natural channels, and was not thereafter reclaimed or used for any beneficial purpose. These statements of findings 25 and 27 show that the excess over 281 second feet was either applied where it was not needed and consequently not to beneficial use, or that it was not used at all and was permitted to run to waste from the canal. The taking of more than 281 second feet and applying all of it to land for which 281 second feet was sufficient would not constitute an application of the excess to beneficial use. Without such beneficial use of water diverted from a stream, no prescriptive right thereto can be acquired. California, etc., Co. v. Madera, etc., Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 Pac. 718. It is obvious from these considerations, therefore, that the findings are not only not contradictory, in effect, in this particular, but that they are not sufficient to sustain the claim of the defendant that it is entitled to judgment thereon declaring that it is entitled to water in excess of 281 second feet.

[5, 6] The defendant argues that as it appears from the findings that at the times when the 400 second feet was diverted the 281 second feet constituted a part of it, and that as the taking of 281 second feet was found to be adverse, it necessarily follows that the entire diversion was adverse because it constituted an entire and indistinguishable body of flowing water. The adverse character of the actual taking of the excess may be admitted for argument's sake, in the sense that it was hostile, but as there is no finding that the excess was devoted to a beneficial use, the defendant, as we have seen, cannot acquire a right to continue taking it by doing so for any period of time. For like reasons, the finding that when there was only 400 second feet flowing in the river, or less, the defendant has diverted it all does not give the defendant a right to continue taking that quantity, the reason being that only 281 second feet was at such times actually put to use. Furthermore, here again the period of taking is not specified, the finding stating merely that it was done "at times" when the flow was 400 second feet or less, but not stating that it was during all of such times. Findings must be construed so as to uphold a judgment rather than to require a reversal. There is a statement in finding 21 that the defendant "has claimed and now claims adversely to plaintiff" the right to divert 500 second feet of water from said river. A mere claim cannot establish a prescription. The finding does not state that this water was actually used, nor that it continued five years, nor that it was uninterrupted for that period.

[7] There is no merit in the argument that when a person appropriates water to a public use he not only begins his adverse possession of the water he actually takes and puts to such use, but that he also at once institutes an effectual adverse claim to all that he in good faith intends to take or use in the future. The taking of water into a canal and allowing it to run to waste in the expectation that customers may be found who will use it at some future time does not constitute a present beneficial use of the wasted water, so as to initiate the period of prescription therefor. As to other appropriators under the Code, the law may give the first appropriator a reasonable time for delivery of the water to those for whose use it was intended, but if this be so, which we do not say, no such rule applies to a riparian owner. Such owner has a present vested right before the appropriation begins, and his right cannot be divested by the mere assertion of an intention to claim the water, nor by posting notices of appropriation or beginning work in pursuance thereof, nor even by the actual diversion for less than five years, with a view to a future public use, if the water is in the meantime wasted, or not applied to public or beneficial use.

With respect to the excess over 281 second feet, the findings lay no foundation for the application of the doctrine of acquiescence in public use, recently announced in Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal Co., 147 Pac. 567 (S. F. No. 6061), decided February 19, 1915, for that excess, so far as appears, has not been devoted to public use nor to any useful purpose whatever.

We find no other points requiring discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

DONNELLY v. DONNELLY. (Civ. 1535.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 17, 1915.)

A denial to defendant of the privilege of introducing tendered evidence is not available on appeal by plaintiff as reversible error.

2. DIVORCE ⇐27 — GRIEVOUS MENTAL SUFFERING—EVIDENCE.

Whether there has been inflicted grievous mental suffering justifying a divorce is a question of fact deducible from the circumstances of the particular case, keeping in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 27, 62-83; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Martha Donnelly against Henry M. Donnelly. From a judgment denying plaintiff a divorce, she appeals. Affirmed.

Trask, Norton & Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a decree of court denying her a divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Aside from physical acts of cruelty set forth therein, the complaint alleged the use by defendant of language towards plaintiff and accusations made against her which, if so used and made, might have caused her grievous mental suffering to an extent constituting extreme cruelty towards plaintiff. The court, however, upon conflicting evidence, made finding, upon which no attack is made, to the effect that the allegations were untrue.

[1] Appellant complains that the court ruled that no inquiry could be made as to acts of the defendant and occurrences prior to a certain date. In support of this contention we are referred only to rulings made by the court wherein it denied defendant the privilege of introducing certain evidence tendered. Thus limiting the cross-examination upon defendant's inquiry was not a ruling, even if erroneous, which could be attacked on appeal by plaintiff as constituting reversible error. Moreover, our attention is not directed to any adverse ruling to the plaintiff made by the court to which she interposed objection.

The act of physical cruelty alleged was an assault and battery committed by defendant upon plaintiff. The evidence clearly tended to prove this allegation, but the court, it appears, was satisfied that the assault, as shown by defendant's testimony, was technical, rather than real.

[2] The married life of the parties appears to have been accompanied with much bickering and mutual fault-finding, and it may be conceded that defendant made accusations against his wife, using language that if applied in some cases would have caused grievous mental suffering to a degree that should be deemed extreme cruelty. But "there is no scale by which to gauge the purely mental susceptibilities and sufferings of another. * * * Whether in any given case there has been inflicted this 'grievous mental suffering' is a pure question of fact, to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party; and no arbitrary rule of law as to what particular probative facts shall exist in order to justify a finding of the ultimate facts of its existence can be given." Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660. The trial judge had the parties before him, and, thus having the opportunity of judging of the degree of intelligence, refinement, and delicacy of feeling possessed by plaintiff, concluded that the course of conduct of defendant towards plaintiff and any accusations of a want of chastity made against her, so far as established upon a conflict of testimony adduced, were not such in this case as to cause grievous mental suffering to an extent that would constitute extreme cruelty.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Green Nance against C. P. Avenall. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

M. B. Harris and E. M. Harris, both of Fresno, for appellant. Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to recover from defendant money paid him by plaintiff on a contract for the purchase and sale of certain land.

In April, 1911, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract for the sale to plaintiff by defendant of 20 acres of land, known as lot 9 in a larger tract, in Fresno county, for the price of $6,500, to be paid $500 down, $2,000 on the 1st day of January, 1912, and $4,000 in five years, to be secured by a mortgage on the premises. The $500 was paid, and the contract with a deed from the owner were, as agreed, placed in escrow in the First National Bank of Fowler, where these documents remained until this suit was brought. Plaintiff did not take possession of the property at any time. On the 18th day of January, 1912, a draft of $750 was received from the plaintiff by the said bank, but it was returned to plaintiff because not complying with the escrow. On January 15, 1912, William Flack (who now held the legal title) entered into a contract, which was recorded, for the sale of a tract, which included lot 9, to A. K. and John K. Kazanjian. It did not refer to plaintiff's contract, but the Kazanjians testified that before signing their contract they were told by defendant of plaintiff's contract, and that, if the defendant came back and wanted the 20 acres, he was to have it, and they were to have a credit of $6,500 on their contract price, to which they orally consented.

Without paying or tendering the amount due under the contract, the plaintiff commenced this suit for the recovery of the $500 paid defendant as hereinbefore stated.

The findings of the lower court followed substantially the allegations of the complaint, and were against the defendant on the theory that the plaintiff had fully performed his part of the contract, that defendant had rescinded the contract, and refused to return the $500 or execute a deed. Judgment went for plaintiff for the recovery of the $500 paid, and the appeal is by defendant from that judgment.

[1] Of course, under the facts just narrated, the contract to sell the property in controversy to the Kazanjians did not amount to a rescission by the defendant of the contract here under consideration, for the reason that there was no intention on the part of the defendant to rescind, as is shown by the above-mentioned arrangement made by him with the subsequent vendees.

[2] It plainly appears without conflict that the plaintiff failed to make the second payment as required by his written agreement; that the defendant performed all the contract required of him up to the time of the plaintiff's default; and that, not repudiating the contract but insisting upon the performance of its terms, he was warranted in retaining the installment of the purchase money paid, and to consider plaintiff's rights in the land terminated. The authorities abundantly sustain this position.

Where the purchaser without cause refuses to perform his contract, or is in default in making a payment thereunder, he is in no position to recover an installment which he has already paid. Accordingly, in such a case, if the vendor is not in default no recovery can be had; and especially is this true where the contract provides, as the one here does, that upon default of the purchaser he shall forfeit payments previously made by him, and that the same may be retained by the vendor, although it has been held in this state that such a provision is unnecessary and wholly immaterial. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; 39 Cyc. 2005, 2025; Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007; Leach v. Rowley, 138 Cal. 709, 72 Pac. 403.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by E. D. Williams against C. H. Tingey, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover from the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety upon the bond of C. H. Tingey, given as contractor for the doing of certain street work in the city of San Diego. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, adopting the alternative method, the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals.

The bond was given by C. H. Tingey, to whom the contract for doing the work was let by the city, and, after reciting that the obligors, namely, Tingey, as principal, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety, were bound unto all persons performing labor or furnishing materials to be used in the work called for by said contract, contained a provision to the effect that, if the principal therein, said Tingey, failed to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the work, or for any labor done thereon, said United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety thereon, would pay the same to an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond.

Tingey, as contractor, sublet a part of the work to one Rubendahl, to whom plaintiff furnished certain materials used in the performance of the work, and, payment not being made therefor, he, within 30 days from the completion of the work, filed with the street superintendent a verified statement of his claim and nonpayment thereof, as required by the act.

Notwithstanding the fact that the appeal is had pursuant to the alternative method, in which case, as provided by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, the parties are required to print in their briefs such portions of the record to which they desire to call the court's attention, appellant fails to direct our attention to anything in the record in support of its claim for a reversal.

[1, 2] Without merit is the contention that, as a condition of maintaining the suit, plaintiff should first have sued the subcontractor, and established therein that the materials were actually used in the work. This fact was one of the controverted issues, and the allegation of the complaint to the effect that they were so used was found to be true. The fact that Rubendahl, the subcontractor, was not made a party defendant to the action, could not affect appellant's right to plead and prove any defense which it was entitled to make, and, it appearing that the materials were furnished to be used in the performance of the work, and were so used, plaintiff was entitled to judgment in accordance with the condition of the bond; and hence Ruben-dahl was not a necessary party defendant. People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 35, 68 Pac. 576; French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92.

[3] It is further urged that no facts are found showing that Tingey was personally liable to plaintiff. The action was not to recover by reason of any personal liability of Tingey, but to recover upon the obligation of the bond.

The findings clearly support the judgment, and, upon this record, since our attention is not directed to anything to the contrary, we must assume that the evidence justifies the findings.

Judgment affirmed.

et al. (Civ. 1643.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTOR'S BOND — LIABILITY OF SURETY — AMOUNT.

A surety on a municipal contractor's bond, which required it to pay for materials furnished to the contractor to be used in the work, is liable for the value, not the selling price, of such materials furnished to a subcontractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Panama Commercial Company against C. H. Tingey and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant. Morganstern, McGee, Henning & Hendee, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The facts in this case are identical with those in the case of Williams v. Tingey et al. (Civil No. 1625), 147 Pac. 584, an opinion in which was this day filed affirming the judgment. Plaintiff obtained judgment, from which defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals.

The only point made herein by appellant, other than those presented in the other case, is that the action was to recover on the bond the value of the materials furnished, and it appeared in the course of the trial that the materials were furnished pursuant to a contract made with one Rubendahl, subcontractor under Tingey. The action was to recover upon the covenant contained in the bond to the effect that defendant Tingey and appellant would pay for the materials used in the performance of the work. While the price specified in the contract would be the measure of recovery in an action thereon against Rubendahl, with whom the contract was made, nevertheless, as against defendants, in an action on the bond the measure of recovery as against them was the value of the materials, which appears to have been as specified in the contract under which the materials were furnished to Rubendahl.

The judgment is affirmed.

(plaintiff's husband), and in favor of one of the defendants, and by virtue of an execution on such judgment, entered upon such land, and, without plaintiff's consent, wrongfully took such personal property from her possession, and still held the possession thereof, and that plaintiff was not obligated on such judgment or any part thereof, and did not owe it or any part thereof, and was not a party interested in the action against the husband, was not uncertain and ambiguous, but alleged in plain and clear language facts showing that defendants wrongfully took from plaintiff's possession certain of her sole and separate property, and wrongfully retained and refused to redeliver it to her; the failure to allege her ownership and right of possession when the action was commenced having been cured by the answer.

5. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ☞100 — LIABILITY FOR ACTS OF DEPUTIES.

Where a deputy sheriff, in seizing and taking property from plaintiff's possession under an execution, was assisting his principal, the sheriff, in the execution of his official duty respecting the writ, a judgment against him in claim and delivery was unwarranted; his acts being those of the sheriff himself.

6. JUDGMENT ☞19—PLEADINGS AND PROOF.

In an action in claim and delivery to recover property taken under execution on a judgment in favor of the R. Co., where, though the complaint connected R. and G. individually with the taking of the property by alleging that the sheriff delivered it to the R. Co., R., and G., there was no testimony supporting such allegation with respect to R. and G., or tending to connect them as individuals with the taking and detention of the property, and there was no finding respecting the delivery of the property by the sheriff, though the allegation of the complaint was put in issue by the answer, a judgment against R. and G. by without any support.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. ☞19.]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞1071 — HARMLESS ERROR — INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT IMMATERIAL FINDING.

In claim and delivery to recover property taken under execution, in which, as incidental or ancillary to the main relief, an injunction against a sale of the property was asked, where the judgment awarded plaintiff the specific property for which she sued, it was immaterial whether a finding that a sale would cause great and irreparable injury was supported by the evidence, as the injunction could do no more than the judgment itself did.

8. REPLEVIN ☞8 — RIGHT TO POSSESSION — NECESSITY.

To sustain replevin plaintiff must show that he is entitled to the possession of the property, though it is not essential that he should show that he ever had actual possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-68; Dec. Dig. ☞8.]

9. REPLEVIN ☞93 — FINDINGS — RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

In claim and delivery, where, though the court, following the averments of the complaint, found that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession when the action was commenced, the answer denied her ownership at any time or at all, and the court further found that the allegations of the complaint not inconsistent with the specific findings were true, and that the allegations of the answer inconsistent therewith were untrue, there was a sufficient finding that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property at the commencement of the action.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞1071 — HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO FIND.

In claim and delivery to recover property taken from plaintiff's possession under an execution against B., where the court explicitly found upon sufficient evidence that B. at no time owned or had any interest whatever, in the property, it was immaterial, so far as defendants were concerned, whether or not plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property when the action was commenced, and the failure to find such ownership and right to possession did not prejudice defendants.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞1071—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO FIND.

A judgment will not be reversed because of the failure to find on a particular issue, where the want of such finding is not prejudicial to defendant.

12. REPLEVIN ☞107—JUDGMENT—ALTERNATIVE JUDGMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 667, providing that in an action to recover the possession of personal property judgment for plaintiff may be for the possession or the value thereof in case a delivery cannot be had, and damages for the detention, where the possession of the specific property may be obtained or the property itself can be delivered to the party claiming it, as where the property seized under execution was left by the sheriff in plaintiff's physical possession as his representative, a failure to make the judgment alternative in form is not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action by Genevieve Beggs against John K. Smith, Sheriff, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

W. H. Early, of Petaluma, for appellants.
E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action in claim and delivery and, incidentally, for an injunction to prevent the defendants from selling or disposing of the personal property described in the complaint. The plaintiff was awarded judgment, restoring to her the possession of the property in dispute, and enjoining the defendants from "interfering with or selling or advertising for sale the said personal property or any part thereof." This appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is prosecuted by the defendants from said judgment.

The defendants Smith and Rasmussen are, respectively, sheriff of the county of Sonoma and constable of Petaluma township in said county.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was, on the 3d day of September, 1913, the owner and entitled to the possession of 1,200 laying hens, she having, previously to said date, "purchased the same with her separate funds and money from her separate estate"; that, at the time mentioned, said hens were "located on that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land commonly known as the 'Isaac Kuffel place,' * * * in Petaluma township, in Sonoma county," etc.; and that, on said day, the defendants, for the purpose of satisfying a judgment theretofore given and entered against one William P. Beggs and in favor of the defendant Rauer's Law & Collection Company, by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and by virtue of a writ of execution issued by the clerk of said court on said judgment, entered upon the lands and premises above referred to, and "without the plaintiff's consent, wrongfully took said above-described personal property from the possession of the plaintiff, and the defendants still withhold the possession thereof from the plaintiff." It is averred that the plaintiff "is not obligated on the said judgment or any part thereof, and does not owe said judgment or any part thereof, and was not a party interested in the said action between defendant, Rauer's Law & Collection Company, a corporation, and said William P. Beggs." It is further alleged that the defendant sheriff and the defendant constable, at the request and upon the direction of the other defendants, commenced, on the said 3d day of September, 1913, to advertise said personal property for sale, "and did proceed to sell the same, and will sell and dispose of the same to satisfy the alleged claim aforesaid of the said * * * collection company * * * against the said William P. Beggs unless restrained and prevented and enjoined from selling and disposing of the property by an order of this court."

The complaint declares that, after the personal property was so taken from her possession, the plaintiff demanded possession and redelivery of the same to her, but that the defendants refused to surrender or redeliver said property to her, and that ever since the defendants have retained, and still hold and retain, possession of the said personal property, "against the will, wishes, and consent of this plaintiff, and without any right so to do."

It is alleged that the said William P. Beggs did not, on the 3d day of September, 1913, or at any other time, have any interest in or ownership of said personal property or any part thereof, but that the plaintiff was at all times "heretofore and now" the sole owner of the same; that the plaintiff uses and employs said hens as the sole and only means whereby she has earned and does earn her livelihood; and that "the income derived therefrom is needed and necessary for the plaintiff to support and maintain herself in the conduct of her poultry business."

The plaintiff prays for the recovery of said personal property, and for an injunction preventing the defendants from in any manner interfering with or advertising it for sale or sale, or, in case a redelivery of the said property cannot be had, for a judgment for the sum of $1,200, the alleged value thereof, and $500 as damages for the wrongful taking and detention of the same.

A demurrer to the complaint upon both general and special grounds was overruled. The special grounds of the demurrer involve the objection that the complaint is uncertain and ambiguous in certain particulars pointed out therein.

The defendants Smith and Rasmussen, in a joint answer, defend by alleging that the property was seized by them, as sheriff and the latter's deputy, respectively, under the writ of execution above referred to; that said sheriff placed the plaintiff in charge of the property as the keeper thereof for him as such officer; that thereafter the plaintiff demanded the release of said property and the return of the same to her possession; that the sheriff thereupon notified the defendant collection company of said demand, and demanded from it indemnification as provided by section 699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that said company thereupon executed an indemnity bond in the sum of $1,400 in favor of said sheriff; that, upon so being indemnified, said sheriff at once took the necessary steps to sell said property, advertising it for sale under and by virtue of the power vested in him so to do by the said writ of execution.

The other defendants, joining in an answer for themselves, denied the material allegations of the complaint, and alleged that the plaintiff, at all times mentioned in the complaint, was and is the wife of William P. Beggs; that the latter and the plaintiff, at all of said times, "were and now are living together as husband and wife upon the property described in plaintiff's complaint as the 'Isaac Kuffel place'; that said defendants are informed and believe, and, basing this allegation upon that ground, allege the fact to be, that said personal property, to wit, 1,200 laying hens, were purchased as and for community property and for the benefit of said community, and that the same is community property of the said William P. Beggs, and that the same is liable for the debts of the said William P. Beggs, and that the said plaintiff has no right, title, or interest therein or thereto."

The first point in support of the appeal is that the court erred in its order overruling the demurrer.

[1] The complaint is, perhaps, wanting in the statement of a cause of action in claim and delivery, in that it does not appear to contain a direct averment, essential in a complaint in such an action, that the plaintiff was, at the time of the commencement of the action, the owner and entitled to the possession of the property sued for. The general demurrer, for this reason, should perhaps have been sustained. But the answer, we think, cured the defect thus pointed out in the complaint by its denial that the plaintiff was the owner of the property on the 3d day of September, 1913, or "at any other time or at all," whereby the plaintiff's ownership and the right to the possession of said property at the time the complaint was filed was made one of the issues submitted for trial.

[2] And, aside from the defect above mentioned, the complaint is not amenable to the criticism that it is uncertain and ambiguous. Treating the omission referred to as having been supplied by the denials or allegations of the answer, the complaint may then be said to contain, in orderly sequence, and in plain and clear language, a cohesive narration of facts from which it is to be readily inferred that the defendants wrongfully took from the possession of the plaintiff certain of her sole and separate personal property, that they still wrongfully retain and refuse to redeliver to her the possession of said property, and that they have taken the preliminary steps for the sale of the same to satisfy a judgment which in no way concerns or affects or has bound her to any obligation arising thereupon or therefrom.

[3] The injunctive relief asked for and which was allowed by the court was and is only incidental or ancillary to the main relief sought by the action; viz., to obtain the return of the specific property alleged to have been wrongfully seized.

Whether the complaint states sufficient facts to have authorized the granting of a temporary restraining order or an injunction pendente lite or any injunction whatever is a question which we regard as unnecessary to consider; for the judgment is an adjudication that the ownership of and the right to the possession of the property in dispute are in the plaintiff, and, if said judgment is supported by the findings, as undoubtedly it is, and they in turn are sustained by the evidence, the effect of the injunction, even if erroneously granted, has only been to facilitate the accomplishment of the primary object of the action; viz., the recovery by the plaintiff of the specific property to which she is justly and legally entitled. In other words, the temporary injunction merely had the effect of keeping the property intact and in a condition whereby its specific recovery was made certain in case the plaintiff established her ownership of the property and the right to its possession. As before stated, the injunction constituted a remedy only in aid of the primary purpose of the action, and, since it transpires that the plaintiff established her right to the property, the injunctions, both the temporary and permanent, assuming that they were improperly granted, in no respect prejudiced the rights of the defendants.

[4] It is next contended that the findings do not derive sufficient support from the evidence. An examination of the evidence has not led us to that conclusion.

The testimony shows that the judgment against William P. Beggs and to satisfy which the property in dispute was attached, was obtained by the defendant collection company in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco on a claim wholly incurred by Beggs some time before the fire and earthquake in said city in the year 1906. William P. Beggs testified that the plaintiff never at any time was indebted to the collection company, and was in no manner or measure concerned in or obligated upon the claim upon which said judgment was founded. He further testified that the personal property in dispute was purchased by the plaintiff with money which she had obtained from her father's estate, and that he did not contribute anything toward paying for the property. He also said that the "Kuffel place," on which the property was located at the time it was taken by the defendants, was leased, and the rent therefor paid by the plaintiff out of her separate funds, obtained from her father's estate. The lease to said land was, he said, in his name, but this was owing to the fact that the owner of the premises declined to give the plaintiff the lease, because he was opposed to doing business with a woman, and so he (Wm. P.), acting for his wife, took the lease in his name, she paying the rent. Beggs continued to say that he lost everything he had in the San Francisco fire of 1906; that thereafter his health became greatly impaired; and that he had since lived part of the time on his mother's ranch and part of the time with the plaintiff on the Kuffel place.

The plaintiff corroborated her husband in all the important particulars of his testimony. She, too, declared that the property described in her complaint was purchased by her with her own money, having received said money from the estate of her father, and that her husband, William P. Beggs, had no interest whatever in said property. She said that she gave her individual check, drawn on her separate funds in the Sonoma County National Bank, to the party from whom she purchased the hens, in payment therefor. This check was received in evidence.

George P. McNear, a witness called in behalf of the defendants, testified that he had had business relations with the plaintiff and her husband; that he loaned them money and sold them grain on credit; that the credit was extended to the plaintiff; that the book account was opened entirely on the credit of Mrs. Beggs (plaintiff); that "Mr. Beggs had failed in business before that time and had nothing." He further testified that the plaintiff had an interest in her father's estate, and "had been getting advances from the estate right along."

The foregoing brief summary of the testimony is quite sufficient to show that the findings that the plaintiff was not interested in or obligated by or upon the judgment in favor of the defendant collection company and against William P. Beggs, and that the property described in the complaint and upon which the sheriff levied the writ of execution belonged to plaintiff, are amply supported. It is conceded by the plaintiff, however, that neither the testimony nor the findings support the judgment as against the defendants Rasmussen, Rauer, and Graf.

[5] Rasmussen was merely shown to have been a deputy under the defendant sheriff at the time of the levy, and that whatever part he took in the seizing and taking the property from the possession of the plaintiff was only in assisting his principal in the execution of his official duty respecting the writ; in other words, the acts of Rasmussen in the execution of the writ were merely those of a deputy sheriff, and, as such, those of the sheriff himself. And the finding relative to Rasmussen's part in the transaction goes no farther than the testimony thereon, as indicated, and it is wholly insufficient to support any judgment against him.

[6] As to the defendants Rauer and Graf, it is to be remarked that the complaint connects them with the taking of the property by the allegation only that the sheriff, upon attaching or seizing the property under the writ, delivered it into the possession of the defendants collection company, Rauer, and Graf. But there is no testimony which supports that allegation, so far as are concerned Rauer and Graf. Indeed, there is no testimony connecting or tending to connect Rauer and Graf, as individuals, with the taking and detention of the property in dispute. And, although the answer of those defendants denies that the sheriff "delivered the said property into the possession of any of his codefendants," thus making a direct and material issue upon that proposition, the court failed to make any finding thereon as to the said defendants Rauer and Graf. The judgment as to them, therefore, is without any support.

[7] It is further objected that there is no evidence which supports the finding that, unless the defendants are restrained from selling the property distrained, as, according to the complaint, they have threatened to and will do, the plaintiff will, by reason of such sale, suffer great and irreparable injury. This objection, if tenable, cannot, for reasons heretofore given as to the effect of the injunction under the circumstances of this case, be of any practical or advantageous avail to the appellants. The plaintiff, by the judgment, is awarded the specific property for which she sued, and since, under the circumstances as shown here, the permanent injunction could do no more than the judgment itself could do, independently of the injunction, toward securing to her the actual possession of said property, it becomes immaterial whether it was granted or not, or, having been granted, whether upon an unsupported finding.

[8, 9] It is next claimed that there is no finding that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property at the time of the commencement of the action. It is undoubtedly the law that, to sustain an action in replevin, the plaintiff must show that he is entitled to the possession of the property, although it is not essential that he should show that he ever had actual possession of it. Wells on Replevin, § 91; Cobbey on Replevin, §§ 96, 100; Cardinell v. Bennett, 52 Cal. 476; Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750; Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 317, 51 Pac. 684.

In this case the findings follow the averments of the complaint, which, as seen, alleged that the plaintiff "is now, and on the 3d day of September, 1913, was, the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the following personal property," etc.; "that, on said 3d day of September, she was in the actual possession and control of said 1,200 laying hens," etc.; that said defendants Smith and Rasmussen, on said 3d day of September, wrongfully took said described property from the possession of the plaintiff, and said sheriff still wrongfully withholds the possession thereof from the plaintiff; that, ever since said date, said Smith and Rasmussen have kept and retained, and do keep and retain, possession of said property, "against the will, wishes, and consent of the plaintiff, and without any lawful right so to do; that said William P. Beggs did not, on the 3d day of September, 1913, or at any other time, have any right, title, interest, estate, lien, or claim in or to the said personal property, and each and every part thereof is now, and was on the 3d day of September, 1913, the separate property of the plaintiff; and that she was the sole owner of said personal property"—having purchased the same with her separate funds, etc.

Substantially, in the foregoing language, the court made its findings as to the plaintiff's ownership of and right of possession to said property, and, in addition thereto, made the following finding:

"That all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint not inconsistent with the foregoing findings are true; that all of the allegations of the answers on file herein inconsistent with the foregoing findings are untrue."

The defendants, as seen, denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the hens on the 3d day of September, 1913, or "at any other time or at all," and alleged that they constituted the community property of William P. Beggs and were liable for his debts.

Thus, as before stated, the question whether the plaintiff was the owner of the property at the date of the commencement of the action was put in issue and tried, and, assuming that the specific findings do not quite measure up to a conclusion of fact that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property at the time of the commencement of the action, the general finding certainly does; for it directly negatives the denial of the answer (which in reality amounts to an allegation that she was not the owner of or entitled to the possession of the property at said time) that the plaintiff was such owner or entitled to such possession when the complaint was filed.

"It is a well-settled rule that the findings of fact made by the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon." Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 656, 77 Pac. 659; Pac. States Corporation v. Arnold, 23 Cal. App. 672, 674, 139 Pac. 239; Ballou v. Sunflower Gold Min. Co., 165 Cal. 557, 559, 132 Pac. 1036.

We think the findings as a whole, and considered and construed in connection with the pleadings and the issues, sufficiently show or warrant the inference that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property described in her complaint at the time of the commencement of the action.

[10] But, even if this be not true, it must become obvious, upon the most casual reflection, that the failure to find upon that proposition cannot in any manner or degree prejudice the defendants. The only claim vital to the defendants in the action and upon which the right to dispute the plaintiff's ownership and right to the possession of the property alone rested was that William P. Beggs was an owner of the property at the time it was taken possession of by the sheriff, and that it could, therefore, be subjected to the satisfaction of the judgment subsisting against him alone. The court explicitly found, upon sufficient evidence, that William P. Beggs at no time owned or had any interest whatsoever in said property, and therefore whether the plaintiff was or was not the owner and entitled to the possession of the property at the time this action was instituted is wholly immaterial, so far as the defendants are concerned. In other words, the court having found that William P. Beggs, a judgment against whom was sought by the defendants to be satisfied by a seizure and sale of the property, never at any time owned or had any interest therein, failure to find that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of said property at the time of the commencement of the action would manifestly be of no assistance or importance to the defendants.

[11] The rule, as enunciated in the cases, is that a judgment will not be reversed on the ground of failure to find on a particular issue where the want of such a finding is not prejudicial to the defendant. McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 617, 619; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504.

[12] The only one of the remaining points requiring notice involves the contention that the judgment is fatally defective in that it is not in the alternative. This contention is based upon section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, among other things, provides that:

"In an action to recover the possession of personal property, judgment for the plaintiff may be for the possession or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had, and damages for the detention."

This is, of course, the general rule as to such actions, but it has often been held that, where it is made to appear in actions for the recovery of personal property that the possession of the specific personal property may be obtained or the property itself can be delivered to the party so claiming it, failure to make the judgment alternative in form is not erroneous. Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, 504, 26 Pac. 1077; Erreca v. Meyer, 142 Cal. 308, 310, 75 Pac. 826.

In Claudius v. Aguirre it is said:

"The evident purpose of this provision (section 667, above quoted from) is that, if the plaintiff, after obtaining judgment for its possession, is unable to obtain a delivery of the property, he may, in the same action, have a judgment for its value. The primary object of the action is to recover the possession of the property. Whetmore v. Rupe, 65 Cal. 238 [3 Pac. 851]. But, if the plaintiff has already obtained this possession before judgment, there is no occasion for any judgment for its value, as the condition is wanting upon which such clause * * * is authorized; viz., 'if a delivery cannot be had.'"

Erreca v. Meyer, supra, approved the foregoing language. It is there said:

"A judgment that is not in the alternative is not, however, void, and whether or not such a judgment is even erroneous must depend upon the facts of the particular case."

See, also, Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. 411; Black v. Hilliker, 130 Cal. 190, 193, 62 Pac. 481.

It was admitted that the plaintiff never parted with the actual physical possession of the property in dispute; the sheriff having, upon attaching said property, placed her in the control and possession thereof as his representative. It is true the legal possession, after the seizure, was in the sheriff, but the property nevertheless remained intact and in a situation where the possession of it by the plaintiff in her own right was readily obtainable by her under the judgment. It thus appears that the property sued for was susceptible of redelivery to the plaintiff, and therefore she was not entitled to recover from the defendants the value thereof. Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 288, 27 Pac. 668, 929, 25 Am. St. Rep. 180.

Conformably to the foregoing views, the judgment as to the defendants R. L. Rasmussen, J. J. Rauer, and R. J. Graf, is reversed, and as to the remaining defendants, J. K.

Smith, as sheriff, and Rauer's Law & Collection Company, it is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

L. E. Price was convicted of an attempt to commit statutory rape. From the judgment and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. An information was filed against the defendant by the district attorney of San Joaquin county, charging the defendant with rape upon the person of one Nancy Baker, a girl under the age of consent. Defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit rape and sentenced to serve a term of 10 years at San Quentin prison. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant's brief is devoted chiefly to a discussion of the evidence and to a challenge of its sufficiency to support the verdict. The prosecuting witness testified that defendant had sexual intercourse with her; that there was actual penetration of her private parts. A physical examination of the girl by physicians shortly after the alleged crime, and other evidence, created such doubt in the minds of the jury that they found the defendant guilty only of an attempt to commit the crime. It is hence argued that this finding of the jury, together with many circumstances and facts pointed out, shows that the story told by the girl is wholly unworthy of belief, and in fact purely the creature of her imagination.

[1] At the time of the alleged commission of the crime, defendant and his wife were guests of Nancy Baker's stepfather and her mother, who were living in a small house, in the city of Stockton, consisting of a sitting room back of which was a bedroom in which the parents slept, and back of this another bedroom, where their three girls, Nancy, aged 12, Ruth, aged 14, and the third much younger, slept. Opening on the side of this latter bedroom was a room used as a diningroom, back of which was the kitchen. The girls' bedroom was given to the guests, and at night a mattress was laid in the dining room at the kitchen door on which these three children slept, Nancy with her head towards their bedroom and the younger sister beside her and the older with her head at the other end of the mattress. Nancy's testimony was that, on Saturday night, September 13, 1913, defendant came to where she was sleeping and there had sexual intercourse with her. For the purpose of showing an adulterous or lascivious disposition towards this girl on the part of defendant the prosecutrix testified that, three days prior to the date named in the information he had sexual intercourse with her, coming to her bed on the floor as on the later occasion; that when she and her sister were playing outdoors near the house he put his hand under their clothing; that he came one night, prior to September 13th, to the place where they were sleeping and displayed his private parts, and on another occasion he came to the door leading from the diningroom to the bedroom where he slept, and attracted the attention of the girls, who were on the mattress, and again exposed his privates. Nancy also testified that, on the afternoon of September 13th, her mother and aunt (defendant's wife) were away; defendant bought some beer and cheese and gave the girls; that thereafter she went to her bedroom "to fix her hair," and defendant "threw her on the bed and he said, 'Let me —';" that "she called her sister, and she came in, and he hid in the closet." Ruth Baker corroborated Nancy's testimony concerning defendant's indecent exposure of his person; she also testified that she went to the bedroom when called by Nancy, and the defendant was coming out of the closet, and Nancy coming out of the door. Nancy made no complaint, and told no one of defendant's having tampered with her the first time, but, the morning after the second like occurrence (Sunday) she told her mother, and Dr. Craviotto, the family physician, was called. He testified that he made a superficial examination, and ordered the girl brought to his office the next morning. Of this examination he testified: "I found the hymen had been ruptured, and the inflammatory condition that I had seen on Sunday was very much more than I anticipated." He took some specimens of secretions and examined them under a microscope. He testified: "I then called in Dr. Dozier, who was a specialist along this line of microscopical work." He examined Dr. Craviotto's slides and some made by himself. Both testified to having found human spermatozoa. Defendant introduced expert testimony which tended to show that the tests made by Dr. Dozier were not made in accordance with the best approved methods to determine with certainty the presence of spermatozoa, and in some other respects disputing the conclusions reached by Drs. Craviotto and Dozier. Certain facts were brought out by defendant's witnesses and by the cross-examination of the witnesses called by the people which tended, in some degree, to show the improbability of the testimony of Nancy, at least so far as actual intercourse with her by defendant is concerned. Defendant also urged with much confidence that Nancy and Ruth invented the entire story for the purpose of retaliating upon defendant for having deprived them of the comfort of their bedroom and thus compelling them to sleep on the floor. There was no evidence tending in the least to support this supposed motive, and it rests entirely upon the assumption that it was a natural thing for these girls to do. We cannot believe that children of their age would conceive and attempt to carry out such a scheme of revenge upon such slight provocation. We must assume that the jury believed the testimony of Nancy, and it was not without corroboration. We must also assume "that the jury reached a verdict with full realization of their sworn duty, free from passion and prejudice," and "that the learned trial judge was satisfied with the verdict or he would have granted the motion for a new trial." People v. Lewis, 18 Cal. App. 359, 364, 123 Pac. 232, 234. We cannot say that the story told by Nancy was so obviously and inherently improbable as to justify us in setting aside the verdict. She may have been mistaken as to the fact of penetration and may have willfully lied as to that fact. Still that would not necessarily discredit the evidence which tended to show that there was an attempt to commit the crime. Dr. Dozier testified that the presence of spermatozoa in the vaginal canal could be accounted for without actual penetration of the male organ, by reason of their affinity for the secretions of a virgin and because of their mobility which would cause them, by their own action, to find their way from the outside into the vaginal canal.

[2] Some objections to rulings of the court and to instructions will be briefly noticed.

Some questions were asked of the witness, Mrs. Boring, Nancy's grandmother, calling for an opinion as to whether Nancy's "sexual organs had ever been entered by a human being." Mrs. Boring was the mother of 14 children, and she testified that she had assisted many times at the birth of children. It is doubtful whether she qualified as an expert, and it is by no means clear that had she done so the question would be admissible. The court refused the question. Inasmuch as the conviction was for an attempt, the ruling was without prejudice.

[3] The court gave the following instruction:

"You are instructed that an attempt to do or perform a particular thing is an effort or endeavor put forth to accomplish an act, coupled with a present intent so to do, which falls short of the act intended."

The objection urged is that no reference is here made to any criminal act, and that the jury is left to infer that an attempt to do or perform a particular thing, regardless of its character, would warrant a verdict of attempt to commit a crime. The preceding and following instructions show that the jury could not have failed to understand the court to have reference to the crime here charged.

[4] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs you that evidence of previous acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix and of improper familiarities on the part of the defendant towards and with the prosecutrix, both before and after the time charged in the information, is received and admitted in evidence to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant herein, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act of sexual intercourse charged in the information was committed on or about the 13th day of September, 1913, and for no other purpose."

The criticism is that the charge is upon questions of fact; that it assumes: First, that defendant has an adulterous disposition; and, second, that "some act of sexual intercourse between the prosecuting witness and the defendant was committed at some particular time, but that it was rendered more probable that it was committed on or about the 13th day of September, 1913." We do not think the instruction obnoxious to the objection urged. Its purpose was, as plainly appears, to inform the jury that evidence of acts of previous sexual intercourse is received as tending to render it more probable that the act of sexual intercourse charged was committed "and for no other purpose." It is not disputed that such evidence was offered and received, and that it was admissible and for the purpose only as stated. It was quite proper, therefore, that the jury should be told of this limitation.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

I concur: BURNETT, J.

HART, J. I concur in the judgment for the reason that it appears that the testimony of the doctor who professionally examined the prosecutrix, and who said that, upon such examination, he found the existence of conditions or evidence indicating that the prosecutrix had been carnally known by some one of the male sex, furnished some corroboration of the child's story that some one had had sexual relations with her. Then there are the provisions of sections 1159 and 663 of our Penal Code, which expressly authorize a verdict of any offense the commission of which is included within that with which the defendant is charged, or (the last-mentioned section) a verdict of an attempt to commit a crime, when the defendant is charged with such attempt, notwithstanding that the evidence may show that the crime intended was itself actually committed. The court instructed the jury that, under the law, they were at liberty to find the accused guilty of an attempt to commit the crime of rape, if the evidence was sufficient. It must be assumed, I presume, that the jury acted under that instruction, since the verdict was for an attempt to commit the crime.

But, were it not for the provisions of the Code sections above referred to, I should say that the verdict necessarily implies that the jury discarded the story of the prosecutrix. I am not prepared to say that the verdict should not be so construed in any event. The prosecutrix unequivocally asseverated that the defendant actually had sexual intercourse with her. The jury say by the verdict that he did not, and that the story of the prosecutrix as to the most important fact to which she testified was not true. Under this view, the verdict rests almost entirely upon the story of a witness whose testimony is, to some extent at least, discredited. But, as suggested, the law of this state authorizes such a verdict, and while some doubt necessarily arises as to the verity of the story of the prosecutrix, it seems to me, in view of the testimony of the doctor, that it can hardly be said, justly and as a matter of law, that the verdict is wholly without justification.

With perfect propriety, however, attention may be directed to the fact that in many other jurisdictions the higher courts have refused to uphold verdicts, such as the one here, which have been given in cases charging rape and in which the prosecuting witnesses have positively sworn that the crime as charged was actually committed by the accused. Indeed, in our own state, in its earlier judicial annals, the Supreme Court frequently displayed a disposition not to uphold convictions in this class of cases where the prosecutrix was not corroborated and where the acts constituting the charge were claimed to have been committed under such circumstances (similar to those here) as to create some doubt of the verity of her story. See People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540; People v. Ardağa, 51 Cal. 371; People v. Castro, 60 Cal. 118. See, also, People v. Harden, 24 Cal. App. 522, 141 Pac. 1075.

A case of singularly cogent pertinency to the present discussion is that of State v. Mitchell, a Kansas case, reported in 54 Kan. 516, 38 Pac. 810. In that case the defendant was charged with the crime of rape, but the jury found him guilty only of an attempt to commit that offense. The court reversed the case upon the ground that the verdict was evidently the result of a compromise and founded solely upon the testimony of the prosecutrix who, the court said with much justification, was discredited and disbelieved by the jury as to the most important fact involved in the charge against the accused. I need not take the time to quote from the opinion in that case, but I commend it as involving a forceful and instructive view of the proposition in hand.

The higher courts cannot too often emphasize the importance of the application by those required to determine the question of the guilt or innocence of persons accused of crime of the greatest care and circumspection in considering the evidence in cases of this character, as to which, as a general proposition, it may truly be said that popular prejudice against the accused, by some subtle or inscrutable means, finds lodgment in the jury box. As was well and correctly said, in the case of the People v. Benson, supra:

"There is no class of prosecutions attended with so much danger, or which afford so ample an opportunity for the free play of malice and private vengeance. In such cases the accused is almost defenseless, and courts, in view of the facility with which charges of this character may be invented and maintained, have been strict in laying down the rule which should govern the jury in their finding."

1. DRAINS — 75 — ASSESSMENTS — LEVY — MANDAMUS — DUTY OF OFFICERS.

Under St. 1897, p. 254, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1111, providing that the board of directors of an irrigation district may levy a special assessment, not exceeding 2 per cent. of the taxable value of the property, without a vote of the district, but that, if 15 per cent. of the voters shall petition for an election relative to such an assessment, the assessment shall not be levied without the election, the board of directors cannot be compelled by mandamus to call an election, though a proper petition has been filed, since the act does not impose that duty on them, but only prevents the levying of the assessment without such election, and Code of Civ. Proc. § 1085, provides that mandamus can only issue to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. ¶75.]

2. MANDAMUS ¶3—ADEQUATE REMEDY—INVALID ASSESSMENT.

The petitioners for such election have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy under St. 1897, p. 276, § 69, providing that the taxpayers of the district may bring an action to determine the validity of an assessment if the board of directors failed to do so.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by the Imperial Land Company and others against the Imperial Irrigation District and others. From a judgment granting the writ, the defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss.

See, also, 166 Cal. 491, 137 Pac. 234.

A. Haines and Haines & Haines, all of San Diego, and M. W. Conkling, of El Centro, for appellants. Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, Judge pro tem. Respondents, owners of real property within the Imperial Irrigation District, filed a petition in the superior court praying for a writ of mandate to compel appellants to call an election submitting to the electors within the district the question of levying a special assessment of 2 per cent. After the trial the court rendered judgment granting the writ, and the defendants appeal therefrom.

The basis of the application for the writ is found in section 59 of the Bridgeford Act, as amended in 1911 (Stats. 1897, p. 254; 1911, p. 1111), which, after certain provisions respecting special assessments initiated by the vote of the electors, is as follows:

"An assessment of not to exceed two per centum of the value of the assessable property within the district may be levied in any one year without such vote by the adoption of a resolution by at least four-fifths of the members of the board of directors; * * * provided, further, that if a petition signed by qualified voters in the district equal in number to fifteen per centum of the votes cast at the last preceding general election in such district, shall, * * * be filed with such board petitioning that an election relative to the levying of such assessment be held, such assessment shall not be levied without the election provided for in this section."

The district's board of directors unanimously adopted a resolution resolving that "it is necessary * * * that the sum of $28,935 be raised by special assessment for the general fund," and that, to that end, "there be and is hereby levied an assessment of .002 upon the dollar." Thereafter respondents filed a petition for an election, as follows:

"We, the undersigned qualified voters in the Imperial Irrigation District, equal in number to 15 per centum of the votes cast at the last preceding general election in such district, hereby petition that an election relative to the levying of the special assessment made by you on the 24th day of September, 1913, be held in the manner and at the time required by law, and that such assessment be not levied or enforced until such election shall have been held and the result declared."

At a meeting of the board of directors of the district, a motion was adopted whereby the board declared that it found no affidavit or other evidence had been submitted in support of or tending to establish the genuineness of the signatures attached to the petition for the election, that "there is affirmative evidence upon the face of said document tending to show that a number of the subscribed names thereto are not the genuine signatures of the persons whose names purport to be thereunto subscribed," and that the board "is not satisfied from the showing made * * * that said petition is signed by qualified voters in the district equal in number to 15 per cent. of the votes cast at the last preceding general election." From these findings the board concluded "that it is not justified in calling an election on said document," and that "the filing of such document constitutes no reason or ground to suspend or in any way affect the levy of the assessment." It also appears from the admitted allegations of respondents' petition for the writ that appellants refuse to submit to the electors the question of whether the assessment should be levied, and likewise that they are now proceeding to enforce the assessment without submitting it to a vote.

[1] When the board of directors of an irrigation district has passed a resolution providing for an assessment of less than 2 per centum of the value of the assessable property within the district and not exceeding the sum of $75,000, and when, following the adoption of such resolution and within the time specified in the act, a sufficient number of qualified voters have filed with the board a petition for an election, the act provides that "such assessment shall not be levied without the election provided for in this section." The effect of these provisions is that the filing of such petition stays the proposed levy of assessment until such election has been held and the requisite number of votes cast in favor of the assessment. There is nothing in the statute requiring the board of directors to call the election. A failure to call the election, if a sufficient petition therefor has been filed, is, in substance, an abandonment of the proceeding. The writ of mandate can issue only "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. The law does not specially or at all enjoin the holding of the election, even though the requisite number of qualified voters have petitioned therefor. From this it follows that the writ sought for in this case should not issue.

[2] If a sufficient petition for an election be filed, and if, notwithstanding such petition, the directors of a district attempt to levy and collect the assessment without holding the election, the act itself provides a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. For, in addition to any other existent remedy, relief can be had by proceedings on the part of the assessment payers in accordance with section 69 of the act, whereby it is provided that if the board of directors of the district fail to bring an action to determine the validity of the assessment, any assessment payer, within 30 days after the levy, may bring such an action.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that the proceeding be dismissed.

MANSFIELD v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1325.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 5, 1915.)

1. OFFICERS ⇐4—ABOLITION OF OFFICE—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

The office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, being wholly of legislative creation, in the absence of constitutional limitation upon the power of the Legislature, was subject to abolition at any time by act of the Legislature, since a public officer, whose term and compensation are not prescribed by the Constitution, has no contract right whereby he can hold either office or salary against the will of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

2. STATUTES ⇐159—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

Where there is no express repeal of a prior statute by a later one, the courts will not declare a repeal by construction, unless there is an irreconcilable repugnancy between the two acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 229; Dec. Dig. ⇐159.]

3. STATES ⇐44—OFFICERS—SUPERINTENDENT AND CASHIER OF MOTOR VEHICLE DEPARTMENT—LEGISLATIVE POWER OVER OFFICE.

St. 1905, p. 816, established a system to regulate the use of motor vehicles, and annexed the duties appertaining thereto to the office of the secretary of state, authorizing such secretary to employ the necessary clerks to aid him in the discharge of his new duties. St. 1909, p. 369, amended Pol. Code, § 415, to the effect that the secretary of state might appoint a superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, and fixed such superintendent's salary at $2,400 per year, payable monthly. St. 1911, p. 573, amended and repealed certain sections of the Political Code relating to the office of the secretary of state, and rendered the provisions of section 412, as to the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, practically identical with those of the statute of 1909. St. 1913, p. 639, revised and amended the act of 1905, regulating motor vehicles, and transferred the motor vehicle department from the office of the secretary of state to the state department of engineering. Held, that since the act of 1913 was irreconcilably in conflict with the previous acts, they having established the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department merely to facilitate the execution of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1905 by the secretary of state, such office of superintendent of the motor vehicle department was abolished by such act of 1913.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; P. J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by Joseph G. Mansfield against John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State. From a judgment for plaintiff, entered upon defendant's refusal to answer to petition after overruling of his general demurrer, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant. Wm. E. Kleinsorge, Chas. A. Tuttle, and John C. March, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in mandamus, instituted by the plaintiff, to compel the defendant, as controller of the state of California, to draw and deliver to the said plaintiff a warrant on the state treasurer of the state of California for the sum of $200, for services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff during the month of January, 1914, as superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department of the office of secretary of state.

The petition alleges that Frank C. Jordan, secretary of state of the state of California, under and by virtue of the power and authority conferred upon him by law, appointed the petitioner as superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department of the office of secretary of state, at an annual salary of $2,400, payable in monthly installments of $200 out of the general fund of said state; that said appointment has never been revoked; and that plaintiff, during and for the entire month of January, 1914, performed the work of said office. It is averred that, upon the completion of the work as such superintendent and cashier, etc., for and during said month of January, 1914, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant, as controller of the state of California, that he draw his warrant in favor of the plaintiff for the sum to which he became entitled by reason of the services performed by him as such superintendent and cashier for the said month of January, and that the defendant then refused and has ever since refused to draw a warrant in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $200 in compensation for the services mentioned for the month referred to.

The court below overruled a general demurrer to the petition, and, the defendant refusing or failing to answer the petition, thereupon rendered and caused judgment to be entered that a writ of mandate issue against the controller, compelling him to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner agreeably to the prayer of the petition. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from said judgment.

The Legislature of 1905 passed an act entitled "An act to regulate the operation of motor vehicles on public highways, and making an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this act." Stats. 1905, p. 816 et seq. By said act, a somewhat elaborate system of regulating the use and the manner of using motor vehicles in this state was established, and the duties appertaining thereto were annexed to and made a part of those of the office of secretary of state. It is not essential to the decision of the question submitted by this appeal to present here a detailed review of the provisions of said act. It is enough to say that the duties imposed upon the secretary of state by said act were such, in the legislative judgment, as to necessitate the employment of clerical assistance in that office in addition to that which was required before the act in question added the motor vehicle department thereto. The Legislature made provision for such additional assistance by section 8 of the act, whereby an appropriation of $20,000 was made "for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this act, to be used by the secretary of state in the employment of the necessary clerk or clerks," etc.

In the year 1909 the Legislature so amended section 415 of the Political Code as that the secretary of state was authorized to appoint and employ, among other additional clerks allowed said officer by said section, a "superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department" of said office of secretary of state, and the salary for such superintendent, etc., was fixed at $2,400 per year, payable to the incumbent thereof in equal monthly payments. Stats. 1909, p. 369.

In 1911 the Legislature of that year passed an act amending and repealing a number of the sections of the Political Code relating to the office of secretary of state and the duties thereof. Stats. 1911, p. 573 et seq. By that act section 412 of said Code was made to read, in part:

"The secretary of state, to assist him in the discharge of the duties of his office, may appoint the following officers: * * * One superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department."

By the same act section 413 of said Code was practically substituted for section 420 thereof, and, in the place of the latter section, fixes the salaries of the various clerks and officers employed in his office by the secretary of state, including the superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, whose salary is thereby fixed at $2,400 per annum.

The Legislature of 1913 passed an act whereby the act of 1905, regulating motor vehicles, was revised and amended in many particulars, and whereby, furthermore, the motor vehicle department was transferred from the jurisdiction and control of the office of secretary of state and annexed to and made a part of the state department of engineering. Stats. 1913, p. 639 et seq. That act, which was approved on the 31st day of May, 1913, and which, by virtue of a provision contained therein, went into effect on the 31st day of December, 1913, does not expressly repeal the provision of section 415 of the Political Code, or said section as amended by the Legislature of 1911, creating the position of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department as one of the clerical adjuncts of the office of secretary of state.

The Legislature of 1913 passed the customary general appropriation bill, providing for the support of the state government, and which was made a law on June 10, 1913, and in thus providing for the salaries of the secretary of state and subordinates in that office (all enumerated in said act) made no provision for a salary for a "superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department." Stats. 1913, p. 1334.

Obviously the Legislature, by the enactment of the statute of 1913, supra, intended to entirely disconnect the "motor vehicle department," as such department is defined or established by both the statutes of 1905 and 1913, from the office of secretary of state, and it is equally obvious that the effect of the latter act was to do so. The result is, quite clearly, that, since the date upon which the statute of 1913 became effective, all the duties pertaining to said department have not been among those with the performance of which that officer is charged by law. In other words, the transference of the motor vehicle department from the control of the secretary of state to that of the state department of engineering removed from the secretary of state all responsibility and every duty in connection with the motor vehicle department, which, prior to the enactment of the said statute of 1913, it was incumbent upon him to discharge by virtue of the act of 1905, supra. But, as stated, the statute of 1913 does not, by express language, repeal that part of section 415 (or 412) of the Political Code, providing for a superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, and the petitioner vigorously contends that there exists no such repugnancy between the provisions of said statute and those of the act of 1905 as necessarily implies an intention in the Legislature to abolish said office by the former statute. Upon these propositions the petitioner undertakes to maintain that the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department still exists, and that, being the incumbent thereof, his appointment thereto never having been revoked, he is entitled to the salary annexed to said office.

On the other hand, the defendant contends, and upon that proposition he grounds his refusal to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner as prayed for in the petition, that the act of 1913, transferring the control of the motor vehicle department from the office of secretary of state to the state department of engineering, and authorizing the department of engineering to employ the necessary clerical help to carry out the provisions of said act, necessarily operated to repeal the provisions of the act of 1905, which authorized and empowered the secretary of state to employ such clerical help, including the superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, as he might find necessary to perform the identical service now required of the department of engineering by the act of 1913, vesting in said department full and exclusive control of and over the motor vehicle department.

[1] It will not be disputed that:

"A public officer, at least one whose term and compensation are not prescribed by the Constitution, has no contract by which he can have or hold either his office or his salary against the legislative will." Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 269, 22 Pac. 176.

Or, as is said in Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 144, 8 Pac. 814:

"Salaried public offices created by the Legislature are not held by contract or grant. The Legislature has full control over them, unless restricted by the Constitution, and may abolish them altogether, or impose upon them new duties or reduce their salaries."

Under the well-settled rule as thus stated, it will not for an instant be questioned that it lies within the legitimate power of the Legislature to abolish at any time any public office created by it; there being no constitutional limitation upon the exercise of such power in the particular case by the Legislature.

The case of Marquis v. City of Santa Ana, 103 Cal. 661, 37 Pac. 650, cited by the petitioner, is not opposed to the views thus expressed. The decision in that case merely amounts to this: That a municipal office created by the Legislature cannot directly or indirectly be abolished by a municipal corporation organized as such under the municipal corporation act (St. 1883, p. 93), which is a general law of the state. Readily it will be observed that there is no analogy between that case and the one at bar. No one will undertake to support the proposition that a municipal corporation can, by ordinance or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, abolish a public office created by an act of the Legislature, which was, in effect, what the city of Santa Ana, as a municipal corporation, attempted to do in the case cited. Indeed, it is only the statement of a commonplace proposition to say that the legislative body of a municipal corporation cannot repeal any act or statute passed by the Legislature of the state. But we think no one will question the proposition that, had the office of city assessor of Santa Ana been solely the creature of an ordinance passed by the governing body of that city in the exercise of corporate powers conferred upon it by the municipal corporation act, which placed no restriction upon the corporation in that respect, such governing body could at any time abolish said office by ordinance, thus exercising the identical power within the sphere of its corporate jurisdiction that rests in the Legislature with respect to offices created by it and as to the right to abolish which at any time no restriction or qualification is imposed by the Constitution.

In the case at bar, the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, as a branch of the office of secretary of state, being wholly of legislative creation, was subject to the control of the Legislature, and therefore to any regulation or disposition which that department of the government might elect to make concerning it. And, as seen, the question which is presented here is whether the Legislature, in the exercise of its well-defined power to do so, has abolished said office, or, in other words, whether the effect of the enactment of the statute of 1913, supra, was to abolish said office of "superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department" of the office of secretary of state.

[2] The courts are, with singular and obvious propriety, reluctant to declare that a legislative enactment has been repealed by implication. In other words, repeals by implication are not and have never been favored, and the courts will not so construe the effect of a subsequent statute upon a prior legislative enactment, where there is no express repeal of the prior statute by the later one, unless the two are, as to the vital matters to which they relate irreconcilably inconsistent with or repugnant to each other. But, e converso, where there is an irreconcilable repugnancy between the provisions of the two, then, obviously, an intention to repeal the prior statute is necessarily implied.

[3] It is as clear as any proposition can be that there exists an irreconcilable conflict between the law of 1913 relating to and regulating motor vehicles, and the law of 1905 relating to the same subject, in so far as the latter statute established the motor vehicle department as a department of the office of secretary of state and vested in the incumbent of that office the authority and power to employ such clerical assistance to carry out the provisions of that act as he might find requisite. It is therefore plainly manifest that the necessary effect of the act of 1913 was to abolish the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department; said office, it being virtually conceded, having been created for no other purpose than to facilitate the execution of the provisions of the motor vehicle act of 1905 by the secretary of state. And it is a fact of more than ordinary significance, in connection with the consideration of what was the legislative intent with respect to the office involved in this controversy, that the Legislature of 1913, as has been shown, made no special provision in the general appropriation act, as thus it had previously done since the creation of that office, for the payment of the salary of such officer. This fact undoubtedly supports the view that the intention was to abolish the office, for, most assuredly, it must be assumed, had the Legislature not so intended it would have specially provided, as it did for the deputy and other clerical help in the office of secretary of state, for the compensation of the incumbent of that office.

At any rate, we are unable to persuade ourselves, after a careful examination and comparison of the provisions of the two acts, and a consideration of the fact that it was the evident design of the Legislature to vest in the state department of engineering entire and exclusive control and administration of the duties of the motor vehicle department, that the Legislature did not intend to repeal so much of section 415 or 412 of the Political Code as purports to create the office of superintendent and cashier of the motor vehicle department, or that the necessary effect of the statute of 1913, relating to and regulating motor vehicles, was not to do so.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the petition.

26 Cal. App. 568

PEOPLE v. OKOMOTO. (Cr. 374.)

1. FORGERY — 27 — INDICTMENT — REQUISITES — "WILLFULLY."

An information for forgery charging that defendant willfully and with intent to cheat and defraud made a check payable to himself and signed the name of another, well knowing that the name of such other was forged, and willfully and feloniously uttered the name as genuine, sufficiently stated that the name was forged knowingly. The statement in Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 1, that the word "willfully," when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, implies that the person doing the act knew what he was doing, and, while standing alone, it does not imply an intent to violate the law or to injure another, yet when used in a specific statement showing a purpose to injure another, it implies a criminal intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forgery, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. — 27.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful.]

2. FORGERY — 32 — INFORMATION — PASSING OR UTTERING.

An information charging that defendant forged a check purporting to be signed with a certain name, and willfully and feloniously did "pass the name of said T. Yoshimoto," sufficiently charged the passing of the check.

3. FORGERY — 44 — PROSECUTION — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for the forgery and uttering of a check, where the evidence for the prosecution made a prima facie case against the defendant, met only by his claim that he had signed the check under authority given by another of the same name as that of the purported maker, a conviction was authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forgery, Cent. Dig. §§ 117-121; Dec. Dig. — 44.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 951 — JUDGMENT AND SENTENCE — TIME — STATUTE.

Under Pen. Code, § 1191, providing that after a verdict of guilty the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment, which, with extensions, shall not be more than 25 days after the return of the verdict, and section 1202, providing that, if the judgment is not so rendered, the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial, a defendant who did not object to the pronouncing of judgment 27 days after verdict, or then move for a new trial, was not thereafter entitled to a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2349-2358; Dec. Dig. — 951.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

G. S. Okomoto was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walton J. Wood, Public Defender, and David R. Faries, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of forgery, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] After the verdict the defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground "that the facts stated in the action on file herein do not constitute a public offense." The information, which accuses the defendant of the crime of forgery, charges that he "did willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously, with intent then and there to cheat and defraud" certain persons, make and forge the name of T. Yoshimoto to and upon a certain instrument in writing for the payment of money, which said instrument, being a check for $37.50, is set forth in full. It is in favor of G. S. Okomoto, with the signature "T. Yoshimoto," and is alleged to bear on the back thereof "G. S. Okomoto." It is further charged that the defendant "then and there well knowing that the name of said T. Yoshimoto was so falsely made and forged to and upon the said instrument in writing for the payment of money, as aforesaid, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously utter, publish, and pass the name of the said T. Yoshimoto so falsely made and forged to and upon the said instrument in writing for the payment of money, with the name of said T. Yoshimoto so falsely made and forged to and upon the said instrument in writing, as aforesaid, as true and genuine, with intent then and there to defraud, prejudice, and damage" the said persons.

As to the first count, it is objected that the information is improperly pleaded because it does not state in terms that the name was forged "knowingly," and does not state that it was done by the defendant knowing that he had no authority so to do. As to the second count, the objection is that the defendant is not charged with passing the written instrument, but only that he did "pass the name of said T. Yoshimoto." While the information is not a model of pleading with respect to the points suggested, we think that it is legally sufficient. The charge that the defendant, for the wrongful purposes stated, willfully made and forged the name upon the instrument described, necessarily carries with it the meaning that he knew that he had no authority so to do. It has been held that, where a defendant is charged with the commission of perjury, the use of the word "willfully" means that he made the statement with the consciousness that it was false, or with the consciousness that he did not know that it was true, and with the intent that it should be received as a statement of what was true in fact. People v. Von Tiedeman, 120 Cal. 128, 135, 52 Pac. 155. The statement in the Penal Code (section 7, subd. 1) that the word "willfully," when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, includes, rather than excludes, the idea that the person doing the act was fully conscious of, or, in other words, that he knew, what he was doing and all of the circumstances connected therewith which made the doing willful. The word "willfully" alone, as thus used, does not imply an intent to violate law or to injure another; but, when the word is used, as in this information, in connection with a specific statement showing a purpose to injure another, it implies a criminal intent, if the law makes the doing of that act with that purpose a criminal act.

"The word 'willfully,' in the ordinary sense in which it is used in statutes, means not merely 'voluntarily' but with a bad purpose." Commonwealth v. Kneeland (Mass.) 20 Pick, 220.

In People v. King, 125 Cal. 369, 58 Pac. 19, where the defendant was charged with having falsely forged and counterfeited the name of a certain person to a check, the charge was held to be sufficient, and the court said:

"There is not such defect in matter of form as would tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of defendant. An indictment or information is sufficient if it substantially conforms to the statute. People v. Mahlman, 82 Cal. 585, 23 Pac. 145. And no one could say that defendant, as a man of common understanding, was not fully informed as to the acts which he had committed so as to enable him fully to prepare his defense."

[3] At the trial of this action the prosecution introduced as a witness one T. Yoshimoto, a resident of the city of Los Angeles, who testified that the check in question, which was drawn on a bank in Los Angeles, was not signed by him, and that he did not authorize the defendant or any one else to sign his name thereto. He further said that he knew the defendant by sight, but was not personally acquainted with him, and had not had any business or social relations with him. The defendant testified that he wrote the name pursuant to permission given him by another T. Yoshimoto, who was a resident of Burbank, in Los Angeles county, Cal. The defense produced in evidence two directories, one published in San Francisco, and one published in Los Angeles, in each of which was given the name T. Yoshimoto, with the residence assigned to Burbank. The evidence does not show whether these two men, or either of them, had an account in the bank. When the state's witness T. Yoshimoto was on the witness stand, he was asked whether at the time in question he had any deposit in that bank. The question was excluded, on objection by the defendant. It is now contended on behalf of defendant that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, because it was not sufficient to justify the jury in its implied finding that the witness T. Yoshimoto was the man whose name was forged. This contention cannot be sustained. The testimony of the witness T. Yoshimoto, taken in connection with other evidence produced by the prosecution, was sufficient to make a prima facie case for the state. The testimony produced by the defendant did no more than tend to raise a doubt. Taken as a whole, we cannot say that the facts and circumstances shown necessarily destroyed the effect of the evidence for the prosecution on the question of identity of the person whose name was signed to the check. The situation in law is the same as if the defendant had testified that some person having the name T. Yoshimoto, and residing at some more distant point, such as San Francisco, or some point without the state of California, had authorized him to sign this check. It was for the jury to say whether the bare statement of the defendant, without the production of the second Yoshimoto, or any other substantial corroboration, was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt in their minds as against the evidence produced by the prosecution.

[4] The verdict of conviction in this case was returned on September 17, 1914, and Tuesday, September 22d, was fixed by the court for pronouncing judgment. On September 22d the court granted defendant leave to file an application for probation, which application and the pronouncing of judgment were continued to September 29th, and on the 29th, "by consent of the defendant," continued to September 30th. On September 30th the defendant filed his motion in arrest of judgment and his motion for a new trial, and the cause was continued to October 2d for argument on said motions and judgment. On October 2d, by order of court, the matters of motion and sentence were continued to October 6th, and on October 6th, the said motions having been argued and submitted, the matters of probation and sentence were continued to October 14th. On October 14th the application for probation was denied, and judgment was pronounced as shown by the record. Defendant claims that he is entitled to a new trial because the judgment was not pronounced within the time provided by law.

Where there is a motion for new trial or in arrest of judgment, and also an application for probation, the court has the discretionary power to extend the time for 20 days beyond the original limit of 5 days. In the absence of any request from the defendant for a further extension (no question of present insanity being involved), the extreme limit provided in the Code for rendering judgment is a day not more than 25 days after the date of the return of the verdict. Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718; Pen. Code, §§ 1191, 1202. It will be noted that the judgment in this case was pronounced 27 days after the return of the verdict. The record does not show that the defendant made any objection to the pronouncing of judgment at that time or asked for a new trial, and the question therefore arises whether, under such circumstances, the judgment should be reversed on account of the delay stated. According to section 1202 of the Penal Code, if the judgment is not rendered or pronounced within the time fixed therefor by the court, or the time to which it is continued under the provisions of section 1191, "then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial." Referring to these sections, the Supreme Court, in Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 192, 106 Pac. 718, 719, stated their effect as follows:

"If judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative if the defendant so desired; he became 'entitled' to it. This does not indicate a legislative intent that the lapse of time and failure of the court to render the judgment within the time fixed should oust the court of further jurisdiction to proceed in the case and render a dismissal necessary. On the contrary, it necessarily implies that the jurisdiction shall continue, and that the court shall retain authority to order a new trial and proceed therewith to verdict and final judgment. If the court should refuse a new trial and render judgment against the defendant after the authorized time has passed, its action would be erroneous, and the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if an appeal should be taken."

Here it appears that the defendant was entitled to a new trial; but it further appears that a new trial was not refused, inasmuch as he did not ask for it. In reliance upon the above-quoted decision, it has been held by this court that, in the absence of any objection made by the defendant at the time of pronouncing judgment, and in the absence of any demand made by him for a new trial upon the ground that the legal time limit had expired, the court might rightfully enter the judgment. People v. Polich, 143 Pac. 1065. A similar opinion was indicated by this court in the case of In re Hemstreet, 18 Cal. App. 639, 123 Pac. 984, where it was said that, under these sections of the Penal Code, the trial court should, "upon application therefor," grant defendant a new trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SMITH v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA.
(Civ. 1634.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 16, 1915.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨ 250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Under St. 1913, p. 318, § 84, providing that, on review of the proceedings before the state Industrial Commission to determine the compensation for injuries to a workman, it can be determined whether the findings of fact support the order, decision, or award under review, and that the commission's findings of fact shall be conclusive and final, and shall include ultimate facts, and findings and conclusions of the commission, the commission's findings of fact cannot be reviewed, if supported by any evidence, and its conclusions of fact, which are the conclusions referred to, drawn from the evidentiary facts, are also final.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨ 250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—FINDINGS—MATTERS OF FACT.

Where the Industrial Accident Commission had found the facts relating to a workman's employment, and the circumstances attending the accident, a conclusion that he was engaged in interstate commerce at the time is a conclusion of law, not of fact, and may be reviewed.

3. COMMERCE ⇨ 8—REGULATION—CONFLICTING LAWS—EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY.

The federal Employers' Liability Act (Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8657-8663]), fixing the responsibility of carriers engaged in interstate commerce for injuries to their employés while employed in such commerce, resulting from negligence of the carrier or its servants, governs the entire liability of the carrier for such injuries, and is exclusive of state legislation on that subject, so that an employé engaged in interstate commerce cannot recover under a state Workmen's Compensation Act for an injury received in his employment, but not caused by the negligence of the carrier or its employés.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 8.]

4. COMMERCE ⇨ 27 — EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY — EMPLOYED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE."

A railroad special watchman, who removed trespassers from an interstate train and was injured just after he alighted from the train to drive the trespassers out of the railroad yard, was still employed in interstate commerce at the time he received his injury, and cannot recover under the state Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 27.

Certiorari by George W. Smith against the Industrial Accident Commission to review the findings and determination of the Commission denying relief to the petitioner. Order of the Commission affirmed.

George H. Johnson and Johnson & Phipps, all of San Bernardino, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley and H. C. Booth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Proceedings in certiorari to review the findings and determination of the state Industrial Accident Commission whereby petitioner, who applied for compensation against the Southern Pacific Company under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act of California, was denied relief, and his application dismissed.

Petitioner was a special officer or watchman employed by the Southern Pacific Company at its railroad yards in Colton, Cal. On the night of January 13, 1914, a through passenger train running from New Orleans to San Francisco, and carrying passengers, baggage, and express from points without the state destined for points within California, came into the yards. Acting within the line of his duty, petitioner boarded the tender of the locomotive attached to the train, as it got under way again, for the purpose of preventing trespassers from getting on the cars. As the train moved out three men attempted to board the "blind baggage"; that being the car nearest the engine, and having no door leading from the platform to the interior of the train. Petitioner shouted at the men, and they jumped from the platform, and petitioner left the engine tender and alighted on the ground. He started to pursue the three men in order to drive them from the company's property, and while doing this his revolver fell from its holster and a cartridge therein exploded, the bullet striking petitioner's left thigh, where it inflicted a flesh wound. For this accidental injury suffered while he was performing a service in the course of his employment petitioner claimed compensation.

The industrial commission made findings of fact, the substance of which has been narrated in the foregoing. A dismissal of petitioner's application was ordered because it appeared, in the opinion of the commission, that the employment in which the watchman was engaged at the moment of the accident had to do with interstate commerce, and therefore his claim for compensation did not fall within the jurisdiction of the state board.

Petitioner challenges these findings, and contends that he was not engaged in an employment connected with interstate commerce at the time he received his injury, and that, irrespective of that issue being found against him, his claim was one which it was within the jurisdiction of the state commission to allow.

[1] Before giving attention to the principal questions thus presented, some notice should be taken of the proposition suggested as to how far in this proceeding a review may be had of the findings of the state industrial board. No appeal is provided to be taken from a decision of the commission, but it is provided in section 84 of the act (Stats. 1913, p. 318) that a proceeding of review may be taken in either the Supreme Court or the District Courts of Appeal. It is provided that this review may extend far enough to determine whether the findings of fact, when such are made, "support the order, decision, or award under review." In the subdivision immediately follow is contained this provision:

"The findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact shall be conclusive and final, and shall not be subject to review; such questions of fact shall include ultimate facts and the findings and conclusions of the commission."

Some ambiguity is apparent in these provisions, but they can be given a reasonable interpretation which will make effectual the evident intent of the legislators. We apply this construction: The correctness of the findings of fact cannot be questioned where there has been presented to the commission any evidence to support them. The phrase "such questions of fact" shall include ultimate facts and the findings and conclusions of the commission" must relate wholly to conclusions of fact, for the clause expressly so declares in the part we have underscored. Ultimate facts are nothing more than conclusions of fact drawn from the probative or evidentiary facts; hence matters of fact stated in their ultimate form cannot differ from conclusions of fact, however characterized. The Industrial Accident Commission exercises judicial functions; it sits as a court to try the matters pertinent to issues within its jurisdiction. There is every reason for saying, therefore, that its findings should conform to, and be judged by, the same general rules as are applicable to findings made in courts of justice. It is a rule that findings of the ultimate facts alone are not only sufficient, but are the most proper to be made; and, while findings of evidentiary facts are permissible, these will always be controlled by findings of the ultimate facts where a conflict is presented between the two. Corea v. Higuera, 153 Cal. 451, 95 Pac. 882, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018; People v. McCue, 150 Cal. 195, 88 Pac. 899.

[2] The commission in the matter of this petitioner's application, after finding the facts as to his employment and those relating to the circumstances of the accident, added a finding to this effect:

"That the applicant, George W. Smith, was at the specific time of his injury employed in interstate commerce, and the particular service being rendered by him at the time of his injury was a service in such interstate commerce."

This finding, while in its analysis it may be said to cover a mixed question of law and fact, furnishes in the circumstances of this case more particularly a conclusion of law which was not necessary to be made. No doubt, it was expressed more by way of pointing directly to the reasons for the opinion of the commissioners that there was no jurisdiction in the state to adjust the claim of petitioner. That conclusion, then, may be disregarded, as it is plainly the intent of the statute to allow a review of all questions of law arising upon the findings of fact.

We revert again to the two main propositions, to wit: (1) Was the State Industrial Accident Commission without jurisdiction to award petitioner compensation, assuming that the applicant was at the time of his injury engaged in work directly relating to interstate commerce? (2) Do the findings sufficiently show that, as a matter of fact, petitioner was engaged in an act affecting interstate commerce, rather than an act local in its relation to the business of the employer?

[3] The Congress of the United States, in April, 1908, passed what is known as the Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8657-8665), which fixes the responsibility of every common carrier towards its employes while engaged in commerce between the several states, where any such employes are injured through the negligence of the officers, agents, or other employes of the carrier. In the year 1913 the Legislature of California passed a measure, known as the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1913, p. 279), which provided for compensation to be awarded to employes injured while engaged in the work of their employer (except in certain employments not pertinent here), regardless of whether the accident occurred through the negligence of the employer, or his agents, servants, or other employes. It will be seen, then, that as applied to common carriers, the state act covers precisely the same field as does the national legislation, with the qualification that the state act obliges the employer to compensate employes for accidental injuries sustained without negligence on the part of his agents or employes, as well as those arising through the negligence of such persons.

The United States Congress is given power by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several states. As to the application of local or state statutes made in the exercise of the police power affecting instrumentalities of interstate commerce, it is said that this subject belongs to the reserve power of the states; that is, the power may be exercised by the states in the absence of legislation covering the same subject by Congress. When the power of Congress, however, is exerted in the direction of covering the matter sought to be so regulated, and is comprehensive to that end, then the state regulation must give way before the superior law. The principle involved is elaborately stated by Mr. Justice Van Devanter in the leading case of Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44, wherein the writer of that decision quotes the words of Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579, as follows:

"If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this: That the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one state may be willing to control its operations, no state is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason. The people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, 'This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land,' and by requiring that the members of the state Legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the states, shall take the oath of fidelity to it. The government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, 'anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.'"

In Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 501, 34 Sup. Ct. 638, 58 L. Ed. 1068, the court says:

"* * * It is settled that, since Congress, by the act of 1908, took possession of the field of the employer's liability to employes in interstate transportation by rail, all state laws upon the subject are superseded. [And quoted from Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co., supra:] 'But, plainly, * * * it was the intention of Congress to base the action upon negligence only, and to exclude responsibility of the carrier to its employes for defects and insufficiencies not attributable to negligence.'"

Again, in Michigan Central R. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 33 Sup. Ct. 192, 57 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176, this expression of the United States Supreme Court, written by Lurton, J., occurs, referring to the same law:

"By this act Congress has undertaken to cover the subject of the liability of railroad companies to their employes injured while engaged in interstate commerce. This exertion of a power which is granted in express terms must supersede all legislation over the same subject by the states. * * * It * * * follows that in respect of state legislation prescribing the liability of such carriers for injuries to their employes while engaged in interstate commerce this act is paramount and exclusive."

In point as to the exclusive nature of similar acts of Congress are the cases of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hardwick Farmers' Elev. Co., 226 U. S. 426, 33 Sup. Ct. 174, 57 L. Ed. 284, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 203; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Miller, 226 U. S. 513, 33 Sup. Ct. 155, 57 L. Ed. 323; Simpson v. Shepard, 230 U. S. 352, 33 Sup. Ct. 729, 57 L. Ed. 1511, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1151; Erie R. Co. v. New York, 233 U. S. 671, 34 Sup. Ct. 756, 58 L. Ed. 1149, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 266.

The express declaration in the decision that the federal statute has taken hold of the entire subject of the liability of a common carrier engaged in interstate business to its employes for accidental injuries suffered by the latter while performing their duties makes it unnecessary to digest those decisions approving the operation of the state statutes where the national legislation is not of such a character as to indicate that Congress intended to cover the whole field. There are such decisions, and they give expression to the general rule that a state statute enacted under the right of the reserve power is not to be set aside or overridden by the law of Congress, unless there is an actual repugnance. But these decisions recognize the alternative condition, that such state statutes will be thus overridden where Congress has manifested a purpose to exercise its paramount authority over the subject. There may be cited Sinnot v. Davenport, 22 How. 227, 16 L. Ed. 243; Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Harris, 234 U. S. 412, 34 Sup. Ct. 790, 58 L. Ed. 1377; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 508, also cited in Atlantic Coast R. R. Co. v. Georgia, 234 U. S. 280, 34 Sup. Ct. 829, 58 L. Ed. 1312.

[4] Touching the claim of petitioner that, whatever character his act may have had as being connected with the operation of an interstate train up to the moment that he had driven the intruders therefrom and had himself alighted on the ground, his further act in attempting to drive the men away was one not connected with the first duty, and was of a local nature only, it appears that the act was a continuous one without a break or stop. The watchman caused the men who sought to trespass on the interstate train to leave it and then, in the words of the finding made by the commission, he "was following them to drive them off the company's property when he stumbled and his revolver fell from the holster and was discharged." It would be to mark a very fine line of distinction to say that from the moment the watchman and the intruders stepped from the interstate train the acts of the former changed from being in aid of interstate commerce and his further motions in pursuit of these same intruders became colored with conditions of a purely local employment. The federal courts have not indulged such close distinctions in applying the statutes. The facts of one case may be referred to: A fireman at Selma, N. C., had prepared an engine which he was to accompany on an intrastate trip, but which was to pull in part cars brought in by an interstate train to their destination. The time not having arrived for the departure of the train, the fireman left the engine and went to his boarding house on personal business. While crossing over the tracks of the company he was struck by an engine and killed. The federal court held that the fireman was at the time of his death engaged in work connected with interstate commerce, saying:

"Assuming that the evidence fairly tended to indicate the boarding house as his (the fireman's) destination, it nevertheless also appears that deceased was shortly to depart upon his run, having just prepared his engine for the purpose, and that he had not gone beyond the limits of the railroad yard when he was struck. There is nothing to indicate that this brief visit to the boarding house was at all out of the ordinary, or was inconsistent with his duty to his employer." North Carolina R. R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 34 Sup. Ct. 305, 58 L. Ed. 591, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159.

So here, the findings support the view that the petitioner, when he started to drive the trespassers from the company's property, was performing an act consistent with his entire duty of ridding the interstate train of persons who sought to intrude thereon without leave or right.

The conclusions herein expressed on the several contentions advanced by petitioner are, therefore, favorable to the determination as made by the Industrial Accident Commission, which declined jurisdiction of petitioner's application and dismissed his claim.

The proceeding and order brought under review are affirmed.

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES — 77 — DUTY OF CONSTABLE — PROSECUTIONS FOR MISDEMEANORS.

Where a constable failed to cause the prosecution of certain persons for the commission of misdemeanors not committed in his presence, he was guilty of no neglect of official duty, since the duty of such an officer to initiate such prosecutions by complaint is no greater than that of a private citizen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 100, 108, 110, 112, 115, 116; Dec. Dig. — 77.]

3. ARREST — 63 — ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT — MISDEMEANORS.

Under Pen. Code, § 836, providing that a peace officer may make an arrest without warrant for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence, etc., a constable has no authority to arrest without a warrant for a misdemeanor, except where the offense is committed in his presence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. §§ 145-156; Dec. Dig. — 63.]

4. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES 102—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT—MISDEMEANORS—STATUTE.

Pen. Code, § 315, provides that whoever keeps a bawdyhouse, or willfully resides in such house, is guilty of a misdemeanor. On prosecution of a constable for failure to arrest certain persons so living it was not alleged, in the language of the statute, that they willfully resided therein. Held, that such constable was not charged with knowledge of the commission of the offense so as to render a neglect of his official duty any failure to arrest such persons as for a misdemeanor committed in his presence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. 102.]

5. PROSTITUTION 1—DEFINITION.

"Prostitution" means the common and indiscriminate engaging in sexual intercourse by a woman with all persons who offer for hire or the equivalent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prostitution, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. 1.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Prostitution.]

6. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES 102—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT—MISDEMEANOR—PERSONS LIVING IN BAWDYHOUSE—STATUTE.

Under Pen. Code, § 315, providing that in prosecutions for keeping a bawdyhouse, common repute may be received as competent evidence of the character of the house, the failure of a constable to act on such common repute in arresting the keeper or inmates of such houses, as for a misdemeanor committed in his presence, though it might excuse him if he did so arrest, is not a neglect of his official duties, since discretion must be vested in a peace officer in making an arrest without warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. 102.]

7. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES 13—NEGLECT OF OFFICIAL DUTY—REMOVAL—STATUTE.

The failure of a constable without process to arrest or to swear out a complaint when acquainted with facts naturally implying that such offenses as prostitution are being committed, is not such neglect of his official duty as subjects him to removal from office and a penalty of $500 under Pen. Code, § 772, providing that the superior court may so decree when any officer within its jurisdiction has neglected or refused to perform his official duties, since such construction of the act would strip the officer of all discretion in the making of such arrest, for such misdemeanors as vagrancy and the keeping of gaming houses and houses of ill fame.

Application for writ of prohibition by Samuel T. Ferguson against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Kern, and the Honorable Howard A. Peairs. Peremptory writ issued.

Borton & Theile, of Bakersfield, for petitioner. Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondents. James F. Farraher, amicus curiae.

SHAW, J. While petitioner held the office of constable of the Sixteenth township of the county of Kern, an accusation was filed against him in the superior court of that county by J. C. Barrett under the provisions of section 772 of the Penal Code, purporting to charge him with neglect in the performance of the official duties pertaining to his office, and praying for his removal as such officer, and that he be adjudged to pay the relator the sum of $500 as in said section provided. The accusation at length is as follows:

"That at and in said Sixteenth township of the county of Kern there is now and has been for more than two years last past a certain place known as Boust City, which has been and is now inhabited by a large number of women and girls who have been and now are living in houses of prostitution or cribs and maintaining and keeping said places as disorderly houses or houses of ill fame; that such houses have been resorted to by divers and sundry persons for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness; that such places have been conducted openly and notoriously, and within the knowledge and in open view of a large number of persons residing in the city of Taft and in said township; that public dance halls are maintained and kept at such places by numerous persons, which said dance halls are kept and maintained as an adjunct to and in connection with the said houses of prostitution; that said dance halls have been carried on and conducted in a noisy, offensive, and indecent manner, so that the music and the hallooing and yelling which has from time to time emitted or arisen from such places has been heard a long distance therefrom, and that said dance halls and houses of prostitution have been conducted in such a manner that the peace and quiet of the neighborhood has been and is constantly disturbed thereby; that said houses of prostitution consist of small buildings commonly known as cribs, and have been built and erected for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness; that the women and girls who inhabit the same and reside therein conduct themselves in a vile and indecent manner, by using vile, profane, and indecent language, and by dressing and clothing themselves in vile, suggestive, and lewd clothing, and by indulging in the excessive use of intoxicating drinks; that a number of saloons are conducted and maintained by divers persons in said Boust City, and that said saloons are frequented and resorted to by female prostitutes and by the hangers-on of said Boust City, and the partners and accomplices of the said women and girls so living and residing in said houses of prostitution; that the said cribs have been erected and leased, and are now being leased, by one E. J. Boust, for the purpose and with the intent that the same shall be occupied as houses of prostitution.

"That the defendant has now, and has at all times within two years last past had knowledge of all the facts in the paragraph last above alleged, and has on divers and sundry occasions been present at said Boust City, and has seen women and girls living and residing in houses of prostitution, and has seen the said dance halls conducted and carried on in the manner last above alleged, and has, at all time, had knowledge of said condition of affairs, but he has at all times failed, refused, and neglected, and still fails, refuses, and neglects, to cause the prosecution or the arrest of any of the persons letting said cribs for the purpose of prostitution, or any of the persons residing therein."

Respondent, who is petitioner here, interposed a demurrer upon the ground, among others, that said accusation failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a ground for removal from office under section 772 of the Penal Code. This demurrer was overruled, whereupon the respondent filed an answer and the court proceeded with the trial of the case. After the evidence had been introduced, and before the making of findings and the rendition of any decree or judgment therein, the respondent applied to this court for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the superior court of Kern county and Hon. Howard A. Peairs, judge of said court, prohibiting him from any further proceeding in said matter.

[1] The theory upon which petitioner insists upon the issuance of the writ is that, notwithstanding the fact that the accusation fails to allege any neglect of official duty pertaining to the office, without which it is claimed the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding, the court threatens to, and will, unless prohibited from so doing, render a decree removing him from office, and enter a judgment against him for $500 in favor of said J. C. Barrett, as informer. That no appeal lies from a decree and judgment in such a proceeding is directly adjudicated in the case of In re Curtis, 108 Cal. 661, 41 Pac. 793; and that an accused may have the benefit of the writ of prohibition in a proper case is determined in the cases of Siebe v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 551, 46 Pac. 456, and Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 81 Pac. 225.

[2-4] While the accusation proceeds at length in setting forth a deplorable condition as to vice and depravity existing in "Boust City," the only specific charges of neglect on the part of petitioner to perform his official duty, as set forth in the accusation, are: First, his failure "to cause the prosecution or the arrest of any persons letting said cribs for the purpose of prostitution"; and, second, his failure to cause the prosecution or arrest of "any of the persons residing therein." Section 316 of the Penal Code provides that:

"Every person who lets any apartment or tenement, knowing that it is to be used for the purpose of assignation or prostitution, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

And section 315, Penal Code, provides that:

"Every person who keeps a house of ill fame in this state, resorted to for the purposes of prostitution, * * * or who willfully resides in such house, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

We are not directed to any provision of law which imposes upon a constable the duty of instituting proceedings for the prosecution of public offenders committing misdemeanors. Such proceedings are instituted by the filing of verified complaints with a magistrate, and no greater duty in this regard devolves upon a constable as such than upon a private citizen, unless where an offense is attempted or committed in his presence. Hence his failure to cause the prosecution of these persons who were guilty, according to the accusation, of a misdemeanor, constituted no neglect of his official duty.

A constable is a peace officer and as to public offenses of the degree of misdemeanors he has no authority to make arrests unless armed with a warrant, save and except in those cases where the offense is committed in his presence. Pen. Code, § 836. It is not alleged that the women residing in said houses of prostitution were, in the language of the statute, "willfully residing therein." On the contrary, from aught that appears, their presence there may have been due to duress or other causes showing an entire absence of the element of willfulness necessary to constitute the offense, and which might excuse such residence. Conceding that such fact might constitute some other and more serious offense, petitioner is not charged with a knowledge of the commission of said offense.

[5, 6] Prostitution means common, indiscriminate, illicit intercourse for hire. It is the practice by a female in offering her body to an indiscriminate intercourse with men for money or its equivalent. While the statute (section 315, supra) provides that in prosecutions for keeping a house of prostitution, common repute may be received as competent evidence of the character of the house and the women resorting to it, nevertheless the failure of a constable to act upon such common repute in arresting the keeper or inmates thereof would not constitute a neglect of his official duties, although it might excuse such action if he did arrest them. Necessarily a large discretion must be vested in a peace officer in making an arrest without a warrant. Having the power to disperse mobs and otherwise preserve the peace, it follows that he may enforce his orders by making arrests as a necessary means of performing such duty, but it is improbable that two officers would exercise equal leniency or manifest the same degree of patience or discretion before making arrests in enforcing their orders.

Respondents cite the case of People v. Craig, 152 Cal. 42, 91 Pac. 997, wherein the Supreme Court justified the act of an officer without a warrant in making an arrest of a vagrant who resisted to the extent of committing a grievous assault upon the officer; it being there held that:

"If, * * * he [the officer] could testify from actual knowledge to every element of the offense, the offense must have been committed in his presence."

It does not follow that because an officer may without process be justified or excused by reason of information upon which he acts in making arrests for misdemeanors, such as vagrancy, prostitution, and the letting of houses for prostitution, a failure to act upon the same information would constitute a misdemeanor on the part of the officer for neglect of official duty. We cannot believe that the Supreme Court in the Craig Case would, under the circumstances there existing, have upheld a decree of ouster had the officer neglected to make the arrest for vagrancy.

Such offenses as vagrancy, prostitution and (usually) the letting of houses for prostitution, depend for their criminal character, not upon a single act, but upon a series of acts extending over a considerable period of time, and are criminal offenses because of their continuance and repetition. From the very nature of the offense of letting a house for prostitution and the conducting of prostitution therein, such offenses are rarely, if ever, committed in the presence of the officer; and while he may have had, as a result of information obtained from various sources an acquaintance with the fact, and hence in a limited sense, knowledge, of the commission of such offenses, nevertheless the act which would require, as a positive official duty, the making of an arrest without a warrant was not committed in his presence. While an officer may be justified, or at least excused, for making a raid and arresting the inmates of a reputed house of prostitution, nevertheless he does so at his own risk. "Making, as we are disposed to make, all proper allowance for zeal of police officers [or other officers] in dealing with persons who are supposed to be bad members of society, it is the duty of all courts to prevent good or bad citizens from being unlawfully molested. Official illegality is quite as reprehensible as private violations of law. The law of the land must be accepted by every one as the only rule which can be allowed to govern the liberties of citizens, whatever may be their ill desert." Sarah Way's Case, 41 Mich. 299, 1 N. W. 1021.

[7] In this case respondents have presented the written opinion of the trial court wherein much of the evidence upon which its conclusion was based is set forth, and it is apparent that the court acted, not upon the theory that the misdemeanors had been committed in the presence of the officer, but that he was acquainted with facts from which the natural inference to be drawn was that the offenses were being committed, and that knowledge of such facts required him to arrest or cause the prosecution of the inmates.

We cannot subscribe to the proposition that the failure of an officer without process to make an arrest under such circumstances, or to swear to a complaint and cause the prosecution of the offenders, constitutes a misdemeanor, to wit, neglect of official duties, for which he may be removed from office. Under such circumstances, to subject him to a prosecution under the provisions of section 772, Penal Code, at the relation of one seeking to recover the $500 penalty provided therein, would not only impose unnecessary and intolerable burdens, but strip him of all discretion in the making of arrests for misdemeanors, and require him at his peril to make arrests of vagrants, prostitutes and inmates of houses of prostitution upon common repute or information. We are not disposed to criticize officers for their zeal in dealing with persons who are bad members of society; on the contrary, they are to be commended for such zeal. On the other hand, where such offenders may be dealt with under process issued by the court upon a complaint presented by any citizen having regard for the welfare of the community, the action of the officer in making an arrest for such offenses without a warrant must be left largely to his discretion.

It is ordered that the peremptory writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

COOPER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY. (Civ. 1380.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1915.)

1. PROCESS $\hookrightarrow$ 137—SUMMONS—SUFFICIENCY. A service of summons by one whose affidavit of service failed to show that he was over the age of 18 years was insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 177-180; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 137.]

2. CERTIORARI $\hookrightarrow$ 42—PROCEEDINGS—TIME.

The remedy by certiorari to review and set aside a judgment is barred by the lapse of time within which an appeal from the judgment may be taken, unless circumstances of an extraordinary character are shown to have intervened; but petitioners, seeking to set aside a judgment foreclosing a mortgage, should seek relief by some appropriate proceeding in which the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, if any, or other persons in interest, may have an opportunity to be heard; and, where 18 years had elapsed since the judgment, the mere statement that petitioners were not in fact served with summons and had no knowledge of the pendency of the action would not justify the issuance of the writ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. §§ 64-73, 75-79, 81-84, 87; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 42.]

Petition by William E. Cooper and another for writ of review against the Superior Court of San Joaquin County. Writ denied.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of review. It is alleged that in February, 1897, an action was commenced in the superior court of San Joaquin county by N. Arata, plaintiff, against William E. Cooper and Annie Cooper, defendants, for the foreclosure of a mortgage; that return of service of summons was made by one J. L. Nye, whose affidavit of service failed to show that he was over the age of 18 years; that said summons was never in fact served upon the defendants in the action; that the default of defendants to answer was entered and decree of foreclosure thereafter made and entered on February 23, 1897; that defendants had no notice or knowledge of the pendency of said action or of the judgment entered therein until the 21st day of October, 1914. Petitioners pray that defendant be called upon to show cause why said judgment should not be set aside and annulled.

[1] The service of summons was insufficient (Lyons v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 43, 4 Pac. 938), but we do not think the judgment, after so great a lapse of time, should be set aside in this somewhat summary manner.

[2] Petitioners should seek relief by some appropriate proceeding in which the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, if there was such sale, or other persons having an interest in the property arising out of such foreclosure proceedings, may have an opportunity to be heard.

It has been held that the remedy by certiorari is barred by the lapse of time within which an appeal from the judgment may be taken, unless circumstances of an extraordinary character be shown to have intervened. Keys v. Marin County, 42 Cal. 256; Reynolds v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 372, 28 Pac. 121; Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 Pac. 322. Eighteen years have passed since the judgment was entered. We think the mere statement that petitioners were not in fact served with summons and had no knowledge of the pendency of the action is not enough to justify the issuing of the writ. Some facts or circumstances explaining why they had no knowledge or the means of knowledge of so important a matter affecting their title to the property should appear. The writ is denied.

ALEXANDER v. BOSWORTH et al.
(Civ. 1307.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 18, 1915.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨262—CONVEYANCE TO WIFE BY HUSBAND—PRESUMPTION.

Where property is purchased by a husband with community funds and thereafter conveyed to the wife, the presumption is that a gift was intended.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨49½—CONVEYANCE TO WIFE BY HUSBAND—INTENTION OF HUSBAND—QUESTION FOR COURT.

In case of a conveyance by husband to wife, it is for the court to determine from his acts, declarations, and conduct at the time whether he intended a gift.

3. CORPORATIONS ⇨120—SALE OF STOCK—AGREEMENT TO REPURCHASE—TENDER.

Where plaintiff, who had an option to return stock to defendant, who had sold it to him, if it was not worth a certain price on a certain date, did not so make an absolute offer of return, but merely suggested that the defendant perform his agreement, accepting in lieu thereof, from the defendant, an indefinite extension of the time during which such agreement should remain good, there was no waiver by the defendant of the tender back of stock necessary to charge him on the original contract, since to raise an implied waiver, there must be a distinct and absolute refusal to perform a promise, which must be treated as such by the adverse party.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨171—WIFE'S ESTATE—STATUS AS "SURETY"—HYPOTHECATION OF PROPERTY.

Where a wife joined her husband in the execution of a trust deed to her land to secure performance by him of a contract to repurchase stock sold by him if it did not reach a certain price, such wife became surety for her husband under Civ. Code, § 2831, providing that a surety is one who, at the request of another, to secure him a benefit, hypothecates property as security for the performance of an act in favor of a third person.

The measure of a surety's liability is strictly limited by that of his principal, since a surety is bound only to answer for the principal's default.

6. MORTGAGES ⇨5—DEED OF TRUST—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

Where a wife executed a trust deed to a third person to secure her husband's performance of his contract to repurchase stock if it did not reach a certain price within a specified time, such deed of trust operated as a mortgage, a "mortgage" being a pledge of security for a deed whether the instrument is a simple mortgage deed in form, a mortgage with power of sale, a deed in trust, or a deed absolute on its face, accompanied by agreement to reconvey, courts of equity regarding the substance of a transaction, not the form, and it being immaterial that the conveyance is to a third person and not to the creditor.

7. CORPORATIONS ⇨120—SALE OF STOCK—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE—OPTIONS.

All offers, such as an option to return stock to the seller at a specified price if it is not worth such price on a certain date, must be accepted in the terms in which made to ripen into a contract, alteration of the terms of the offer, or the addition of any condition, being tantamount to a rejection.

8. CORPORATIONS ⇨120—PURCHASE OF STOCK—OPTION TO RETURN—PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS.

Where defendant contracted to buy back stock, which he had sold, at a certain price if it did not reach such price within a specified time, an absolute offer to return and demand by the buyer was necessary to the rise of a right of action in him, since all acts in their nature conditions precedent to the exercise of an option must be performed to obligate the promisor.

9. CORPORATIONS ⇨121—PURCHASE OF STOCK—OPTION TO RETURN—EXERCISE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a buyer of stock to enforce his security for performance by the seller of a contract to repurchase such stock at a certain price if it did not reach such price within a specified time, evidence held insufficient to support finding that plaintiff buyer made absolute a tender back of the stock.

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE ¶138—HUSBAND'S AGENCY FOR WIFE—AUTHORITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against husband and wife to enforce security given by the wife as surety for performance of the husband's contract, evidence held insufficient to warrant finding that the wife authorized her husband to extend the duration of his liability under the contract which she had secured.

13. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ¶97—LIABILITY OF SURETY—UNAUTHORIZED EXTENSION—EFFECT.

The attempted unauthorized extension of a surety's liability by act of his principal discharges him, relieving his property of any lien with which it was charged to secure the obligation.

14. HUSBAND AND WIFE ¶133—CONVEYANCE TO WIFE BY HUSBAND—INTEREST OF HUSBAND IN PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a wife, as surety for her husband, to enforce a trust deed to her property, given to secure his obligation, evidence held sufficient to show that such husband never had any interest in such property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 487-494; Dec. Dig. ¶133.]

15. MORTGAGES ¶209—DEED OF TRUST TO SECURE CONTRACT—RECONVEYANCE BY TRUSTEE—LIABILITY.

The vendor of stock guaranteed to repurchase it at a certain price if it did not reach such price within a specified time, he and his wife executing a trust deed to a third party to secure the performance of the contract. According to the terms of the trust the trustee was to reconvey the property if there was no default of the husband on or before the time specified for the return at the option of the buyer. Being informed that the buyer was satisfied, and having no knowledge to the contrary of any fact that made it his duty to inquire further, the trustee reconveyed to his grantors after such date. Held, that, since if the buyer of the stock desired the trustee to hold the property, he should have informed him of any extension of time for the return of the stock granted by the seller, such trustee was not liable to such buyer for his conveyance back to the trustors.

16. MORTGAGES ¶209—DEED OF TRUST TO SECURE CONTRACT—RECONVEYANCE BY TRUSTEE—LIABILITY.

Held, also, that the buyer of stock had no recovery against the trustee, since he had suffered no detriment through the reconveyance; the land in the hands of the grantors being subject to the same burden as though it were held by the trustee.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by Paul C. Alexander against P. H. Bosworth and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed on rehearing.

W. T. Kearney, of San Francisco, for appellants. Finch & Melsted, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. A rehearing was granted in this case, and counsel for both parties have spared no efforts further to enlighten the court in reference to the vital questions involved herein. The character of the property, whether community or separate, has received special consideration, and in the briefs the various decisions of the appellate courts of this state have been carefully analyzed and distinguished. We deem it necessary, however, to call specific attention to only two or three of these, as there can be little question about the law, although, admittedly, some inaccurate expressions are employed in a few of the opinions.

In Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 605, 65 Pac. 322, it is said:

"A deed of conveyance is not merely evidence of a gift or other grant. It is the gift or grant itself, and ipso facto operates to transfer or convey the title of the property described to the grantee. Civ. Code, §§ 1053, 1146; Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 11, 13, 28 Pac. 50. * * * Under our law, a husband may make a deed—whether of his own or community property—to his wife, and in such case it is well settled that, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intent, the deed will vest in her the land conveyed as her separate property" (citing cases).

In Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 649, 77 Pac. 658, it is declared:

"The same principle applies where the deed is made by a third party to the wife at the husband's request. * * * Here all presumptions are in favor of the conveyances to the wife. They are presumed to have been made for a consideration paid by the wife, or, if we concede that the consideration was paid by the husband, it will be presumed that the property was intended as a gift to the wife as her separate property. * * * Facts must be proven from which it is clearly made to appear that the property, in such case, is community property, or the deed will be given effect according to its terms."

In Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 283, 104 Pac. 311, it is said:

"The well-settled rule is, as stated in Nilson v. Sarmiento, 153 Cal. 524, 96 Pac. 315, 126 Am. St. Rep. 91, 'where a husband purchases property with community funds, and directs the conveyance to be made to his wife, with the intent to make it her separate property, the deed will operate to vest the property in her as her separate estate.' The 'intent' to make it hers, her separate property, is a material factor in such a case; and, while such intent may, and possibly must, be inferred where there is no other evidence than that showing the mere direction by the husband, it may also be shown not to have existed by any competent evidence."

Without quotation, we may refer also, for an interesting discussion of the question, to Carle v. Heller, 18 Cal. App. 577, 123 Pac. 815.

[1, 2] Applying to the facts here the foregoing enunciated principles, it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that the realty in controversy was the separate property of the wife. It was deeded to her on March 7, 1905. Since her husband attended to the transfer, he knew, of course, that she was the grantee named in the deed. He must be presumed to have intended the natural consequence of such conveyance. Granting that it was purchased with community funds, we must assume that the husband intended to make a gift of it to his wife. There is not a syllable of evidence that his intention was otherwise. There is no showing that either was not acting in the utmost good faith. There is not a suspicious circumstance connected with the transaction. There is no evidence even that he was in debt at the time, or that he had in view any possible creditors, or that his motive in having the property conveyed to his wife was to prejudice any one whatsoever. It is for the court to determine his intention from his acts, declarations, and conduct at the time. Killian v. Killian, 10 Cal. App. 318, 101 Pac. 806; Woods v. Whitney, 42 Cal. 358. It must be remembered that this conveyance to the wife was executed more than three years before the execution of the guaranty in question. If these instruments had been coincident or nearly so in their origin, some suspicion might thereby be cast upon said deed, but no such condition exists. The only circumstance relied upon by respondent is the fact that the husband continued in the management of the property. This, however, is equally consistent with separate ownership in the wife as in the community. Most wives prefer to have their husbands attend to all business matters in relation to the property of either or both. We may take it for granted that this is the ordinary and natural condition, and in this case it is quite evident from the record that Mrs. Bosworth desired her husband to assume all the responsibility of that character.

We may say, then, that, independent of the legal presumptions, no evidence of the intention that moved Mr. Bosworth in having the deed executed to his wife is inconsistent with the terms of the deed itself. In fact, we may go further and say that what there is—slight as it may be—strengthens the presumption that it was intended to be her separate property. For Mrs. Bosworth testified that "Paul Bosworth never had any interest in the property," and, on cross-examination he testified that he claimed "to have no interest in the property."

[3] It seems equally clear that plaintiff did not exercise his option to sell the stock. Instead of making a tender he submitted an alternative proposition to Bosworth, and the latter accepted the agreement to extend the time. It cannot be said that there was any waiver of the tender. The rule as to that is:

"In order to constitute an implied waiver of an offer or tender by refusal of the other party to perform his promise, there must be a distinct and unequivocally absolute refusal to perform the promise, which must be treated and acted upon as such by the party to whom the promise was made." Hanson v. Slaven, 98 Cal. 377, 33 Pac. 266.

Respondent relies upon section 1440 of the Civil Code to excuse his failure to make tender, but that can afford him no comfort. Mr. Bosworth did not give notice to Mr. Alexander before the latter was in default that he, the former, would not perform his promise. Mr. Alexander submitted the new proposition before anything was said about Bosworth's ability to pay the money. As far as the original contract is concerned, therefore, Alexander was first in default, and, besides, it does not appear that Bosworth could and would not have secured the money for the repurchase by the 1st of July if Alexander had insisted upon it. Assuredly there is no evidence to support the allegation of the complaint "that prior to the 1st day of July, A. D. 1909, plaintiff herein demanded that said P. H. Bosworth should repurchase said shares of stock, and tendered said stock to said P. H. Bosworth."

After further consideration we adhere to our former opinion, which is as follows:

"The amended complaint alleges that the defendant P. H. Bosworth, on October 14, 1908, executed a contract wherein he guaranteed that a certain 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the San Francisco Concrete Building Construction Company, sold to plaintiff by said Bosworth, would be worth $1 per share on July 1, 1909, and that the plaintiff, Alexander, should have the option of retransferring said stock to said defendant, on July 1, 1909, provided said Alexander made a tender and demand under said option on or before said last-named date; that the performance of said guaranty and agreement was secured by a certain deed of trust of certain improved real property in San Francisco, said deed of trust being executed by defendant P. H. Bosworth and his wife, said defendant Agnes C. Bosworth, to P. C. Huntington; 'that prior to the 1st day of July, A. D. 1909, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, plaintiff herein demanded that said P. H. Bosworth should repurchase said shares of stock, and tendered said stock to said P. H. Bosworth; that then and there said P. H. Bosworth requested said plaintiff herein to retain said shares of stock temporarily and waive in writing the right of said plaintiff herein to demand the retransfer of said stock, and said defendant P. H. Bosworth did then and there agree with said plaintiff herein that said deed of trust should continue as security for said sum of $1,000 indefinitely until the said property had been sold, and said P. H. Bosworth did then and there indorse in writing upon said guaranty the words appearing upon the top of said guaranty, and reading as follows, to wit: "This guaranty is good indefinitely until property is sold." Then follow allegations of the transfer of said property by said Huntington on July 13, 1910 (1909?) to said P. H. Bosworth, and by the latter, on October 2, 1909, to Virginia Bosworth, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and that each of said transfers was made without any consideration whatever, and with the intent to defraud plaintiff, and for the purpose of destroying his security and of defeating his right to secure said sum of $1,000 from said defendant P. H. Bosworth. The prayer was for annulment of these deeds, and that Virginia Bosworth be compelled to execute to a trustee to be appointed by the court a trust deed in conformity with the terms of said guaranty and that said trustee be authorized and directed to sell said property and from the proceeds thereof to pay to plaintiff herein said sum of $1,000 and interest.

"The answer of Agnes C. Bosworth tendered an issue as to each of the material allegations of the complaint, except as to the execution of said deed of trust, and averred that 'she never had any notice or knowledge of said indorsement, and never consented to the making of the same, and the same, if made, was entirely without consideration,' that said property was, at all times mentioned in the complaint, her sole and separate property, and 'that all the said conveyances and deeds mentioned in said complaint were duly recorded more than one year before the commencement of this action, and that said plaintiff had actual and full knowledge of the same for more than one year before the beginning of this action.' It was further averred that Huntington had no notice or knowledge of said indorsement upon said guaranty, that he never consented to the making of the same, and that said conveyances were all openly and fairly made for a good and valuable consideration, and without any fraudulent intent or purpose to defeat any right of plaintiff.

"The findings were in favor of plaintiff, and he was awarded judgment against P. H. Bosworth, Agnes C. Bosworth, and P. C. Huntington for the sum of $1,000, with interest from October 15, 1908, and it was decreed that plaintiff holds a lien on said real property, that said conveyances thereof are, and each of them is, null and void and of no effect, and that said property be sold to satisfy said claim of plaintiff.

"The said trust deed, as recited therein, was 'for the purpose of securing the due and full performance of the obligations that may arise by reason of the sale of 8,000 shares of the stock or part thereof, and by reason of the making in connection with said sale or sales of said guaranty and agreement on the part of P. H. Bosworth,' and it was expressly provided therein: 'First. If on the 1st day of July, 1909, the said P. H. Bosworth shall fail or neglect to pay the sum of one dollar per share, for each and every share offered to be resold to said P. H. Bosworth by any purchaser who shall have bought from said P. H. Bosworth, any part of the aforesaid eight thousand shares under the aforesaid offer of sale and who shall before the said first day of July, 1909, exercise the option of reselling the said shares to said P. H. Bosworth, as provided for in and by the guaranty and agreement aforesaid, then and in that event and on application of any purchaser who has properly exercised his option and from whom said P. H. Bosworth has failed or neglected to buy back said shares or any part thereof as agreed, the said party of the second part shall sell the above granted premises in the manner hereinafter set forth and shall, on behalf of said P. H. Bosworth, with the proceeds of said sale, repurchase said shares in the manner hereinafter set forth. Secondly. In case said P. H. Bosworth shall well and truly perform his obligations arising under and by virtue of the guaranty and agreement aforesaid, and shall buy back at one dollar per share any and all of said eight thousand shares that shall be offered to said P. H. Bosworth in the proper exercise of the option aforesaid, then the said party of the second part and his heirs shall reconvey all the estate in the premises aforesaid to the parties of the first part, or to either of said parties of the first part upon the request of and as requested by said parties of the first part.' It was further provided that: 'If the option aforesaid is not exercised on or before July 1st, 1909, the purchaser will be deemed to have elected to keep the shares of stock.'

[4, 5] "The nature of P. H. Bosworth's original obligation is not the subject of controversy. His promise, as seen, was to repurchase the stock at $1 per share, provided that the purchaser from him exercised his option to sell on or before July 1, 1909. Of course, if said option was not exercised within said period of time, Bosworth would be released from any obligation or duty in the premises. Agnes C. Bosworth did not sign this conditional contract of repurchase but, as we have seen, she joined in the execution of said trust deed, and thereby she became a guarantor or surety for the faithful performance of P. H. Bosworth's obligation, and she subjected her interest in said property to a charge or lien to answer for the default of her husband. It is probably not important whether we consider her contract technically a guaranty or suretyship, as the measure of her obligation is not thereby affected. She certainly promised 'to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage' of said P. H. Bosworth, and therefore her contract is within the Code definition of guaranty. Section 2787, Civ. Code. Her relation to the transaction is, however, more strictly expressed in the language of section 2831 of said Code as follows: 'A surety is one who at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor.' She became responsible for the performance of said act on the part of P. H. Bosworth in favor of the purchasers of said stock, and she hypothecated her property as security for the performance of said act. The measure of her obligation could not, of course, exceed that of her principal. She was required to answer only for his default, and that was conditional, as we have seen, upon a demand for the repurchase of the stock.

[6] "The position of Huntington was that of a trustee charged with the duty of disposing of said property so as to satisfy the demand of the purchaser of stock in case of the default of said P. H. Bosworth, and in the event that there was no default on July 1, 1909, he was to reconvey the property to the Bosworths, or to either, as directed. This deed of trust operated, in other words, as a mortgage of said property as security for the performance of said obligation of P. H. Bosworth. 'A mortgage is a pledge or security for a debt, whatever may be the form which the transaction takes, whether a simple mortgage deed in form, or a mortgage with a power of sale, or a deed in trust, or a deed absolute on its face, accompanied by an agreement in writing to reconvey, or to sell, or to do any other thing upon the payment of a certain sum of money; courts of equity look upon it as a mortgage and deal with it as such. And it is immaterial that the conveyance is made to a third person, and not to the creditor himself.' Perry on Trusts, § 609d. 'Such deeds may be executed for the payment of debts or for the performance of any kind of a legal obligation, whether of the grantor or of a third person,' Id. § 602f.

[7-9] "What, then, was the situation of the parties at the beginning of this action? Had P. H. Bosworth suffered default on July 1, 1909, within the contemplation of said contract of guaranty? The answer to this question depends, manifestly, upon the consideration whether plaintiff had exercised his said option to sell his stock. In other words, did he make a tender of it and demand the repurchase by P. H. Bosworth? The latter testified positively to the negative, but it is claimed by respondent that a contrary view is supported by his own testimony. This, in full, was as follows: 'I had a conversation with Mr. Bosworth in regard to this stock at my office a number of days prior to July 1, 1909, at which Mr. Bosworth and myself, and no one else, was present. I was, of course, anxious about my money that was tied up in this proposition, and had him come to my office and told him that I wanted either my money or a further guaranty. He told me he was not in a position to pay me the money at the time, but was willing to extend the guaranty of stock, which he did. He wrote a further guaranty on the original guaranty as follows: "This guaranty is good indefinitely, until property is sold. P. H. Bosworth." This extension of the guaranty was written at the top of the original guaranty by Mr. Bosworth, in my office at the time he called there, which was several days before July 1, 1909. I did not ask anybody besides Mr. Bosworth to give me back this money. I never asked Mr. Huntington to give me this money, nor did I ask Mrs. Agnes Coryell Bosworth for the money; I never served any notice, or made any demand upon Mr. Huntington to hold this property. I presume that I merely relied upon the extension of the guaranty written by Mr. Bosworth upon the original guaranty. I never attempted to sell the stock to anybody, and I am morally certain that it was worthless.'

"It is a well-settled principle, applicable to options as to other contracts, that the offer must be accepted in the terms in which it is made, and the alteration of such terms, or the addition of any condition or limitation, is tantamount to a rejection of the original offer and the making of a counter offer; and, furthermore, where the exercise of an option depends upon the performance of acts which are in their nature or by express agreement made conditions precedent to such exercise, all such acts must be strictly performed. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 21, p. 930.

"Thus, where one has the option to return certain stock purchased and to receive a specified price therefor, he must actually return it, and it is not sufficient to deposit it in a bank and notify the vendor of the fact. Orvis v. Waite, 58 Ill. App. 504.

"We think it is very clear that there was, in the instant case, no such exercise of plaintiff's option as the law exacts. There was no tender of the stock, and there was no demand for the payment of the money. Indeed, a counter offer was submitted, which was accepted by Bosworth, and thereby a new contract was created. The evidence, viewed most favorably for respondent, shows that he did not stand upon his original contract, but was entirely willing to have it supplanted by a totally different guaranty, and he did not take the step that was necessary to convert Bosworth's conditional contract into one fixed and absolute.

"As plaintiff did not exercise his option to buy within the time specified, the evidence does not support the finding of the court 'that prior to the first day of July A. D. 1909, at the city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff herein demanded that said P. H. Bosworth should repurchase said shares of stock, and tendered said stock to said P. H. Bosworth,' and he acquired no right under the original contract to bring an action against any of the parties defendant. It may be observed, also, that if plaintiff intended to count upon the first contract of warranty he should not have waited for nearly two years before instituting the action. Sayre v. Gas, Light & Heat Co., 69 Cal. 207, 7 Pac. 437, 10 Pac. 408; Chapman v. Bank of California, 97 Cal. 155, 31 Pac. 896. The fact is, however, that he relied and still relies upon the second contract whereby the time for the repurchase of the stock was indefinitely extended.

[10] "Nothing is alleged against the validity of this agreement, and we may assume that it was binding upon P. H. Bosworth, but we can find no warrant for holding that Mrs. Bosworth was or is subject to its operation. There is not a particle of evidence that she consented to it or had any knowledge or information concerning it. Nor was it shown that P. H. Bosworth was authorized to represent her in the transaction. She was not made liable either by her acts or by her conduct. It surely cannot be maintained that Bosworth was her agent for this purpose by virtue of the fact that he was her husband, or for the reason that she intrusted him with the management of other business matters. The only shadow of reason for respondent's contention is furnished by her testimony as follows: 'My cousin has never been fully paid back the amount which we borrowed from him with which to buy the lot. I do not know how much we still owe him. I don't know whether my husband would know how much we owe him or not. We never talk those things over. My husband attends to all of those matters, and I don't attend to any business affairs at all, and I don't know whether the mortgages to the Hibernia Bank have been paid off or not. I took no part in the business affairs of the San Francisco Concrete Building Construction Company. I had nothing to do with it at all. I did not want to turn the property over to Mr. Huntington, but my husband talked me into it. He almost forced me to do it. He asked me to turn the property over to Mr. Huntington, and I did so. I had nothing whatever to do with the business and my husband attended to all that so far as the Bosworth family was concerned.' The foregoing does not justify the inference that he was authorized to extend the guaranty. On the contrary, she was reluctant to execute it in the first instance and, furthermore, she testified: 'The proposition of my making the deed to Mr. Huntington, as I thought, was that it should be in trust for a certain time.'

[11] "Of course, a party cannot be bound by a contract that he has not made or authorized, and the principle is well settled that the liability of a surety is not to be extended, without his consent, beyond the precise terms of his contract. Section 2819, Civ. Code; Pierce v. Whitney, 63 Cal. 543.

[12] "It is also true that the burden of proof was upon plaintiff to show that Agnes C. Bosworth consented to the extension of the original obligation. Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 665, 55 Pac. 682. In this he failed, although his attention was called to the consideration by express averments in the answer.

"The two cases cited by respondent do not support his contention. The important question in Tuohy v. Woods, supra, was as to the burden of proof in reference to the consent of the surety where there was an extension of time for payment, and the Supreme Court said: 'When a surety has shown that the contract as to which he became surety has been changed, he has then shown that there has been an attempt to make him liable on a new and different contract; and the burden is then upon the other party to show that the surety has consented to the new contract.'

"In Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298; 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982, there was positive evidence that the husband was authorized to act for the wife in the very transaction.

[13, 14] "Agnes C. Bosworth having been exonerated from liability by the execution of another guaranty to which she was not a party, her property was relieved of the lien with which it was charged to secure her obligation. It may be conceded that any interest in said property held by P. H. Bosworth would still be subject to the burden; but, under the evidence as disclosed by the record, it must be held that it was the separate property of his wife. The deed was made to her alone, and therefore the presumption follows that it was her separate property. Section 164, Civ. Code. The evidence that the property was purchased partly by money borrowed on mortgage security thereon would strengthen the presumption. Dymont v. Nelson, 166 Cal. 38, 134 Pac. 988. Besides, she testified positively that 'Paul Bosworth never had any interest in the property.' There was no evidence to the contrary.

[15, 16] "We think also that there is no warrant for the judgment for $1,000 against Huntington. It is not doubted that a trustee is held to a strict accountability for his stewardship. He acted, however, in the utmost good faith, and the court so found. According to the terms of the trust he was to convey to the trustees if there was no delict of P. H. Bosworth on or before July 1, 1909. He was informed that the purchasers were satisfied, and he had no knowledge to the contrary or of any fact that would make it his duty to make further inquiry. It could not be expected that he would consult the books of the corporation to ascertain the names of all the stockholders and then seek of them information as to whether there had been any default. If plaintiff desired the trustee to still hold the property he should have informed him of the extension of the guaranty by P. H. Bosworth.

"Aside from the foregoing, it is apparent that plaintiff suffered no detriment from the conveyance executed by Huntington. The title having become reinvested in Agnes C. Bosworth, the land was subject to the same burden as though it were still held by Huntington for the purpose of the trust, and the remedy of plaintiff or the availability of his security was not affected in the least by said action of the trustee. Moreover, if it be true, as we have stated, that the liability of Agnes C. Bosworth terminated, the trust thereby became extinguished, and Huntington was justified in conveying the land as he was directed."

We think the judgment and the order should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

In Bank. Application for writ of supersedeas by William V. Bryan against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another to stay execution on a judgment against him. Petition dismissed.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for petitioner. P. L. Benjamin, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. William V. Bryan has petitioned for supersedeas to stay execution on the judgment against him in Levey et al. v. Hockwald et al., pending his appeal from an order denying his motion to set aside the said judgment. In his petition he alleges that he was one of the defendants in that certain action mentioned above, which was commenced in July, 1906, for the purpose of having a certain indenture of lease to property in San Francisco declared forfeited, and for the purpose also of obtaining possession of said premises, and of securing judgment for rent and for damages. He avers that in May, 1913, judgment in said action was entered against him for $3,500; that without his knowledge, permission, or consent, an attorney at law Edwin L. Forster by name, had assumed to represent him in said litigation; and that petitioner had no notice of the setting of the cause for trial, or the trial thereof or the entry of judgment therein until June, 1913. The petition recites his application within six months after entry of judgment to have said judgment set aside, the denial of his motion, and his appeal from the order refusing to grant the relief sought. That appeal is still pending (S. F. No. 7228), and, although appellant in that case (petitioner here) has filed that which is in form a stay bond, he seeks to have the judgment stayed by the court on the ground that the said bond will not operate on the judgment itself and that the issuance of execution, which is threatened, will deprive him of the fruits of victory if he shall be successful in his appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment. This court, upon reading the petition, issued an order to show cause and stayed proceedings upon the judgment until the hearing and determination of said order.

[1] It seems to be agreed by petitioner and respondents that the judgment is not stayed by the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment. Indeed, this court has declared that, except on an appeal from an order refusing a new trial, the judgment is not stayed by an appeal from an order made after judgment and by the filing of a bond. Carit v. Williams, 67 Cal. 580, 8 Pac. 93; Credits Commutation Co. v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 82 73 Pac. 1009; Weldon v. Rogers, 154 Cal. 634, 98 Pac. 1070. In the case last cited the court reviews the authorities holding that a bond on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial does oper-

BRYAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 7210.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ↪460—REFUSAL TO SET ASIDE JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF APPEAL.

A judgment is not stayed by an appeal from an order refusing to set it aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2217-2226, 2245, 2246; Dec. Dig. ↪460.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ↪479—JUDGMENT—SUPERSEDEAS—JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT.

The Supreme Court, though authorized to issue in a proper case supersedeas to stay execution on a judgment, will not issue the writ on the application of a defendant appealing from an order refusing to set aside the judgment, where it appears that defendant was duly served with summons, but made no arrangement for representation by counsel, though an attorney without authority to act for him appeared at the trial.

ate to stay the enforcement of the judgment, and it is there held that "this is the sole exception to the rule."

[2] Petitioner therefore bases his request for a writ of supersedeas upon the alleged inherent power of this court to make his appeal effectual by supersedeas, after requiring a sufficient bond. In Carit v. Williams, supra, it was intimated that the court had such power, and in Weldon v. Rogers, supra, the court expressed no doubt regarding the proposition, but found that an authoritative decision upon the subject was not called for. In the later case of Rogers v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 468, 111 Pac. 357, this court issued a writ of supersedeas staying proceedings on an order evidently improperly made, directing the sale of alleged perishable property, pending an appeal from said order. It was there held that such a writ may issue under proper circumstances, and that the court has inherent power in the premises.

But we do not think this a proper occasion for the exercise of the discretion of this court in petitioner's behalf, even granting that upon proper showing we would issue the writ. While he alleges that the attorney who appeared for him was not authorized so to do and that the trial of the action and the entry of judgment were had without his knowledge, Mr. Bryan does not deny that he was duly served with summons nor assert that he made any arrangement for representation by other counsel. In order that he might show to this court that he suffered under peculiar hardship, it would be necessary for him, at the very least, to allege some facts which would excuse his failure to appear at all in the case. If in fact he was served with summons and made no appearance, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to a judgment by default and he could not complain of the result obtained after he had been represented by an attorney who acted without authorization. Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelech, 141 Cal. 8, 74 Pac. 352; Fitzgerald v. Fernandez, 71 Cal. 509, 12 Pac. 562; Hunter v. Bryant, 98 Cal. 251, 33 Pac. 55.

The petition of William V. Bryan for a writ of supersedeas, therefore, is denied, and the order to show cause is dismissed.

EMERSON v. KENNEDY MIN. & MILL. CO.
et al. (Sac. 2117.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1915.)

PUBLIC LANDS 39—TOWN-SITE PATENT—MINERAL RIGHTS—LACHES.

A town-site patent, issued under Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2387-2394 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 4791-4793, 4797, 4798, 4800, 4801), embraced territory consisting of mining claims previously located and worked under the mining laws and known to be valuable. The locators applied to the county judge for a conveyance thereof and in pursuance of the application, the judge executed a conveyance to the claimants as tenants in common. Thereafter neither the grantees nor their successors did any work necessary to hold their rights to the property as a mining claim. Forty years after the county judge's entry of the land as a town site, plaintiff located the property as mining claims and brought suit to quiet title. Held, that since the town-site patent was not absolutely void as to the known mineral lands within its territory or as to mines actually at that time located, occupied, and worked, notwithstanding section 2392, providing that no title shall be acquired to any mine or any valuable mining claim or possession under existing laws, plaintiff's claim was barred by lapse of time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Henry D. Emerson against the Kennedy Mining & Milling Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, rendered on sustaining a demurrer to the second amended complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Spagnoli & Spagnoli, of Jackson, for appellant. Curtis H. Lindley and Wm. E. Colby, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The court below sustained a demurrer to the second amended complaint and thereupon gave the judgment in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The action concerns the title to a parcel of land described as lot 19, block 11, of the town site of Jackson, in Amador county. The object of the action is to declare the defendant's claim of title and the instrument under which it claims invalid and to quiet the title of the plaintiff to said land. The defense offered by the defendants is that the plaintiff's action is barred by laches, and that his claim is a stale claim which will not be entertained or enforced by a court of equity. The basis of this defense will appear from the following statement of facts taken from the allegations of the complaint:

In the year 1870 the county judge of Amador county made entry of some 600 acres of land as a town site under the act of March 2, 1867, afterwards codified as sections 2387 to 2394 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, said entry being made for the use and benefit of the occupants of the several parcels of land embraced within the said territory, among which was the aforesaid lot 19, block 11. Afterwards, in pursuance of said entry, a United States patent to said lands was issued to said county judge for the benefit of the said inhabitants and occupants of the respective parcels, which patent was duly recorded in the recorder's office of the county. At the time of the said entry by the county judge and of the issuance of said patent to him of said town site, the territory embraced in lot 19 aforesaid consisted of two mining claims, known, respectively, as the Austrian quartz mine and the Steckler quartz mine, both of which had been previously located, possessed, and worked under the mining laws of the United States and were then and there valuable gold mines and known to be such. They had been regularly located as mining claims by Charles Steckler, who located the Steckler quartz mine, and by George White, who located Austrian quartz mine. After the entry of the town site, and before the issuance of the patent, Steckler and White made application to the county judge claiming possession of said mining claims, which had been previously surveyed under the town-site act as lot No. 19 aforesaid, and asking for a conveyance thereof, in pursuance of which, on January 6, 1872, the said county judge executed a conveyance to the said parties as tenants in common of said land. In 1889, White conveyed his interest in the property to Sultana J. White. In 1902 Sultana J. White recovered judgment against Dora Steckler and others, said to be the heirs of Charles Steckler, declaring said Sultana J. White to be the owner of all of the said property, and that said defendants had no title thereto. About the same time Dora Steckler and others conveyed their interest therein to Sultana J. White. Afterwards, in April, 1902, Sultana J. White conveyed the property to Samuel W. Bright. Bright died seised of whatever interest he thereby acquired in said property, and after due proceedings in the administration of the estate the said lot was sold and conveyed by the administrator on April 25, 1910, to Robert I. Kerr. Kerr, on April 26, 1910, conveyed the same to the defendant Kennedy Mining & Milling Company. It appears that after acquiring title from the county judge under the town-site law Steckler and White ceased to perform the assessment work necessary to hold their rights to property as a mining claim, under the laws of the United States for the perpetuation of the miner's location thereto, and that none of their several successors in interest ever performed such assessment work. The plaintiff, Emerson, learning of this condition of the property, on April 5, 1910, located the said property as mining claims, asserting the right to do so under the aforesaid mining laws of the United States, designating the same, respectively, as the North Jackson Gate quartz claim and the South Jackson Gate quartz claim. Claiming to be the owner by virtue of these locations he brought this action basing his ownership solely on his right under the said mining locations.

The claim of the plaintiff is that inasmuch as the property was mineral in character, was known to be valuable for gold at the time of the town-site entry, and was at that time actually located and worked as a mine under the mining laws, no title was acquired thereto by virtue of the United States patent or the subsequent deed of the county judge. This claim is based on the provisions of section 2392 of the United States Revised Statutes, providing that:

"No title shall be acquired, under the foregoing provisions of this chapter, to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper; or to any valid mining claim or possession held under existing laws."

If the plaintiff's mining location had been made within a reasonable time after the town-site patent and the conveyance thereunder and the forfeiture of the property as a mining claim by reason of the failure to do the requisite assessment work, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff should prevail, unless it should be held that Steckler and White, by applying for their conveyance under the town-site law and obtaining the same, had merged the mining claim into a claim under the town-site law and had accepted the patent under that law as a sufficient conveyance of their mining right, so that no further confirmation of title from the United States would be necessary. This proposition, however, we do not find it necessary to determine, for we are of the opinion that whatever the right of a claimant who had located his claim, under the mining laws, within a reasonable time, might be, the claim of the plaintiff under his location of April, 1910, is barred as a stale claim.

The plaintiff's theory is that the patent under the town-site law, so far as this land was concerned, was absolutely void by reason of the fact that said land at that time was a known gold mine and a valid mining location under the mining law, and, consequently, that no rights could be acquired under the town-site deed, either against the United States or against any subsequent location of a mining right under the United States. It is not correct to say that a town-site patent is absolutely void, with regard to known mineral lands embraced within the territory, or with regard to mines actually at that time located, occupied, and worked. The Supreme Court of the United States upon this subject holds that:

"A patent issued in proper form, upon a judgment rendered after a due examination of the subject by officers of the Land Department, charged with its preparation and issue, that the lands were nonmineral, would, unless set aside and annulled by direct proceedings, estop the government from contending to the contrary, and, as we have already said, in the absence of fraud in the officers of the department, would be conclusive in subsequent proceedings respecting the title." Barden v. Northern Pacific Railroad, 154 U. S. 331, 14 Sup. Ct. 1059, 38 L. Ed. 992.

The "judgment" there said to be conclusive was, of course, the mere ex parte decision of the officers of the Land Department. The case of Moran v. Horsky, 178 U. S. 205, 20 Sup. Ct. 856, 44 L. Ed. 1038, is to the same effect.

In a case of this character where a patent has been regularly issued by the United States for land, some of which is mineral in character, the title to which would not pass if its mineral character were ascertained and declared, and a location under the mining laws is made after the lapse of many years, the courts of the United States have declared that the claim should be considered as stale and the action barred. In United States v. Beebe (C. C.) 17 Fed. 39, speaking of a case where the patents attacked by the United States had been issued some 43 years before the filing of the bill, the court said:

"The authorities support the proposition that lapse of time may be a good defense in equity, independently of any statute of limitations, and they show that the doctrine rests not alone upon laches; it is often put upon one or all of the following grounds, namely: First, that courts of equity must, for the peace of society and upon grounds of public policy, discourage stale demands by refusing to entertain them; second, that lapse of time will, if long enough, be regarded as evidence against the stale claim equal to that of credible witnesses, and which, being disregarded, would, in a majority of cases, lead to unjust judgments; third, that, after the witnesses who had personal knowledge of the facts have all passed away, it is impossible to ascertain the facts, and courts of equity will, on this ground, refuse to undertake such a task."

Accordingly, the court held that the United States and all its citizens claiming under the mining laws were alike barred from the assertion of such a claim. This decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, page 347, 8 Sup. Ct. 1083, page 1088 (32 L. Ed. 121). The court there said:

"We are of the opinion that when the government is a mere formal complainant in a suit, not for the purpose of asserting any public right or protecting any public interest, title, or property, but merely to form a conduit through which one private person can conduct litigation against another private person, a court of equity will not be restrained from administering the equities existing between the real parties by any exemption of the government designed for the protection of the rights of the United States alone. The mere use of its name in a suit for the benefit of a private suitor cannot extend its immunity as a sovereign government to said private suitor, whereby he can avoid and escape the scrutiny of a court of equity into the matters pleaded against him by the other party, nor stop the court from examining into and deciding the case according to the principles governing courts of equity in like cases between private litigants."

There are many cases of similar character. Moran v. Horsky, supra, was very like the case at bar. The court there said, 178 U. S. page 213, 20 Sup. Ct. page 859, 44 L. Ed. 1038:

"It is well settled that when the government proceeds to set aside its patent, not for the sake of establishing its own right to the property, but in the interest of some person who has an equitable claim thereto, or to whom the government owes the duty of protecting his interests, it is subjected to the same defenses of laches, limitation, and want of equity that would attach to a like suit by an individual."

Under these authorities the United States itself could not maintain the action which the plaintiff is here prosecuting. A fortiori, the plaintiff cannot be allowed to do so.

The rule has been applied in cases where the lapse of time has been much less than 40 years, in some cases not exceeding 14 years. St. Paul, etc., v. Sage, 49 Fed. 315, 1 C. C. A. 256; Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. 224, 12 Sup. Ct. 418, 36 L. Ed. 134. See, also, Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 249, 81 Pac. 516.

Applying these principles to the case at bar, it is clear that the plaintiff is barred. The court will conclusively presume, in aid of the defendants and those under whom they claim, who have so long relied on the validity of the town-site patent, that the mining locations, by virtue of which it is claimed the patent failed to convey title, had been abandoned, or that the mineral therein had all been extracted long before the plaintiff initiated his location, and the plaintiff's claim will be held to be stale and not enforceable in a court of equity.

The plaintiff relies on the decision of this court in Callahan v. James, 141 Cal. 291, 74 Pac. 853. The facts in that case, however, were practically the reverse of the facts here appearing. There the claimant of the mining right had remained in possession under his mining location, occupying and working the mining claim under the mining law and doing the necessary assessment work from the year 1854 until the year 1879, when the patentee of the town site conveyed to defendant's predecessors. The mining claimant had not abandoned his claim, but had remained in possession and was continuing to work the mine at the time the defendant acquired his supposed title under the town-site law. The mining right had never been forfeited and, under the provisions of section 2392 aforesaid, the title thereto, as against him, never passed to the grantee under the town-site law.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the court below decided correctly in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1915.
Rehearing Denied April 29, 1915.)

APPEAL AND ERROR $\Leftrightarrow$ 115—ORDERS APPEALABLE—ORDER OF SALE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, providing that an appeal may be taken from a judgment or order against or in favor of directing the sale of real property, an order denying the motion of the purchaser to set aside a sale ordered, and confirmed by the probate court is not appealable..

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna E. McCarty, deceased. From an order denying his motion to set aside an order of sale, P. L. Wilson appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, A. W. Ashburn, Jr., and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, and Edwin A. Meserve and Paul H. McPherrin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is in form an appeal by one P. L. Wilson from an order denying his motion to set aside an order of sale in the estate of Anna E. McCarty, deceased. The only connection of appellant with said estate is that of purchaser of the real property thereof, sold and confirmed to him by the probate court under and by virtue of the order of sale and subsequent proceedings which he attacked in his motion. On February 8, 1913, the court made an order authorizing the executor of the estate to sell the real property, and on December 6, 1913, an order was made confirming the sale of certain of the lands of the estate to the appellant herein. On May 2, 1914, appellant served and filed notice of motion to vacate and set aside the order of February 8, 1913, and all subsequent proceedings pertaining to the sale of the property, on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order and to entertain the other proceedings involved. On May 9, 1914, the motion was denied after argument. It will thus be seen that no appeal from the order authorizing the sale of the property of the estate, or from the order confirming the sale, is here involved, but that many months elapsed subsequent to such orders before appellant sought relief by his motion.

Respondent insists that the order attacked is not appealable. If any authority for such an appeal exists, it must be found in subdivision 3 of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Calahan, 60 Cal. 233; In re Seymour, 15 Cal. App. 290, 114 Pac. 1023. That subdivision provides that an appeal may be taken from a judgment or order "against or in favor of directing the partition, sale or conveyance of real property."

In Estate of Smith, 51 Cal. 565, it was held that under section 969, Code of Civil Procedure (which was the same as the third subdivision of the present section 963), an order refusing to set aside an order of sale previously made is not appealable.

In Estate of Martin, 56 Cal. 208, it was held that an order directing an executor to proceed with a sale previously ordered is not appealable, and in Lutz v. Christy, 67 Cal. 457, 8 Pac. 39, the court ruled that orders refusing respectively to set aside an order of distribution and an order settling a final account were not appealable. Without further citation it may be said that the decisions have rather strictly followed the letter of the statute.

But appellant cites with apparent confidence the recent case of Estate of West, 162 Cal. 352, 122 Pac. 953, in which it was held that an order setting aside an order, previously made, confirming the sale of land of an estate of a deceased person, was appealable because it was in legal effect an order against directing the sale of real property. It does not follow, however, that an order refusing to set aside an order of sale is appealable. The basic principle underlying the decision in the matter of the Estate of West was that the order set aside by the court below gave to appellant rights which, if properly conferred, were absolute. It followed logically that an order distributing those rights—and particularly the right to a consummation of the sale—was an order against directing a conveyance. But the order which appellant here seeks to have reviewed on appeal is neither in favor of nor against the making of a conveyance. The order which was made, denying Mr. Wilson's petition, was one which neither added to nor took any force from the orders previously entered. By the order of sale certain rights were created in favor of the purchaser on the one hand and the estate on the other, if the order was not erroneously made. If error existed any interested party who felt aggrieved had a right to an appeal from that order. But an unsuccessful attack upon such an order by motion to set it aside does not create a new right of appeal involving the very questions which might have been presented on an appeal from the order of sale itself or the order of confirmation. By such an order no rights are granted or taken, no obligations are imposed or removed, and no new directions for or against the sale or conveyance are given. The order refusing to set aside the orders theretofore made, therefore, is not appealable.

It follows that the order must be and it is hereby affirmed.

EARHART et al. v. CHURCHILL CO. et al.
(Sac. 2173.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1915.)

1. PLEADING — 34 — CONSTRUCTION AGAINST PLEADER—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Where the complaint did not allege when plaintiffs reached their majority, it will be presumed that each was sui juris long enough prior to the filing of the pleading to allow the statute of limitations to operate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 5½, 66-74; Dec. Dig. — 34.]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⇨179—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

When a complaint fails to state the time of the discovery of a fraud committed more than three years before commencement of the action, a demurrer based on the statute of limitations will lie.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 668, 669; Dec. Dig. ⇨179.]

3. GUARDIAN AND WARD ⇨105 — SALE OF WARD'S PROPERTY—PURCHASE BY GUARDIAN—SETTING ASIDE—LACHES.

The fact of a guardianship will not warrant wards in delaying many years after reaching their majority in instituting their suit to set aside a purchase of their property by their guardian.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 383-389; Dec. Dig. ⇨105.]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⇨103—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST.

A guardian of infant wards acquired property of such wards. The wards, after reaching their majority and discovering the acts of the guardian, delayed many years to attack the sale. Held, that even if the guardian was guilty of fraud so that a constructive trust was raised, no repudiation of such a trust by him was necessary to start the running of limitations, and hence the action was barred by the three and five year periods prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 336 (subs. 1, 2), 338 (subd. 4), and 1573.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by Alice Amelia Earhart and others against the Churchill Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jacob F. Wetzel, of Yreka (W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, of counsel), for appellants. James R. Tapscott and James F. Farragher, both of Yreka, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. On May 29, 1909, a complaint was filed in which the plaintiffs attempted to allege two causes of action, one to quiet title to certain property in Siskiyou county, and the other based upon the asserted fraud of one Jerome Churchill as one of the administrators of the estate of Charles B. Boyes, deceased, in conducting a sale of the property involved to one Renner, who by a previous arrangement with said Churchill conveyed the land to him and to the Siskiyou County Bank. The sale was made after order of court in that behalf, and the amount obtained was the exact sum necessary to cancel a mortgage on the property, in which Jerome Churchill and the Siskiyou County Bank were the mortgagees. The date of said sale was December 21, 1895. It was alleged that before the death of said Churchill in 1908 he acquired the bank's title to the property and conveyed it to the Churchill Company, a family corporation of which he was a member. A demurrer to the second cause of action was sustained September 21, 1912, and on October 7th of that year a "first amended complaint" was filed, seeking to set up a cause of action based upon the alleged fraud. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained, and, plaintiffs failing to amend their pleading, judgment was entered against them.

It was alleged in the first amended complaint that Jerome Churchill was, at the time of his death in 1908, an administrator of the estate of Charles B. Boyes, deceased, and that he had never been discharged from the office of guardian of the minor heirs of said Boyes, to which he had been regularly appointed. It was also averred that no final accounting had ever been made in either the guardianship proceeding or the estate of Charles B. Boyes. The probate sale was made at public auction, and was confirmed by the court on January 11, 1896. The alleged fraud of Churchill was "that for the purpose of shutting out competition in bidding at said sale, and for the purpose of preventing other bids being made at said sale, other than his own," he caused the sale to be called at "about the hour of 9 o'clock" of December 21, 1895. It had been advertised to take place at 10 o'clock, and "by reason of no competitive bids the sum for which said premises were bid in was far below the real and true value thereof." It thus appears that the sale took place more than 14 years prior to the commencement of the action and more than 16 years before the filing of the first amended complaint. On the confirmation of said sale Jerome Churchill, administrator, and Margaret Jane Boyes, widow of Charles B. Boyes, and administratrix of his estate, executed to the purchaser a deed, which was recorded January 17, 1896. Thereafter the purchaser gave his deed to the property to Churchill and the Siskiyou County Bank, which was also recorded on January 17, 1896, more than 13 years prior to the commencement of the action, and said deed had been of record more than 12 years before Churchill's death. Margaret Jane Boyes continued the administration of the estate of her deceased husband until April 21, 1910, when she resigned. It is to be noted that Margaret Jane Boyes is not a party to the action in any capacity, and that since its commencement and before the filing of the first amended complaint she joined with six of her children in a deed granting to the defendants all interest in the property involved. Respondents call our attention to the further fact that the other children, appellants herein, have been of the age of majority at least since a time prior to November 27, 1903. Estate of Boyes, 151 Cal. 145, 90 Pac. 454. But we need not refer to the opinion in that case, in which, by the way, Mr. Churchill's conduct in the very transaction here attacked as fraudulent, is highly commended.

[1-3] Upon the face of the complaint itself the court was bound to sustain the demurrer. As we are not informed in the first amended complaint when John Ethan Boyes and Fannie Jane Pope or either of them reached majority, we are bound to assume, under familiar principles of pleading, that each was sui juris at a time long enough prior to the filing of the first amended complaint to allow the statute of limitations to operate if it be applicable at all. When a complaint fails to state the time of the discovery of a fraud committed more than three years before the commencement of the action, a demurrer based upon the statute of limitations will lie. Sublette v. Tinney, 9 Cal. 425. From the complaint itself it appears that record evidence of Mr. Churchill's purchase of this property has been in existence for many years, and there is no allegation that appellants were not, at all times, fully aware of the facts. Merely because he had been their guardian they were not entitled, after coming of age, to shut their eyes to the fraud, if any had been committed. Equity will not countenance stale claims, and after the lapse of so much time will strictly scrutinize such bills as this, and will send applicants for relief out of court unless they make a most meritorious showing of their right to the assistance for which they pray. Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 465, 98 Pac. 21; Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 578, 42 Pac. 1086.

[4] But appellants contend that by his fraud Mr. Churchill became their trustee, that his possession was their own, and that consequently the statute could not run against their rights. The rule which they invoke and the authorities which they cite are applicable to express trusts—not to involuntary trusts. A trustee of such a trust need not repudiate it in order that the statute should begin to run. Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 366, 14 Pac. 88; County of Los Angeles v. Winans, 13 Cal. App. 261, 109 Pac. 650; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 288, 53 Pac. 699; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 106, 50 Pac. 386. Section 338, subdivision 4, Code of Civil Procedure, was therefore applicable and was properly held by the lower court to be a bar to the action. Unkel v. Robinson, 163 Cal. 651, 126 Pac. 485. The demurrer also specified sections 318, 336 (subdivisions 1 and 2), 343, and 1573, Code of Civil Procedure, so that in any view of the pleading the action was barred and the bar of the statute properly brought to the attention of the court.

All that has been written above has assumed that the fraud was sufficiently alleged. Respondents contend with much force that the complaint failed to aver fraud with that particularity and clearness required in all bills of equity seeking such relief as is here prayed for. But we need not go into that question, as the cause of action, even if sufficiently set forth, is very clearly barred by the statute of limitations.

The judgment is affirmed.

CATES et al. v. McNEIL et al. (L. A. 3451.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1915.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨92—OPTION TO PURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION—"THEN."

An option to purchase contained in a lease for ten years, stipulating that, in case the lessee shall not exercise his option to purchase within two years from the date of the lease, "then" the right to purchase shall absolutely determine, except that he, after having paid the rent for the term, shall "then" have the right and option to purchase for a specified price, need not be exercised at the time of the last payment of rent, but may be exercised at the expiration of the term; for the word "then" is used in the sense of "in the event of," or "in such case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-294; Dec. Dig. ⇨92.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Then.]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨92—OPTION TO PURCHASE—CONSIDERATION.

An option to purchase contained in a lease for a term which stipulates that the lessee on payment of rent for the term may purchase the premises at a specified sum is not a mere offer, without consideration, of the privilege of purchasing within a specified time, which may be withdrawn before acceptance, but payment of the rent for the full term is a consideration for the irrevocable right to purchase on the lessee electing to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-294; Dec. Dig. ⇨92.]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨92—OPTION TO PURCHASE—ACCEPTANCE.

A notice by a lessee having the right to purchase the premises within a specified time for a specific price, which recites that the lessee exercises his option to purchase, and is ready and willing to pay the specified price, evidences an absolute and unqualified election to purchase, though it demands the lessor to produce a certificate of good title, and that on completion of the sale he shall convey the land free from incumbrance, and that, on notice of the deposit in a bank of certificate of title and deed, the lessee will deposit the price; for the reference to the furnishing of a certificate of title and the execution of a deed is not a condition to the acceptance of the option to purchase, but relates to the matters of carrying out the contract created by the acceptance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-294; Dec. Dig. ⇨92.]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨92—OPTION TO PURCHASE—ACCEPTANCE—CONDITIONS.

An option to purchase contained in a lease stipulating that at the end of the term the lessee, on payment of full rent, may purchase the premises for a specified sum, does not require the lessee to pay or tender payment of the price at the time of giving notice of acceptance, though payment will be essential before he is entitled to a conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-294; Dec. Dig. ⇨92.]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨57—OPTION TO PURCHASE—NOTICE OF ACCEPTANCE—OBLIGATION OF PARTIES.

In the absence of anything in the contract giving an option to purchase, the obligation of the parties in the performance of the contract on exercising the option is governed by the law governing contracts for the purchase and sale of property under which the agreement of the vendor to convey and the purchaser to pay the price are mutual and dependent covenants to be performed contemporaneously, and each party must perform his part within a reasonable time, and the payment of the price and the delivery of the deed are concurrent acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. ⇨57.]

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨97—RIGHT TO RELIEF—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

A purchaser seeking the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate must perform or offer to perform his part of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 286-298; Dec. Dig. ⇨97.]

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨97—OPTION TO PURCHASE—NOTICE OF ACCEPTANCE—PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS.

Where a lessee having an option to purchase the premises for a specified sum exercised the option, and offered to pay the price on the lessor producing a certificate of good title and depositing in escrow a deed conveying good title, and the lessor made no objection to the conditions accompanying the offer of payment, any objections were waived, and the offer of payment was sufficient to authorize specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 286-298; Dec. Dig. ⇨97.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Cates and another against J. A. McNeil and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Alton M. Cates and Stewart & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. J. W. Ballard and Frank James, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action for unlawful detainer was brought by plaintiffs to recover possession of a tract of land in Los Angeles county under a claim that the defendants were unlawfully holding over after the expiration of their term of lease. Defendants denied such unlawful holding, and by cross-complaint sought specific performance under a provision of their lease giving them an option to purchase the leased premises.

It appears that on May 26, 1902, C. B. Van Every, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiffs in the fee of the land herein involved, executed a written lease of said premises, described therein as containing four acres more or less, to the predecessors of defendants for a term of ten years, at the monthly rent of $10 per month, payable in advance on the 1st day of each month of the term, and also by the terms of said lease, and in consideration thereof, granted to said lessees an option to purchase the said premises on certain terms if exercised by them at certain specified early periods during the leasehold term, and further provided for the exercise by them of a final option right (being the fourth option clause in the lease) as follows:

"And in case the party of the second part shall not exercise its right and option to purchase said land within two years from date hereof, then and in that event such right and option to purchase shall absolutely determine and be null and void, except that the party of the second part, after having paid the rent on said property for the term of ten years, shall then have the right and option to purchase said property for the price of $600 per acre."

The lease was forthwith duly recorded. On January 3, 1903, the original lessees assigned and transferred said lease and the right to purchase the said leased premises under and by virtue of the option agreements therein contained to the defendants and cross-complainants. The lessor, C. B. Van Every, died on October 27, 1908, and, by due proceedings in the matter of his estate, plaintiffs became the owners of the fee of said leased premises.

The court found these facts, and, in addition, made a finding, No. 9:

"That the time to exercise the right or privilege to purchase said premises granted to cross-complainants by the fourth option clause of said lease at the price of $600 per acre, by the terms of said lease and option, expired on the 27th day of May, 1912, the 26th of May, 1912, being Sunday; that on the 25th day of May, 1912, * * * the said cross-complainants elected to purchase the said leased premises under and by virtue of the right and privilege so to do granted by said fourth option of said lease at the price of $600 per acre, and thereupon on said day and place duly and personally notified said Charles B. Cates thereof by serving upon him personally at said time and place a written notice thereof and tender of said price, and also on the 27th day of May, 1912, * * * duly and personally notified said * * * Ellen M. Brown thereof by serving upon her at that time and place a written notice thereof and tender of the said price, and then and there demanded from said plaintiffs their deed of conveyance conveying said premises to cross-complainants."

In connection with this finding the court set forth as part of it the said notice, tender, and demand just referred to in full, and we quote here only the material part, which is as follows:

"This is to notify you and each of you that we, the undersigned owners of the said indenture of lease and in possession thereunder of said lands and premises therein described, hereby exercise their option to purchase and are ready and willing to purchase the land in said lease described at the said price of six hundred ($600.00) dollars per acre as in said lease stipulated.

"And we hereby demand that at as early day as possible you cause a certificate of title to said land described in said indenture of lease to be prepared, showing title in you free from all incumbrance, and that upon the completion of the same that you convey said land to us, free from all incumbrance, by a good and sufficient deed of conveyance, and deposit said certificate and deed in escrow with any bank, title company, or individual you may select for that purpose, with instructions to deliver the same to us upon payment of the amount of purchase price. Upon notice of such selection for such escrow we will at once deposit therewith the full amount of such purchase price, with the instructions to deliver the same to you upon the delivery to us of said certificate of title and said deed of conveyance."

Proceeding, the court found that at the time of serving said written notice of election neither of the plaintiffs so served at that time made any objection to said notice or tender or to any matter, form, or provision therein, nor to the said notice or tender, or as to the mode of performance on the part of cross-complainants, though each had ample opportunity to do so; that plaintiffs failed and refused to execute said conveyance to respondents, and on January 20, 1912, while cross-complainants were still in possession of the premises, plaintiffs demanded of them a surrender of the possession by them to plaintiffs, which being refused, plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action in unlawful detainer; that cross-complainants, as lessees, had during the term of the lease erected on the premises a plant for refining crude petroleum, and made improvements and additions to their plant of the value of $30,000; that at the time of the making and execution of the lease the fair market value of the leased land did not exceed $400 an acre; that cross-complainants in their cross-complaint had made tender to plaintiffs of said option price of $600 an acre, and in open court at the opening of the trial of this action had further tendered to plaintiffs said price, and then and there offered the same to plaintiffs upon receiving their deed of conveyance of said land.

As conclusions of law the court found that the respondents were entitled to have their option agreement specifically performed by the execution of a deed to them by plaintiffs on payment to the latter of $2,262, with interest.

Judgment was entered accordingly, from which plaintiffs appeal, accompanying their appeal by a duly certified transcript of the evidence given on the trial.

[1] The sole contention of appellants is that the evidence does not support finding No. 9, which we have quoted, in which the court finds that on May 25-27, 1912, respondents had elected to purchase the leased property by virtue of the right and privilege so to do granted by the option, or that on those dates they had tendered the plaintiffs the purchase price provided to be paid in exercise of the option. In this behalf they assert that, under the terms of the option, the time to exercise it was on the date for the payment of the last rent—April 26, 1912—and that an election to do so subsequent to that date, but within the terms of the lease, was too late, relying in this contention on the word "then," found in the last clause of the option right, which declares that the "party of the second part, after having paid the rent on said premises for the term of ten years, shall then have the right and option to purchase said property at the price of $600 per acre." They insist that by the use of the word "then" a definite time was fixed for the exercise of the option; that the privilege of purchasing the premises arose at the time for payment of the last rent on April 26, 1912, and was "then" to be exercised by acceptance if they should elect to avail themselves of the right, and, as it was not exercised then, it expired. But what was meant by the use of the word "then" in the sentence is a matter of interpretation. It will be observed that there is nothing in the terms of the option provision expressly making time of the essence of the exercise of the option right. Nor do we think that it must be held that the word "then" was intended to fix with certainty the time for such exercise as of the date of payment of the last monthly rental. It will be noted that the word "then" is used twice in the fourth option provision here under consideration—first in referring to the two-year option; and next as applying to this particular option clause. While the word "then" may be used as an adverb of time, and in a chronological sense fix a time limit, so also it may be used in a sequential sense meaning "in that event" or "in such case." The latter is obviously the sense in which it was used in referring to the two-year option, and we think such was the sense in which it was used respecting the final option. By the provision of the lease that option right was not available to respondent lessees until "after having paid" the rent for the full term of ten years. Payment for this full term was a condition precedent to the exercise of this right of option at all, and it was the fulfillment of this condition precedent to which the word "then" had relation, and was used in the sense of "in the event of" or "in such case" of payment of rent for the term of ten years the lessees "shall then have the right and option to purchase said property." This construction is, in our opinion, strengthened by a consideration of the lease. After the payment of the last installment of rent the relation of landlord and tenant was still to continue for a month. It is hardly to be assumed that it was the intention of the parties to the option right that it should be exercised while the relation of landlord and tenant existed. On the contrary, the reasonable interpretation would be that, while the right of option was to arise for the benefit of the lessees only on payment of rent for the full term, the lessees were not required to exercise that right until the expiration of the lease.

[2, 3] It is next insisted by appellants that the respondents did not on May 25-27th elect to purchase the leased premises under the right granted by the option. The claim is that the notice of acceptance of the option right was not absolute and unqualified, but was accompanied by conditions not embraced in the terms of the option offer and which rendered its acceptance conditional; hence it is claimed there was no good or valid acceptance.

It is to be observed that the option right involved here is not a mere offer without consideration of the privilege of purchasing the property within a specific time which might have been withdrawn at any time before acceptance by the lessor. Here there was a valuable consideration moving from the lessees to the lessor; the payment by the lessees of rent for the full term was the consideration for their irrevocable right to purchase the leased premises at the specified price if they should elect to do so. Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63.

Having purchased this right to have a conveyance of the property made to them after the payment of rent for a definite term if they should elect to exercise the right according to the terms in which it was offered, all that was necessary on their part to do was to give notice in due time of their acceptance of the terms. When this was done what was before an option right became an executory contract for the sale and purchase of the property. There can be no question but that the respondents served upon the appellants a notice of their acceptance of the option offer and in the exact terms set forth in the option clause. This is apparent from the opening sentence of that notice as quoted in the finding. But it is insisted by appellants that, while respondents gave notice of their exercise of the option right and their readiness and willingness to purchase the land at the price stipulated in the lease, this attempted acceptance was accompanied by conditions—that a certificate of title and a deed to the premises should be deposited in escrow with some bank—that these conditions were not required or provided for in the option contract to be done by the lessor or the appellants as successors in interest, and that a demand for their performance accompanying the notice of acceptance as part thereof rendered the acceptance ineffectual. It is true that the option contract does not call for the production of any certificate of title or deed to be deposited in escrow, and the demand of the respondents in this respect was unwarranted. But these matters had reference solely to the performance of the contract; the manner in which it should be carried out after it was created by the acceptance which was made. The opening paragraph of the notice to appellants was an absolute and unqualified acceptance of the right of option according to its terms. The subsequent paragraph referring to furnishing a certificate of title and the matter of the escrow contains no language imposing the doing of these things as a condition to the acceptance. It is a paragraph wholly disconnected with the previous paragraph declaring an acceptance in clear and unqualified language, and does not in terms or by necessary intent impose any conditions as to the acceptance of the option. It does not say that the option is accepted "on condition" or "provided" these things shall be done. It has reference to something that is to be done and necessarily would have to be done after the acceptance in the previous paragraph is declared made; things that are to be done "at as early a date as possible" after the acceptance. The acceptance by respondents unconditionally made in the first paragraph of the notice having converted the option right into an executory contract of sale and purchase of the leased premises, the second paragraph was not intended to have any relation to such acceptance nor to render such acceptance in any particular conditional or qualified. It related merely to the suggestion of a convenient mode or manner of closing up the transaction—the performance of the executory contract of sale created by the acceptance. Of course, as we have said, the contract did not provide for the doing of these things even as a mode of performance, and the court in its decree for specific performance did not so require. What we are holding, however, is that these matters complained of as embraced in the notice were not intended to have anything to do with the acceptance of the option right which was unqualifiedly accepted by the respondents according to its terms "as in said lease specified," but related solely to the matter of carrying out the contract by such acceptance. Similar conditions accompanying acceptance have been similarly construed. Turner v. McCormick, 56 W. Va. 161, 49 S. E. 28, 67 L. R. A. 853, 107 Am. St. Rep. 904; Kreutzer v. Lynch, 122 Wis. 474, 100 N. W. 887; Long v. Needham, 37 Mont. 408, 96 Pac. 731; Rankin v. Rankin, 216 Ill. 132, 74 N. E. 763.

[4] It is further contended by appellants that, under the terms of the option clause in the lease, payment of the purchase price at the time when the option right might be exercised was essential to constitute acceptance; that there was no tender of the purchase price made to the appellants when the respondents served their notice of the exercise of their right to purchase; and hence there was no valid acceptance. In support of this contention they insist that the payment of the money which respondents offered to make was a payment to be made after appellants had complied with the unwarranted conditions as to a certificate of title and the preparation and deposit of a deed in escrow; that this was an offer to pay money, not only on such unwarranted conditions, but in the future, while, in order to constitute a valid exercise of the right of option to purchase the property and create a binding contract, it was essential that payment of the purchase price be tendered at the time when the right was exercised; and that payment of such purchase price was the only thing required by the option in order to constitute acceptance. We do not deem it necessary here to discuss the terms of the notice served on appellants as to whether it constituted a tender of the purchase price at that time or not. The option clause gave the respondents a right to purchase the leased premises for the price of $600 an acre. There is nothing in the option clause which requires payment of the price of the land to be made or tendered when the option right is exercised in order to constitute an acceptance. Payment may or may not be made an essential condition to the exercise of such a right, just as the parties see fit to provide for in the option agreement. But nothing is said about payment in the option clause here. It is not even mentioned. What the respondents acquired under the option clause was an irrevocable right of option to purchase the property at a specified price if they should at the end of ten years elect to do so, and all that was necessary on their part to do, as far as the terms of the option are concerned, in order to constitute a binding contract for the sale and purchase of the premises, was to give notice of their acceptance of the right. This they did. Payment of the purchase price at that time was not a condition required by the option, and it is not for the court to incorporate terms in it which the parties to it did not incorporate or even mention. Of course, payment would be essential before respondents would be entitled to a conveyance of the land, but that is a matter pertaining to the performance of the contract of purchase and sale which had been created by the acceptance.

[5] In the absence of anything in the contract itself, the obligation of the parties in the performance of the contract is governed by the law applying generally to bilateral contracts for the purchase and sale of property under which the agreement or covenant of the vendor to convey and the vendee to pay the purchase price are considered mutual and dependent covenants, and are to be performed contemporaneously by the respective parties. Each party must perform his part in carrying out the contract, and do so within a reasonable time after the contract is created. The payment of the purchase price and the delivery of the deed are to be done concurrently, and, as the option clause here did not provide otherwise, respondents were not bound to make payment of the purchase price until appellants were prepared to make them a deed conveying to them a good title to the premises.

[6] Of course, before the right to specific performance may be asserted, the party invoking it must have performed or offered to perform on his part.

[7] But, as to the payment for the land, the respondents offered to make it before the suit and on delivery of a deed to them by appellants. It is true that this offer was accompanied by conditions—the production of a certificate of title and deposit of the deed in escrow—which were not provided for in the option, and which respondents had no right to exact. But, as found by the court, no objection was made to these conditions accompanying the offer of payment, although appellants had ample opportunity to do so; and hence, under the rule laid down in Kofoed v. Gordon, 122 Cal. 314, 54 Pac. 1115, they were waived, and the offer of payment as made was good. Appellants declined to do anything on their part towards performance of the contract, but shortly after the notice of acceptance and the offer of payment accompanying it, and though respondents were not in default, repudiated their right to have the purchase consummated by bringing an action to oust them from the possession of the property. In their cross-complaint in this action respondents tendered the purchase price of the property to the appellants, and offered to pay it into court for them. Under these circumstances they did all they were required to do, and were entitled to the decree of specific performance rendered in their favor. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MURPHY et al. v. MAGEE. (Sac. 2052.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⇐128—MOTION—SPECIFICATION OF INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE.

The specification, on motion for new trial, in an action to establish a partnership and for an accounting, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that a certain sum is due from defendant, or to sustain one that any sum is due from him, the statement on the motion containing all the evidence, is sufficient to inform the court and opposing counsel of the ground of the motion, and so is adequate, and justifies the granting of the motion because it appeared that there had not been an accounting, which was necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-262; Dec. Dig. ⇐128.]

2. NEW TRIAL ⇐128—MOTION—ATTACKING FINDINGS.

Even if the setting forth in the trial court's findings of fact of a certain amount as being "due" from defendant be a conclusion of law, rather than a finding of fact, it may, on motion for new trial, be attacked as a finding, by a specification of insufficiency of evidence to sustain it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-262; Dec. Dig. ⇐128.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Ellen Magee Murphy and another against James Magee, Jr. From an order granting defendant's motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

T. T. C. Gregory, of San Francisco, Theodore W. Chester, of Sacramento, and C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, for appellants. Bell, York & Bell, of Napa, and Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiffs sued as successors of Michael Magee, deceased, seeking a judgment that James Magee, Jr., and Michael Magee were partners in business at the time of the latter's death; that plaintiffs were entitled to half of the earnings of the partnership since the demise of said Michael; and for an accounting. The court found the existence of the partnership as alleged, and that defendant had taken into his possession $7,293 belonging to said partnership, all of which he had appropriated to his own use except $75. It was also found that plaintiffs owned a half interest in the lot on which the partnership business was conducted; that the reasonable rental value of the premises was $65 per month; that the accounts between the parties to the action had been closed and settled; and that plaintiffs owned a half interest in the partnership. After motion for a new trial the court granted the motion as to part of the judgment only. The order recites that, it appearing that a partnership existed as alleged in the complaint, but it also appearing that no accounting had taken place, the court approved the finding and judgment that a partnership existed, ordered an accounting, and set aside that part of the judgment fixing defendant's liability at $4,877.82.

[1] Appellants' sole point is that the specification of insufficiency of evidence was not in form to bring the matter of lack of accounting to the notice of the court—in other words that there was, in legal effect, no specification at all. The specification attacked is as follows:

"The evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court that there is, or was due, from the defendant, James Magee, Jr., to said copartnership the sum of $9,755.64, or to sustain the finding and decision of the court that any sum whatsoever was or is due from the defendant, James Magee, Jr., to said copartnership, or to the plaintiffs."

The statement on motion for a new trial contained all of the testimony and exhibits offered or produced by either party, and we think that the specification was sufficient to inform the court and the opposing counsel of one of the grounds upon which the motion was to be made. It is therefore adequate under the rule declared in American Type Founders' Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 461, 62 Pac. 744, and supported by the decisions of this court in Pendola v. Ramm, 138 Cal. 521, 71 Pac. 624, Drathman v. Cohen, 139 Cal. 313, 73 Pac. 181, Gwin v. Calegaris, 139 Cal. 391, 73 Pac. 851, Di Nola v. Allison, 143 Cal. 115, 76 Pac. 976, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84, and Standard Quicksilver Co. v. Habishaw, 132 Cal. 124, 64 Pac. 113.

[2] Appellants seem to rely upon the circumstances that the setting forth of a certain amount as "due" was really a conclusion of law, although it appeared also in the "findings of fact," and that the specification of its insufficiency was not in any proper sense an attack upon a "finding." The rules with reference to specifications are much broader and more liberal than those relating to pleading, and therefore we must hold that defendant's counsel in the specifications called attention of court and opposing counsel to the very matters against which their attack was to be directed. They were not to blame if the court included in the findings of fact that which was more properly a conclusion of law. Indeed, if we were to adopt the theory of plaintiffs that the finding is unassailable as such, because it is really a conclusion of law, then we would be forced to the position that there is no finding at all to support the formal conclusion of law and the judgment in the important matter of the amount of money adjudged to be due. The finding (so-called) implied an accounting and a computation of a specific amount. The specification sufficiently directed attention to the parts of the record, if any, which would support these implications.

The order is affirmed.

CARTY v. BLAUTH. (Sac. 2138.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1915.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT $\S$ 152—FALL OF BUILDING—LESSOR'S LIABILITY.

Absent requirement in a lease that the landlord make repairs and keep the premises in a habitable condition, he is not liable for injuries to the tenant from fall of the building, on the adjoining owner making excavations, though notified, pursuant to Civ. Code, $\S$ 832, of the intended work, and taking no steps to prevent the fall; the statute not changing the common-law rule as to duty of the landlord to the tenant.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT $\S$ 170—FALL OF BUILDING—LESSOR'S LIABILITY.

There is no liability on the ground of maintaining a nuisance of a landlord to a tenant because of fall of the building, on the adjoining owner making excavations, though the landlord is notified of the intended work, and takes no steps to prevent the fall.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth R. Carty against Theobald Blauth. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellant. Philip S. Driver and C. E. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered after the sustaining of a demurrer to his complaint.

The complaint was in three counts. Briefly stated, the facts alleged were as follows:

Plaintiff was the tenant from month to month of two floors of a building situated in the city of Sacramento and belonging to defendant. Plaintiff had been for two years conducting successfully a lodging house in the part of the building so occupied. The owner of the adjacent property, the Folsom Investment Company, began excavating on its land, and, finding it necessary to dig lower than the foundations of defendant's building, gave written notice to defendant of the general nature of the excavations, but defendant failed to do anything by way of providing lateral support for his building. Despite the exercise of reasonable care by the owner of the adjoining land in making the excavation, and without negligence or fault on plaintiff's part, the building collapsed, thereby seriously injuring plaintiff, destroying the furniture in her lodging house, causing her in her flight to leave behind $100 worth of other personal property, and breaking up her business. The facts pleaded and the relief asked are the same in each count. The first count is upon defendant's alleged negligence in failing to shore up or otherwise protect his building; in the second it is alleged that by such failure he created and maintained a nuisance; and in the third it is averred that by reason of defendant's negligence plaintiff was deprived of the possession and enjoyment of the premises which had been leased to her. Plaintiff's counsel in his brief insists that the landlord is liable to his tenant under the circumstances alleged: (1) For disturbing the tenant's rights in violation of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment; (2) for permitting a nuisance on the premises; (3) for breach of his general duty to the public to refrain from negligent conduct; and (4) for violation of his special duty not to injure any one properly on his real property.

[1] Appellant's counsel concedes that the case of Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 344, is directly adverse to his views, but seeks to differentiate that case from this one because the former was decided before the Code prescribed notice by the owner of adjacent property of his intention to excavate, and because, as he insists, the opinion in that case was not devoted to a consideration of the duty of a landlord to refrain from disturbing the tenant's quiet enjoyment of the premises, or to other duties of such landlord as an owner of real property or as a member of the community in general. Brewster v. De Fremery was in all of its essentials exactly like the case at bar. The plaintiff's decedent had been killed by the collapse of a building of which he was tenant from month to month. No covenants to keep the premises in repair or in habitable condition were averred, and for the purposes of the decision the court assumed that there were none. The house fell because of an excavation on the adjacent land. Defendants had timely notice of the excavation, which they ignored. A demurrer to a complaint which pleaded these facts was sustained. The court said in the course of the opinion:

"The house did not fall in consequence of any act of the owners, but in consequence of the acts of parties owning the adjoining lot, in excavating it for purposes of their own, after the deceased entered into the possession of the demised premises under the lease. There was no covenant on the part of the lessors, the defendants, to uphold or keep the premises in repair, or in a habitable condition. Without an express covenant to that effect, they were not bound to repair, or to keep the premises in a habitable condition. We think the rule correctly stated in Howard v. Doolittle, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. 464. In that case it was held that a landlord is in no case bound to repair, unless by force of an express covenant or contract, and that, even when a building is let for a special purpose, and its use and occupation for any other is, in terms, prohibited, there is no implied contract or warranty on the part of the landlord that the building shall be or continue, fit for the purpose for which it is demised. * * * Aside from the relation of landlord and tenant, there is no ground, under the circumstances alleged, for holding defendants responsible. The injuries resulted from the occupancy of the premises by the deceased as a tenant. The landlord was under no obligation to uphold or repair, and there was no breach of duty on his part. The cases cited in relation to nuisances have no application."

We see no reason for departing from the doctrine of Brewster v. De Fremery, unless the duty of the landlord has been changed by section 832 of the Civil Code, which was adopted after the decision of that case. That authority has been cited with approval, particularly on the ruling that the only consequence of a breach of a landlord's obligation to repair is that the tenant may either vacate the premises or expend one month's rent towards repairs after ineffectual notice to the lessor to make such repairs. Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 174, 18 Pac. 260; Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 523, 57 Pac. 567. And the same principle has been announced in such cases as Maroney v. Hellings, 110 Cal. 220, 42 Pac. 560; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 550, 28 Pac. 599; Calla- han v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 480, 36 Pac. 835. And it has been held that, in the absence from the lease of a covenant obliging the landlord to make repairs and keep the premises in habitable condition, he is not liable for injuries to the tenant or others resulting from defects in the leased property. Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 Pac. 304; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 180, 33 Pac. 859.

Appellant, while admitting the force of these decisions, insists that since the adoption of section 832, Civil Code, the notice prescribed by that section creates a duty upon the part of the landlord to safeguard his building from possible collapse, and that he owes such duty, if not to the owner of the adjacent land, at least to others. But since the adoption of that section the rights and duties of proprietors of adjoining property are substantially the same as they were before. Aston v. Nolan, 63 Cal. 274. In First National Bank v. Villegra, 92 Cal. 98, 28 Pac. 97, it was held that the excavating owner, after giving notice, could not collect any compensation for protecting his neighbor's property. It was there held that the purpose of section 832, in its broadest scope, was to enable the excavator to relieve himself from liability; not to create any liability in his favor against his neighbor. In Conboy v. Dickinson, 92 Cal. 604, 28 Pac. 809, the court quoted from the opinion in Aston v. Nolan, supra, to the effect that section 832, Civil Code, had not materially changed the common-law rule. See, also, Sullivan v. Zeiner, 98 Cal. 348, 33 Pac. 209, 20 L. R. A. 730. There is nothing in the section considered which casts any duty upon the owner of a building with reference to his tenants, when the proprietor of adjoining property begins to excavate for building purposes. If the tenant, seeing the imminent danger from the excavation, decided to remain and run the risk of injury, just as the landlord decided to run the risk of destruction to his property, he may not complain, under the circumstances here disclosed, because the owner of the building failed to do something which he was not required to do either by the statute or by his contract with his tenant.

[2] Plaintiff's contention that defendant was liable for the maintenance of a nuisance is also fully answered by Brewster v. De Fremery. The same point was made in that case and decided adversely to the appellant there. Indeed, as all of the obligations between the parties arose from the relation of landlord and tenant, there is no force in any of appellant's contentions with reference to the defendant's alleged breach of duty to the general public or to one properly on his premises.

[3] The implied covenant for quiet possession is measured by the obligation of the landlord towards the tenant under the lease. If not compelled by the lease or the statute to reinforce the wall of his building, no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment could compel him to do so, any more than he could be compelled to sue to enforce the removal of a powder factory which might be established near the property. In this behalf appellant says that the landlord owes to his tenant a duty beyond and in addition to the duty of repairing dilapidations—a duty which arises out of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. He asserts that the landlord, for example, could not be held guiltless if he should deliberately throw rocks at his tenants, or should negligently allow rocks to be rolled down upon them. The illustration is not apt. The injury of which this tenant complains was not due to any act on the part of the landlord, but was due entirely to the excavation on the adjoining property. Appellant cites Jessen v. Sweigert, 66 Cal. 182, 4 Pac. 1188, in support of his theory. In that case a person passing on the street was injured by the falling of an awning which the owner of the property had suspended over the sidewalk by license from the city expressed in an ordinance allowing such awnings so to be located if securely placed and maintained. It was held that the landlord's duty to the public was not altered by the fact that a tenant was in possession of the premises under a lease. There was no question of quiet enjoyment by a tenant in that case at all, nor, indeed, anything involving a dispute between lessor and lessee. Another inapt citation is Milheim v. Baxter, 46 Colo. 157, 103 Pac. 376, 133 Am. St. Rep. 50, a case in which a landlord was held guilty of disturbing his tenant's quiet possession by renting for immoral purposes premises owned by him adjacent to those occupied by the complaining tenant. Obviously that authority can have no application to the case at bar. Blauth had no control over the premises adjoining the land on which his building stood. He was not guilty of creating the peril to his own property. It is a general rule that an express or implied covenant for quiet possession secures the lessee against acts or hindrances of the lessor and persons deriving their title through him, or from a paramount title, but not from the acts of strangers. 24 Cyc. 1059; Branger v. Manciet, 30 Cal. 627; Playter v. Cunningham, 21 Cal. 233; McCormick v. Marcy, 165 Cal. 389, 132 Pac. 449.

It follows from the foregoing discussion that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

GODFREY v. WISNER et al. (Sac. 2169.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 25, 1915.)

1. ESTOPPEL ⇐78—GROUNDS—CONTRACT IN —WRITING.

Defendant, a broker, entered into an oral agreement with plaintiff, another broker, by which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a specified commission for assistance in the sale of land belonging to third persons. Plaintiff assisted in the sale of a tract of land which defendant had conveyed to a third person by an absolute conveyance as security for a debt. Plaintiff had no knowledge that the deed was in fact a mortgage. Held that, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, providing that one who has deliberately led another to believe that a particular thing is true cannot be permitted to falsify it, defendant was precluded from asserting that the agreement for payment of compensation as to such tract of land was within the statute of frauds.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by W. R. Godfrey against C. B. Wisner and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying new trial, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas C. Job and Irving M. Walker, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Henry Brickley and J. J. Griffin, both of Merced, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. By his action plaintiff sought to recover from defendant Wisner compensation by way of commissions for his services in the matter of the selling of certain lands. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The principal argument goes to the asserted insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision. The complaint charged that defendant was engaged in the business of buying and selling land belonging to persons other than defendant on a commission basis; that plaintiff was employed to act for and as the agent of defendant, and that under such contract of employment defendant was to pay plaintiff for all sales made through plaintiff or with his aid and assistance a compensation equal to 2½ per cent. of the price of the land sold; that in March, 1913, plaintiff aided and assisted defendant in the sale of 4,200 acres of land at $20 an acre; and that defendant thereby became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,100. Plaintiff's testimony was to the effect that in October, 1911, his business relationship with defendant began. Defendant had conveyed a tract of land known as "the East Side Tract" to a corporation known as the "Figmond Company," in which corporation defendant was a stockholder, and was actually or apparently the selling agent of the Figmond Company for these lands. Defendant's place of business was in Los Angeles. This land was situated near Merced. The contract between plaintiff and defendant was oral, defendant agreeing to pay plaintiff 10 per cent. commission upon any sale of land which was effectuated solely through his own endeavors. In other words, upon any sale of land in which plaintiff secured the purchaser and brought about the sale; that in all other sales of land in which he aided or assisted defendant he was to receive 2½ per cent. commission upon the selling price. This relationship continued, defendant and the Figmond Company in which he was interested, either or both, establishing plaintiff in a real estate office in Merced, plaintiff receiving no salary, but defendant paying him a commission upon the sales of land in which he assisted. Subsequently it appears that defendant Wisner bought another tract of land known as "the West Side Land." It is over the sale of this land that the controversy has arisen. The facts appear to be that the acquisition of this land was a private venture of defendant; that he had an option to purchase it, or an executory contract to purchase it; that he did purchase it, and thereafter, needing money, mortgaged it to one Howard C. Bonsall. Substantially all of the argument upon this appeal is directed to the proposition that defendant was the real owner of the property, that Bonsall was but the mortgagee of it, that plaintiff knew these facts, and that plaintiff's employment therefore by defendant to aid the defendant—the owner—in selling his own real estate was a contract within the statute of frauds, and resting in parol, as admittedly the contract between these parties does, was void and unenforceable. But, as against this, plaintiff successfully established before the jury that the deed to Bonsall was in form a deed absolute, conveying no notice that Bonsall was but a mortgagee; that he did not in fact know that Bonsall was but a mortgagee; that he had aided in the selling of certain small pieces from this large tract while title so stood in Bonsall, and had received his commissions from defendant therefor; and that at the time the sale of the whole tract was effected title still stood in Bonsall and he (plaintiff) aided in the sale at the direct and written request of defendant. It is unnecessary to review in detail the evidence in support of the statements above given. Upon certain matters there was, in truth, a conflict. Thus, defendant insists that Godfrey was present at the negotiations with Bonsall and others leading up to the execution of the mortgage in the form of a deed and knew the fact that it was but a mortgage and that Wisner remained the real owner of the property. Plaintiff denies this and asserts—his statements being corroborated—that he went out to inspect the land with all the parties to this negotiation, but that when he came back, after they had dined together, he went to his home—the others saying that they desired to continue their negotiations in privacy; that he was not present, therefore, when the determination was reached; and that he was never thereafter informed that Bonsall's deed was but a mortgage.

[1] Plaintiff's rights herein are not governed by the fact that defendant was the real owner. They are governed by the knowledge which plaintiff had or with which he was chargeable. Plaintiff's testimony is that he did not know, and was not advised, that defendant was the actual owner. Upon the record, Bonsall was the owner. Defendant, under familiar principles of estoppel in pais, may not avail himself of his own deliberate omission, or even his unintentional neglect, to advise plaintiff of a fact vital to the legality of the contract into which they had entered. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

[2, 3] Furthermore, the evidence abundantly establishes that the relationship and contract between the parties was as plaintiff testified, and while it is true that at the time of this oral employment only the East Side lands were in direct contemplation of the parties, since they were the only lands in which defendant was at that time interested, no doubt can be entertained, but that after the acquisition of the West Side lands the relationship of the parties continued under the same understanding. Plaintiff, as has been said, was paid a commission by defendant for the sale of certain of these lands, and defendant freely made demand upon plaintiff's time in the matter of negotiations and prospective sales of such land. Thus, he wrote to plaintiff touching a visit to be made to the lands by "one Hart and his friends," who subsequently did purchase them, telling him to be on the look-out for them; to post himself concerning the lands, and "do your best to show that land up in as favorable a light as possible." All this plaintiff did, conducting the party to the lands, digging holes in the soil to show its depth and the absence of hardpan, and doing everything that a real estate broker usually does to interest a prospective purchaser. Aside from the legal proposition involved in the question of the applicability of the statute of fraud to the contract between the parties, the real reason of defendant's disinclination to pay the commissions seems to have arisen, by his own testimony, from the fact that he thought the plaintiff did not do anything, or at least enough, to justify his demand for a commission. This proposition also is argued upon the theory that plaintiff was entitled to commissions only when he produced the purchaser and effectuated the sale. Such is not the nature of the contract testified to by plaintiff which, from their verdict, was accepted by the jury. When he did this, he was to receive 10 per cent. commission. When, however, he only assisted to the best of his ability, he was to receive 2½ per cent. commission. The materiality of his assistance, therefore, becomes of no moment, provided he fairly and faithfully did that which he was called upon to do.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

ELECTIONS ⇨47—ELECTION OFFICERS — APPOINTMENT.

In view of the provisions made by Pol. Code, §§ 1044, 1151, for the appointment of the board of elections, section 1142, as amended June 14, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1165), requiring that the board be appointed, one-half from each of the two leading political parties, was inapplicable to a municipal election to be held on April 20, 1915.

In Bank. Application for writ of mandamus by Thomas Booth against Frank K. Mott and others. Application denied.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco, and R. M. Royce, and V. W. Lathrop, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Application for a writ of mandate to compel respondents in appointing election officers for the municipal election to be held in the city of Oakland on April 20, 1915, to make such appointments in accord with the provisions of section 1142 of the Political Code, as amended June 14, 1913.

We are satisfied that, in so far as the matters referred to in the petition are concerned, section 1142, Political Code, is not applicable to such municipal election, in view of the provisions of sections 1044 and 1151 of the Political Code. In Vincent v. Mott, 163 Cal. 342, 125 Pac. 346, relied on by petitioner, the application for a writ of mandate was denied without notice of the application to the respondents, on the ground that the petition did not sufficiently show that the election commissioners threatened to disobey the provision of the law claimed to be applicable. What is said in the opinion filed in denying the application, in relation to the application of section 1142, Political Code, to recall elections in the city of Oakland, is purely obiter dicta, and was induced by the fact that the provisions of sections 1044 and 1151 of the Political Code were not brought to the attention of the court, and that the real question presented and decided was whether the Political Code provisions relative to elections generally were applicable to recall elections in that city, as distinguished from other elections.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

led to what might naturally and probably be expected to produce the result.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Graziella M. Champagne against A. Hamburger & Sons, Incorporated. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Murray Marshall and Gurney E. Newlin, both of Los Angeles (Roy V. Reppy, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in an elevator accident which occurred in the department store of the defendant in the city of Los Angeles. The elevator was operated by the defendant to convey passengers to and from the various floors of its department store. On April 6, 1912, plaintiff entered the elevator on the fifth floor to go to the third floor for the purpose of purchasing some curtains. A number of passengers were already in the elevator when plaintiff and others entered at the fifth floor so that the car, when it commenced its descent, was in a packed or crowded condition. The car moved downward normally until it was approaching towards the third floor, when it was suddenly precipitated from said floor into the basement, and the injuries suffered by plaintiff are claimed to have resulted through such fall. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $4,500 damages, and, from the judgment in her favor so rendered, defendant appeals, and appeals also from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

While defendant denied the alleged negligence which occasioned the accident, it is not claimed on this appeal but that the evidence fully sustained the fact that the accident was due to its negligence.

The points made for a reversal by appellant are that the court erred in not sustaining its special demurrer to the complaint; that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict in that it does not appear therefrom that the injuries sustained by plaintiff were occasioned by the fall of the elevator; that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury and in refusing to give certain other instructions tendered by appellant, and further abused its discretion in refusing a new trial to appellant based on newly discovered evidence.

[1] As to the ruling on the demurrer. The complaint among other allegations, including one that the plaintiff was a passenger on the elevator, alleged as to the accident:

"That it was caused alone by the negligence of the defendant in failing to properly operate said elevator and in negligently failing to have proper clamps and appliances therefor for the purpose of catching said elevator if it started to drop, and in negligently failing to have said elevator properly supported by sound wire cables, and by reason of said negligence said elevator fell as aforesaid."

The claim of the appellant is that, as far as the allegations charged negligence in a failure to properly operate said elevator, the particulars in which there was a failure to do so should have been alleged. But this is not the rule in this state where, as it is said in Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 99, 27 Pac. 29:

"It is well settled that negligence may be charged in general terms; that is, what was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent. But it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury."

Here the plaintiff alleged that, while she was a passenger in an elevator operated by the defendant, it fell, several stories to the bottom of the elevator shaft; that such fall was occasioned through the negligence, among other things, of the defendant in failing to properly operate it and consequent injury to her therefrom. This statement of negligence in operation made in general terms was all that was required. It was not necessary to set forth the particular acts or omissions which constituted negligence. While the rule in this respect is general, it has particular application in a case such as is presented here, where the injuries arose while the relation of passenger and common carrier existed, and the liability of the defendant is measured by the duties and responsibilities that arise from such relation. The wisdom of the rule requiring only an allegation of negligence in general terms, where an accident occurs to a passenger in the operation of the instrumentalities provided for his carriage, will be found considered and its application in such cases sustained in Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407, and no further discussion of the matter is necessary.

[2] As to the claim of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. This is addressed solely to the subject of the injuries sustained by plaintiff. Appellant insists that it does not appear from the evidence that these injuries were caused solely by the fall or jar of the elevator, but, on the contrary, were in all probability caused by the action of fellow passengers in trampling upon plaintiff in escaping from the elevator after it had fallen and while she was lying on its floor. The evidence shows that plaintiff was standing near the door of the elevator when it struck the basement, and that the elevator was crowded with passengers. Immediately after the car fell the crowd, panic-stricken, pressed toward the door of the elevator, pushed aside the operator, opened it, and rushed out. Although plaintiff, when the elevator fell, testified that she was hurt by its jar, she did not then realize the extent of her injuries. She did not immediately fall down, being, as she testified, held up by the crowded condition of the elevator. When that condition relaxed as the crowd rushed out, she did fall, being unable, on account of injuries to her legs, to support herself. When she fell she commenced to crawl out of the elevator, and while doing so she testified that some of the crowd, in rushing out, stepped on and ran over her, and that there was an abrasion of the skin on the lower part of her left leg occasioned, she thought, by some one of them stepping on it. Upon this testimony as to what occurred to plaintiff in the rush of the crowd, the appellant bases its claim of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. The reasoning of its counsel in that connection is that as the plaintiff in her complaint based her right of recovery solely on the ground that her injuries were occasioned by the fall of the elevator, due to its negligent operation or negligent construction or maintenance with respect to broken and insufficient cables, she could only recover where a clear preponderance of the evidence showed that her injuries proceeded from either of such causes alone; that plaintiff was not entitled to recover if in fact her injuries were the result of being trampled on by the outrush of the passengers, because he contends that such injuries would not have proceeded from the fall of the elevator but from the negligence of the defendant in operating the elevator in a crowded condition, a ground of negligence which was not alleged in the complaint. Appellant does not question but that, if the injuries sustained by plaintiff through the acts of her fellow passengers in rushing out of the elevator were the proximate result of the negligent operation of the elevator, the defendant would be liable, but only that there is no allegation in the complaint on that subject or charging negligence on that ground.

But, without discussing just now the accuracy of the legal proposition advanced, it is to be said that the plaintiff did not claim, nor does the evidence show, that she received any injuries (save in one trifling particular presently to be mentioned) from the action of her fellow passengers. She testified that the pains she felt immediately after the accident were in her right arm, in her legs, and in her abdominal region. The injuries to her arm and right leg, which consisted simply of strains, were only temporary, and she had readily and fully recovered therefrom long before the trial commenced. The injuries of which she made complaint on the trial were a permanent injury to her left knee, proceeding from a tearing or overstretching of the ligamentum patella, rendering that knee unable to sustain the superincumbent weight of the body upon it, also a permanent displacement or retroversion of the womb, and the pain and suffering endured by plaintiff while confined to her bed under medical treatment as a result of such injuries. The physicians examined on behalf of defendant testified that these injuries could be and were usually produced from a fall or jar as plaintiff had sustained them from the fall or jar of the elevator. There was no evidence produced in the case that an examination by physicians immediately after the accident or at any other time disclosed any wounds, or bruises upon her knee or abdomen. Nor is there a particle of evidence in the case produced on the part either of plaintiff or defendant that stepping on the plaintiff by her fellow passengers could cause a permanent wrench or strain of the ligamentum patella or a retroversion of the uterus. The testimony of the plaintiff that some of the other passengers stepped on her in their struggle to get out is the only testimony on the subject given in the case, and it is quite evident that this matter was mentioned by her simply in her narrative of all that occurred at the time of the accident. She did not claim that she suffered any injury thereby nor base any right to damages therefrom. There is nothing in the testimony introduced by defendant suggesting that the injuries to plaintiff might have been occasioned through the conduct of her fellow passengers. In fact, the position of the defendant was that there was no injury at all to the left knee of plaintiff, and as to the retroversion of the womb that this was a condition common to women of the age of the plaintiff who have, as she had, borne several children and would be come cured in the course of time. It is true that plaintiff testified that among other results of the accident was a slight wound on the lower part of her left leg which she thought was received by some one stepping on it. But this was a mere superficial bruise which had doubtless healed long prior to the trial, and which, when received, amounted to nothing. A physician called for defendant, who examined the plaintiff immediately after the accident, testified that he saw this bruise and put a dressing on it; that this injury was so slight that there was nothing to it, and he had dismissed it from his mind.

[3, 4] But assuming that the testimony of the plaintiff showed that the pains and suffering she underwent for a long period after the accident in a measure proceeded from injuries sustained through the action of her fellow passengers, or that even all her injuries might be attributable to that cause, still we think plaintiff was entitled to recover therefor under her complaint. While she charged negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to properly operate the elevator, and also in failing to provide proper appliances to control it, the evidence warranted the jury in finding that the fall of the elevator was occasioned solely through overweight arising from its crowded condition; that its fall proceeded from negligence of the operator in attempting to operate it in that condition. This being true, if the jury were warranted in a further finding that the injuries sustained by plaintiff, though occasioned through the action of fellow passengers in rushing out of the elevator, were the proximate result of the negligent operation of the elevator in such overcrowded condition, causing its fall, then appellant was responsible therefor. It is of no moment that plaintiff did not particularly charge in her complaint that her injuries were sustained as a result of the operation of the elevator in its crowded condition. Not being required to charge the particular act constituting negligence in the operation of the elevator, she could rely on any act which in fact constituted it, and from which her injuries proceeded as a proximate result. The proximate cause, as defined generally, is the cause which led to what might naturally and probably be expected to produce the result. Here, of course, the contention of appellant is that the injuries of the plaintiff were not caused by the fall of the elevator but by the intervening act of the crowd in rushing over her. But the intervening act of the crowd would not break the casual connection between the negligent act of operating the elevator in a crowded condition and the injuries sustained by plaintiff, if such intervening act was one which might have been foreseen as likely or probable to occur as the result of the original negligence. If it was, the casual connection was not broken, and the appellant would be responsible for the consequences of the intervening act as the proximate result of the original negligence. It needs no discussion to point out that, where there is a sudden fall several stories to the bottom of its shaft of a crowded elevator, the natural and probable result would be that its occupants would be overcome with sudden fear and fright; that there would be immediately created a condition of panic under which the natural tendency of the crowd would be to rush and struggle to get out; and that some, more particularly the weaker, might fall or be thrown down and involuntarily injured in the struggle. This might be expected as a natural consequence.

It may be mentioned here that defendant tendered instructions on the theory that the injuries arose solely from the conduct of plaintiff's fellow passengers, and to the effect that, if the jury so found, they should return a verdict for the appellant. The court refused to so instruct, but, on the contrary, instructed the jury that, if they found from the evidence that such injuries were the proximate result of the fall of the elevator, plaintiff might recover therefor. Error is assigned on both the refusal of the court to give the instructions tendered by the appellant and in giving those as to proximate cause, but for the reasons we have given we are satisfied the action of the court was correct in both particulars.

[5] It is next insisted that the court erred in its instructions to the jury as to the duties and responsibilities of persons or corporations operating passenger elevators. The court instructed the jury that such persons or corporations are to be treated as common carriers of passengers, and that the same duties and responsibilities rest on them as to care and diligence as on the carriers of passengers by stage coach or railway; that, though not insurers of the absolute safety of passengers, they "are bound to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons as far as human care and foresight can go, and are responsible for injuries occasioned by the slightest neglect against which human care and foresight might have guarded." It is not questioned but that this instruction correctly announces the doctrine as to the responsibility of a common carrier of passengers. The claim only is that this rule does not apply to the operation of passenger elevators. But it was expressly held by this court in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175, that, as to a passenger elevator operated and used just as the one here was for the benefit of customers of a store, the same rule of responsibility attaches as applies to common carriers of persons. It is not necessary to further refer to that case, save to say that it fully discusses the matter and clearly points out the reason the same rule of responsibility should govern as to passenger elevators which applies to carriers of persons by stage coach or railway and sustains the correctness of the instruction, as given in the case at bar. It is true, as pointed out by counsel for appellant, that a different rule is announced in a few other jurisdictions. Griffen v. Manice, 106 N. Y. 197, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630; Edwards v. Manufacturing Co., 27 R. I. 248, 61 Atl. 646, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 744, 114 Am. St. Rep. 37, 8 Ann. Cas. 974; McCracken v. Meyers, 75 N. J. Law, 935, 68 Atl. 805, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 290; Burgess v. Stowe, 134 Mich. 204, 96 N. W. 29. In those cases it is held that the same measure of responsibility as is imposed on stage coaches or railway companies does not apply to the owners of passenger elevators; that as to the owners of such elevators they are only required to exercise ordinary care for the safety of their passengers. The New York case is the leading case holding to this doctrine and is quoted as authority for the similar conclusions reached by the other courts referred to. They concede that a different rule—the rule of Treadwell v. Whittier—prevails, not only here, but in other jurisdictions. It is not necessary to do more than refer to those cases relied on by appellant and say that they all lay down a radically different rule than what prevails in this state as announced in the Treadwell Case. But, while the courts in these particular jurisdictions have not agreed with the rule laid down in Treadwell v. Whittier, it does not disturb us in our belief that that case lays down the correct doctrine as to responsibility. This Treadwell Case appears to be the principal and leading case which fully considers, discusses, and determines the degree of care exacted of owners of passenger elevators, and declares it to be the same as that which applies to common carriers. This case has been followed in a majority of the jurisdictions where the direct question has arisen as to the degree of care exacted of owners of passenger elevators, and the rule announced in it is generally accepted as sustained by the weight of authority. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (2d Ed.) vol. 3, § 319a; Hutchinson on Carriers, vol. 1 (3d Ed.) § 100; Thompson, Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, vol. 1, § 1078; Ray on Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 308; Fetter, Carriage of Passengers, vol. 1, p. 550; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 10 (2d Ed.) p. 946; Cyc. vol. 6, p. 596.

[6] Appellant contends, however, that the doctrine of Treadwell v. Whittier cannot apply in the case at bar, because, as claimed, the carriage of passengers in the elevator of appellant was without reward, and it is declared by section 2096 of the Civil Code that "a carrier of persons without reward must use ordinary care and diligence for their safe carriage." Hence, in the present case, it is asserted that the appellant was not bound by the same rule of responsibility as carriers of persons for reward or hire. But if the appellant, in the operation of its passenger elevator, was a carrier of persons without reward, so was the appellant in the Treadwell Case, as the respondent there, as here, was a customer riding in it when it fell. It is true, as claimed by counsel here, that this section 2096 is not discussed in that case. But the principal point considered there was the rule of responsibility, and it is hardly to be conceived, considering the ability of counsel who represented appellant in the Treadwell Case, that if they thought there was any merit in this present point as applying in that case, where it would have applied as pertinently as here, they would not have made it. We do not think, however, the point has any merit, because in our judgment the appellant was not operating its elevator as a carrier of persons without reward. Reward does not necessarily import that there must be a fare paid for carriage in a passenger elevator in order to constitute the owner thereof a carrier of persons for hire. The rule is laid down that an elevator which is operated for the use of the tenants of an office building and their visitors is a carrier of persons for hire; the rental paid by the tenants being a compensation or reward for which the owner undertakes to carry them and their visitors by elevators. And the same rule applies with reference to elevators operated in hotels or apartment houses. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 10 (2d Ed.) p. 946. In this age of lofty buildings, erected at vast expense for office purposes or devoted to hotel or apartment houses, the owners would be unable to rent or use them for those purposes, unless elevators were operated therein. The benefits or advantages which the owners of office buildings with elevator service derive through rental from their tenants or the proprietors of hotels or apartment houses derive from their guests or occupants through such installed service is a sufficient compensation or reward to constitute them carriers of passengers for hire as to such tenants, guests, occupants, or their visitors for whose benefit the elevator is operated. We perceive no reason why this should not equally apply to the proprietor of a department store operating an elevator to carry customers or prospective customers from one floor of the store to another for the purposes of trade. In no sense is the elevator carriage which he provides for that purpose a service without reward—gratuitous service. A department store covering seven floors, as it appears from the evidence that of appellant does, could not expect the patronage which an enterprise of that extent must receive in order to be profitable, without providing an elevator service, giving ready access to customers to its various floors. The reward of the appellant was the benefit, advantage, and profit to it in trade derived from purchasers or prospective purchasers using the elevator in dealing with it. Naturally this facility of transportation would increase its patronage and necessarily its profits in business. In fixing the price at which its goods and merchandise must be sold so as to return a profit, necessarily the operating expenses of the establishment, including this elevator service, must be taken into consideration and provided for. The prices charged and paid by customers for goods would include a reimbursement to appellant for its expenses entailed in the operation of the elevator for its patrons, and hence would constitute a sufficient reward for their carriage, so as to bring appellant within the category of a carrier of passengers for hire and subject to the same duties and responsibilities.

[7] Complaint is made by appellant of the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, based on alleged newly discovered evidence, consisting of testimony which it was claimed would be given by two physicians who had treated plaintiff in the city of Portland some three years before the accident, while she resided there. The ruling of the court was correct. Aside from other reasons which justified it, it appears that appellant was in possession of information long prior to the trial, whereby, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, it could have obtained the testimony of these witnesses. Aside from this, however, the appellant had actually obtained from these physicians full information, as to the matters it expected they would testify to, several days before the trial was finished, and, if it deemed their testimony important, should have applied for a continuance (which it did not) until it could be procured. *Berry v. MORTGAGES ~~§~~486—FORECLOSURE—INTEREST OF THIRD PARTIES—JUDGMENT.

In foreclosure suits by two mortgagees against the same mortgagor, in which a party defendant filed an affirmative answer and cross-complaint, and another party intervened, both claiming attachment liens subject to the mortgages, and asking that certain transfers between the mortgagors and a party defendant alleged to have been in fraud of creditors be set aside, and the land subjected to their attachment and liens, it was within the court's discretion to render judgment for the plaintiffs, and postpone the determination of the other controversies which did not affect their rights or the mortgagor's right to redeem.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Separate actions by Clarence F. Rowley and E. C. Baur and others against J. O. Davis and others to foreclose mortgages, in which defendant Nichols filed a cross-complaint, and the First National Bank of Berkeley intervened, each asking certain relief. Judgment for plaintiffs, new trial denied, and defendants J. O. Davis, Rozina P. Davis, and E. F. Davis appeal. Affirmed.

Pemberton & Pemberton and J. O. Davis, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, for respondents. Black & Clark, of San Francisco, for cross-complainant and intervener.

SHAW, J. The two cases above entitled present the same questions upon facts identical in effect. A decision in one will determine both. In each case the appeals are from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. We will state in detail the facts involved in case No. 2159.

Rowley's complaint stated a cause of action to foreclose a mortgage on a tract of land in Yolo county, executed by J. O. Davis and Rozina P. Davis, his wife, on March 9, 1910, to secure their note for $10,000. It contained the usual allegations, and, with respect to all the defendants, except the said mortgagors, it merely alleged that they had, or claimed to have, some interest or claim on the premises, and that said interests or claims were subsequent to and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. The mortgage provided for the payment of reasonable fees for plaintiff's attorneys, and the complaint alleged that $750 was such reasonable fee.

The defendants J. O. Davis, Rozina P. Davis, and E. F. Davis, appellants herein, filed an answer admitting all the allegations of the complaint, except as to the attorneys' fee, and alleged that $100 was a sufficient fee. Defendant Nichols filed an affirmative answer and cross-complaint, claiming therein certain attachment liens on the land under writs issued in actions begun in Alameda county for debts of Davis and wife, subject to plaintiff's mortgage, and alleged that certain deeds whereby the mortgaged land had been transferred from J. O. Davis and wife, through mesne conveyances, to E. F. Davis, prior to the levies of the attachments, were made with intent to defraud Nichols and other creditors of Davis and wife, and asking that said deeds be set aside and the land subjected to his attachments. The First National Bank of Berkeley, by leave of court, filed a complaint in intervention, alleged a judgment lien on the land, subordinate to plaintiff's mortgage, and likewise attacking the aforesaid transfers to E. F. Davis, and asking that they be adjudged fraudulent and void. The plaintiff answered the pleadings of the said defendants, denying the allegations of each of them. The appealing defendants demurred to the pleadings of said codefendants and intervener, but they have not filed answers thereto, and no ruling has been made on the demurrers. In this condition of the pleadings the court, on motion of the plaintiff, and over the objection of the appellants, proceeded to try the issues arising upon the plaintiff's complaint and the answers thereto, without at the same time trying the issues upon the cross-complaint aforesaid; its announced intention being to reserve said controversies between the defendants for future determination in the cause. It thereupon made findings that $500 was a reasonable fee for the plaintiff's attorneys, which finding is not attacked, and declaring that no determination was made of the issues upon the other pleadings aforesaid. A decree foreclosing the plaintiff's mortgage and for the sale of the land was thereupon made expressly saving the rights of the defendants and the intervener, or either of them, to any surplus remaining of the proceeds after satisfying the plaintiff's debt and costs, and providing that such surplus, if any, should be paid into court to be distributed to the respective defendants as their interests might subsequently be made to appear and as the court should subsequently determine.

The sole point presented in support of these appeals is that the court erred in proceeding to trial, determination, and adjudication of the case, upon the plaintiff's complaint, and in entering judgment thereon, without at the same time trying and adjudicating the respective rights of Nichols and the bank to their asserted liens on the land and their cross-actions to set aside said conveyances.

The appellants rely on the cases of Dou-dell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 454, 114 Pac. 579, Stockton, etc., Works v. Insurance Co., 98 Cal. 577, 33 Pac. 633, Hibernia, etc., Soc. v. London, etc., Co., 138 Cal. 260, 71 Pac. 334, and Fox v. Hale, etc., Co., 112 Cal. 571, 41 Pac. 1022, wherein certain statements are made to the effect that there should be but one final judgment in an action. The statement was made in Doudell v. Shoo, in answer to the claim that the judgment therein referred to was not interlocutory in character. In Stockton v. Insurance Co., the point decided was that an order in the form of a judgment, and merely purporting to dispose of one of the defenses to the action, was not appealable as a final judgment. In Hibernia v. London, the decision was that a junior lienholder was a proper party defendant to a foreclosure suit, and that, this being so, the court had power therein to adjudge the validity of his lien. In the Fox Case the court merely interpreted its own judgment upon a previous appeal, saying that it required a retrial of the other issues before final judgment, although its previous judgment had directed a particular judgment below upon one of such issues. These cases were all doubtless properly decided, but they cannot be regarded as decisive of, or applicable to, the question presented in the present case.

We think it is within the sound discretion of the trial court in a foreclosure suit to give the plaintiff judgment for the relief asked and postpone the determination of conflicting claims between the defendants in which the plaintiff is not interested, and which do not affect the relief which he asks. Stockton, etc., Soc. v. Harrold, 127 Cal. 620, 60 Pac. 165. The practice has been approved and the power of the court in that respect declared in other jurisdictions. Kenney v. Apgar, 93 N. Y. 546; Jackson v. Dutton, 46 Fla. 517, 35 South. 74; Alabama, etc., Co. v. Robinson, 72 Fed. 708, 19 C. C. A. 152; First Natl. Bank v. Shedd, 121 U. S. 74, 7 Sup. Ct. 807, 30 L. Ed. 877; Wheeler v. Van Kuren, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 490; Renwick v. Maccomb, Hopkins Ch. (N. Y.) 277. In McClain v. Hutton, 131 Cal. 145, 61 Pac. 273, 63 Pac. 182, 622, this court itself, on appeal, directed the entry below of a judgment similar in this respect to the one given in this case. We are of the opinion that the court has power, in an appropriate action, and in furtherance of justice, to postpone the disposition of conflicting claims of the defendant in a foreclosure suit, when they do not affect the plaintiff's rights.

The facts appearing in this case fully justify the course pursued. There was no defense to plaintiff's action. He was in no wise interested in the controversy between the defendants either with respect to their asserted liens on the property or their claims that the deeds referred to were fraudulently executed. Indeed, it could be said with some reason that a suit by Nichols, or the bank, against the Davis family, to set aside a deed as fraudulent to creditors has no necessary place in an action by a third person to foreclose a prior mortgage on land belonging to Davis. It further appears that in the attachment suits of defendant Nichols against Davis and wife appeals have been taken from orders refusing to dissolve the attachments; that said appeals and said actions are still pending; that Davis and wife had begun an action in Alameda county against Nichols to cancel the notes on which the Nichols actions were based; that judgment therein had been given against them, from which they had appealed, and that said appeal was also pending. The plaintiff not only had no interest in these disputes, but he had no power to end or control them. The litigation was of a character which usually engenders bitter feeling and continues many years. It was both just and reasonable to give the plaintiff the relief which all the parties admitted he was entitled to, and not compel him to wait the termination of litigation of that character before enabling him to recover a just debt. There is no force in the argument of the appellants that such practice would be improper because it would imperil or prejudice the defendants' right of redemption. The redemption would run from the time of sale and the amounts to be paid would depend on the price paid at the sale. The postponement of the decision of the disputes between the defendants would have no direct effect upon the right of redemption. We are satisfied that the court wisely exercised its discretion in this instance.

In case No. 2160 Baur and others have sued to foreclose a mortgage given by Davis and wife on another tract of land in Yolo county to secure a debt of $7,000. The same persons were made defendants, and the pleadings, proceedings, and judgment were in all material particulars the same as those in No. 2159 aforesaid. The same principles and conclusions apply to that case as to the other.

The judgment in each case and the orders denying a new trial in each case are, respectively, affirmed.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐299—ACTIONS TO RECOVER POSSESSION—DEFENSES—"PREVENTION."

A contract for the sale of land, payable in installments, provided that defendants should be admitted to possession, but that upon their failure to make required payments the vendor might reenter and take possession. There was nothing in the contract suggesting that crops were to be raised on the land, or that the purchase price was to be obtained by the sale of such crops. Held, that, defendants having defaulted in payments, plaintiff's tort in cutting a levee and flooding a portion of the land could not be set up as a defense to ejectment because it was not a prevention, which is a breach of some duty one party to a contract owes the other as a condition precedent to performance, nor could it be relied on as a counterclaim, not arising out of the same transaction.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; J. A. Allen, Judge on Order, and John G. Covert, Judge on Judgment.

Action by the Empire Investment Company against C. E. Mort and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed, and from an order granting new trial, defendants appealed. Order affirmed, and plaintiff's appeal dismissed.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff. H. Scott Jacobs and John G. Covert, both of Hanford, for defendants.

MELVIN, J. The Empire Investment Company, in September, 1910, entered into a contract with defendants whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and defendants to buy a tract of land in Kings county for something more than $23,000, payable in annual installments. The first payment was due on November 1, 1911, but was not met by defendants, and, plaintiff having elected to declare the contract forfeited and so to notify defendants, brought suit to recover possession of the tract and for damages for retention, alleging in its complaint that it was the owner in fee of the property. Defendants answered, and upon issues thus joined and upon others, arising by reason of a pleading in the nature of a cross-complaint and an amendment to the answer (both of which defendants were permitted to file after the cause had come on for trial before the court and jury), the case was tried and judgment was given in favor of defendants. From this judgment plaintiff appealed during the preparation of the statement on motion for a new trial. Subsequently the motion for a new trial was granted, and from the court's order in that behalf defendants have appealed. Both appeals are by stipulation heard together.

By the contract of sale and purchase, which admittedly was made by the parties hereto, it was provided, among other things, that Messrs. Mort and Wagy should take and occupy the premises until they should make default; that they should pay all taxes and all dues for water; that time was of the essence of the agreement; and that failure by the vendees to perform any of the covenants would, at the option of the vendor, terminate the contract and the interest of the vendees and give the Empire Investment Company the right to reenter and take possession of the land. These provisions of the agreement and others were set forth in plaintiff's amended complaint, and in addition to the allegation that no part of the purchase price had been tendered or received, it was averred that defendants had failed to settle the water rent and had, in fact, paid nothing under the contract; that upon their refusal, upon request of performance of the terms of that agreement, plaintiff had demanded possession of the land and notified defendants that it elected to terminate the agreement. The prayer was for the usual relief in such cases. In their answer as originally filed defendants denied plaintiff's title to a part of the land in dispute and to the water rights attached thereto, and alleged that by plaintiff's fraud they had been prevented from learning such facts until long after the suit had been instituted; denied that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the land; admitted their own possession thereof; and denied that the water company had furnished water, as agreed, for the land, or that they owed for water used on the premises. As a separate defense it was alleged that in June, 1911, plaintiff, by the blowing up of a certain levee, had caused the waters of the river to overflow the planted crops of defendants, thus preventing them from making the payments stipulated in the contract and damaging them in a large sum of money. When the case came on for trial the court permitted the filing of an amended answer, setting up substantially all of the matters pleaded in the original answer, but introducing for the first time a counterclaim against plaintiff for the alleged damages suffered by defendants because of the overflow of the water. On motion, the parts of the answer denying plaintiff's title to the land in controversy were stricken out on the ground that defendants were estopped from disputing such title. The court ruled that it would be taken as an admitted fact in the case that plaintiff owned the property described in the complaint. Plaintiff thereupon offered evidence on the issue of the rental value of the premises after the default of defendants, and upon the matter of the furnishing of water to defendants by the water company referred to in the complaint and the failure of defendants to pay for such water. During the trial defendants sought unsuccessfully to introduce evidence of a certain oral agreement made by the parties at the time the written contract was executed; but subsequently, by amendment to the answer, they were allowed to plead it and in the trial to offer testimony in support of such oral agreement. The alleged verbal contract was, in brief, that if Messrs. Wagy and Mort would sign the written instrument which was then presented to them, the Empire Investment Company would complete the levee along the west line of the land now in question in the suit, being the east bank of Kings river, would repair the weak places in the levee; would bring it up to grade, and would construct and complete a levee along the south line of the property.

[1] Plaintiff insists that, even upon the assumption of the absence of error from the court's ruling permitting the amendments and the testimony in support of them, defendants have no standing in their attack upon the order granting a new trial, for the reason that the facts forming the basis of the answer were all disputed. For example, defendants introduced testimony tending to show that one Howard Odale blew up the levee, thus causing a great and destructive flow of water over their crops and that Odale was the agent of plaintiff, acting within the scope of his employment. Plaintiff denied Odale's agency, and also the existence of any oral agreement binding it to repair any levees or to keep them in repair. These denials were all supported by testimony in conflict with that which defendants offered. One of the grounds upon which the court granted the motion for a new trial was insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. We may not disturb such an order where there was a conflict of evidence upon material issues, unless we may say that a verdict in favor of the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in the evidence adduced at the trial. Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 416, 95 Pac. 1029; Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 509, 123 Pac. 288. And this is the rule even in a case in which, as in this one, the judge who made the order did not preside at the trial. There was direct testimony that Odale was not employed by plaintiff at all, but was a servant of the Empire Water Company. Defendants introduced testimony of circumstances tending to show that Odale was the ostensible agent of plaintiff, but the existence of many of these circumstances was denied by plaintiff's witnesses. Both defendants gave testimony regarding the oral agreement, but they were flatly contradicted by plaintiff's witnesses. There was ample evidence in the record to have given support to a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such evidence had been accepted as true. Therefore under the pleadings, as they stood, the order should be affirmed.

[2, 3] As the case may be tried again, we shall discuss some of the errors of law specified. Plaintiff contends that the action was one in ejectment and not on the contract. It is insisted that when defendants failed to perform the conditions of the contract plaintiff immediately became entitled to possession of the land, and might maintain ejectment to obtain such possession. Defendants may not hold the premises and withhold the purchase price. Undoubtedly that is the rule. Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 104, 103 Pac. 329; Champion Gold Mining Co. v. Champion Mines, 164 Cal. 205, 128 Pac. 315. This is an action in ejectment. Haggin v. Kelly, 136 Cal. 483, 69 Pac. 140; Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 598, 27 Pac. 66; Kerns v. Dean, 77 Cal. 557, 19 Pac. 817. As against the issues tendered by such a pleading an independent tort was not available. There was nothing in the contract suggesting that a crop was to be raised upon the land, or that the purchase price was to be earned by sale of the proceeds of any crop or crops. The contract provided for money payments at specified times. There were no precedent duties to be performed by plaintiff before defendants upon the dates indicated in the agreement should be bound to make payments. The alleged tort, therefore, had no relation to the payments under the contract. An act which amounts to prevention of the performance of a contract must be one which has relation to the subject thereof. The crops were not mentioned in the agreement. There was no sale of them to plaintiff, and no pledge or understanding that the proceeds of the land should be devoted to the payment of the purchase price. Therefore this was not an instance of the destruction of the subject of the sale. There was nothing in the tort or its results which essentially interfered with the carrying out of the stipulations contained in the writing. A "prevention" must be a breach of some duty which one party to the contract owes to the other as a condition precedent to performance. Therefore the tort was not properly pleaded as a defense to the action. Cox v. McLaughlin, 54 Cal. 605; Porter v. Arrowhead R. Co., 100 Cal. 500, 35 Pac. 146; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 13, 96 Pac. 884. For like reasons the counterclaim was not a proper one in such an action. The alleged tort of defendants and the tort of plaintiff averred by way of counterclaim did not arise out of the same transaction. In any event, such a counterclaim may not be set up in an action of ejectment. Wigmore v. Buell, 116 Cal. 95, 47 Pac. 927.

The counterclaim does not tend to defeat plaintiff's recovery. Plaintiff asked for possession of certain land. Defendants' demand was for a money judgment by way of damages. Plainly the two causes of action founded on tort were distinct and did not arise out of the same transaction. It was therefore error to allow the amendment introducing the so-called counterclaim. Yorba v. Ward, 109 Cal. 108, 38 Pac. 48, 41 Pac. 793; Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 499, 74 Pac. 40; Glide v. Kayser, 142 Cal. 420, 76 Pac. 50; Engebretson v. Gay, 158 Cal. 29, 109 Pac. 879.

[4] The trial court at first rejected all evidence regarding the oral agreement on the ground that no such contract had been pleaded. Subsequently, and after amendment to the complaint, evidence regarding it was received. Two of the questions submitted to the jury related to this oral understanding, and the jury decided that plaintiff did enter into such agreement and failed to perform it. The secretary of plaintiff with whom, according to defendants, they made the oral contract, denied that he made any such arrangement with them. This conflict of testimony would prevent us, upon principles previously discussed herein, from disturbing the order granting a new trial. But plaintiff contends that evidence of the alleged contract was improperly admitted because by its terms the agreement was not independent of and collateral to the written contract. During the earlier negotiations between the contracting parties there were discussions with reference to the construction of levees to protect the land which defendants wished to purchase, and a contract relating to the construction of such levees was prepared and inspected by defendants. Before the consummation of the negotiations the levees had been built, and the contract in its final form, when it was signed by the vendees, omitted all reference to the levees. The oral agreement dealt, therefore, with a subject which had been discussed in the preliminary negotiations and rejected from the culminating terms set forth in the written instrument, and it sought to impose duties upon the vendor with reference to a part or appurtenance of the land mentioned in the agreement. It is contended that improvement of the levees and maintenance of them were two subjects upon which the written contract was silent, and that therefore proof of an oral agreement regarding these matters was perfectly proper. But where a written agreement purports to be complete, parol evidence is no more admissible for the purpose of adding terms to it than would such evidence be proper in an effort to vary the terms of the instrument itself. Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 594, 96 Pac. 319; Johnson v. Bibb Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 98, 73 Pac. 730.

[5] The oral agreement was also inadmissible because it dealt with the creation of a fixture on real property and with the granting of an easement in real property. It was therefore within the statute of frauds. Section 1971, Code Civ. Proc.; Dorris v. Sullivan, 90 Cal. 289, 27 Pac. 216; Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 398, 27 Pac. 772; Oliver v. Burnett, 10 Cal. App. 408, 102 Pac. 223.

[6] Plaintiff attacks the sufficiency of the evidence offered for the purpose of proving Odale's implied agency existing at the time he blew up the levee, but as the evidence at the new trial may be totally different from that on the record before us, we will not here discuss this contention. It was error, however, to admit testimony regarding Odale's extrajudicial statements or declarations in pais for the purpose of establishing his agency. Kast v. Miller & Lux, 150 Cal. 728, 115 Pac. 932.

No other alleged errors require discussion.

The order granting the motion of plaintiff for a new trial is affirmed, and as that order operates in effect to set aside the judgment, plaintiff's appeal from said judgment is dismissed.

4. PLEADING ⇐69—ADMISSIONS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

In an oil refining company's action for damages for breach of contract to supply sufficient crude oil for its capacity, an allegation in the complaint that defendant began the delivery of oil, and up to and including a certain month furnished and delivered oil to plaintiff, was not an allegation or admission that during such period defendant furnished sufficient crude oil, but a declaration merely that defendant furnished some, and that if there was a shortage in the delivery, plaintiff was not seeking to recover on account of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. ¶69.]

5. DAMAGES ¶126—MEASURE — BREACH OF CONTRACT—STATUTE.

In an action for damages for breach of a contract to furnish crude oil sufficient for the capacity of plaintiff's refinery, and to repurchase certain refinery products at a fixed price, where in it was pleaded and proven that plaintiff, after the breach was unable to purchase crude oil in the open market, the proper measure of damages was the loss of profit to plaintiff by reason of defendant's failure to furnish oil at a fixed price and to repurchase the refinery products, as prescribed by Civ. Code, § 3300, declaring the measure to be the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment approximately caused by the breach; and sections 3353, 3354, relating to violations of contracts for the purchase and sale of personal property, did not apply.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the National Oil Refining Company against the Producers' Refining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Barton, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, by the terms of which the latter agreed to supply the former with all of the crude oil required to keep the former's refinery running to its full capacity from January 29, to December 31, 1907. The full capacity was understood to be the capacity of this refinery on January 29th. The defendant was to sell this oil at a stipulated price, and in turn was to purchase from the plaintiff the products of the refinery, these products being the distillates and the asphaltum residuum. This action was brought laying damages for defendant's breach of this contract. Plaintiff alleged that the capacity of its refinery was 8,927.18 barrels of distillate and 812.29 tons of asphaltum per month; that it had not been furnished sufficient crude oil to keep the refinery running continuously to its capacity, whereby plaintiff was obliged to close down repeatedly, to its great damage. It was further alleged that the plaintiff could not procure oil in the open market to supply the deficiency. On the trial the quantity of oil that was actually delivered to the plaintiff by the defendant was agreed upon by stipulation to be 58,224.28 barrels. A basic question upon the trial was obviously the capacity of plaintiff's refinery at the time when the contract became effective. If defendant did not furnish oil to that capacity in accordance with its contract, and its failure so to do was not occasioned by causes which the contract itself provided should relieve the defendant from liability, such as fires, strikes, and accidents, then defendant had violated its contract, and the remaining question in the case was the measure and amount of damages. Plaintiff offered evidence upon the capacity of its refinery. The court found that capacity to be 12,000 barrels of crude oil per month, or 80,000 barrels for the period from May to November; this being the period during which plaintiff charged that defendant had breached the contract by failure to supply oil in sufficient quantities. Twelve thousand barrels a month was well within the capacity shown by plaintiff's evidence. Appellant does not argue that it did not violate the contract, but urges as serious error certain rulings of the court touching the admission of evidence, and also it insists that the court adopted an inaccurate measure of damages.

[1-3] George Calhoun was the manager of plaintiff's business. He signed on behalf of the plaintiff the contract the breach of which is the subject-matter of this litigation. He was plaintiff's principal witness in the case. He was interested financially in the affairs of plaintiff as a stockholder as well as manager. Upon cross-examination the witness was asked numerous questions, to which objections were interposed and sustained as not being proper cross-examination. These were matters concerning which the witness had not been interrogated upon his examination in chief. The attorney for the defendant made a long statement to the court of what he proposed to show by this cross-examination. The statement itself covers several printed pages. Summarized it amounted to this: That the witness manager was having trouble with the stockholders; that to keep them quiet he had promised them a dividend of $30,000; that he sought to make this $30,000 by this unwarranted and unjustifiable suit prosecuted against defendant; that further to show the unjustifiableness of the action, defendant wished to prove that the witness had made several or many sets of figures, endeavoring fictitiously to swell the amount of damages which plaintiff claimed; "that it was with the utmost difficulty, and required the greatest ingenuity, to get items of alleged damage that would make any plausible showing of approximately $30,000"; that plaintiff, after beginning this suit, for the purpose of soothing the stockholders, "got a big newspaper write-up"; that therefore the plaintiff's motive was not to recover damages actually sustained, but merely to impress its stockholders that plaintiff had large assets growing out of the asserted damages which it had sustained at the hands of defendant. The same effort was made with the witness McGrath, who had formerly been the secretary of the plaintiff, McGrath being a witness for defendant. The court ruled against the admissibility of such evidence, and its ruling was wise and proper. It permitted all evidence touching the interest of the witness and his relationship to plaintiff. The court even offered to allow evidence that Calhoun had made different figures and estimates going to the damages which plaintiff had sustained. Indeed, the court's declaration upon this offer was, if anything, an expression of its willingness, not alone to go as far as the law allowed in the matter of the reception of evidence, but perhaps a trifle further. But very properly, as we have said, did it refuse to allow this wandering excursion into the domain of motive. The interest of a witness may be shown. His bias and prejudice may be shown. But if in cases such as this the motive, separated from these elements, is the subject of evidence, civil trials beginning now will end with eternity. By this we mean motive apart from those admissible inquiries prosecuted within reasonable bounds, which may be regarded as involving motive—the inquiries as to relationship, interest, bias, and prejudice. A man may have a right to foreclose a mortgage against A. and refuse to do so out of friendship. He may have the same cause of action against B. and insist upon prosecuting it because of his dislike for B. In the latter case his motive does not affect his right of action, nor the measure of his recovery, and it is not, therefore, a proper subject-matter of inquiry. The cases in which motive, apart from its establishment by interest, relationship, bias, or prejudice, and aside from criminal cases, becomes a proper subject-matter of inquiry, are ones where it is held that malice or a malicious motive may make an otherwise lawful act unlawful and actionable. See note to Globe & Rutgers Fire Ins. Co. v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 869. No such contention is here advanced, and for the rest, upon plain grounds of expediency and in accordance with the public policy which declares it to be to the interest of the state that there should be an end to litigation, these far journeys into the speculative realm of motive are not permitted. The motive to which section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure refers when it declares that the presumption that a witness speaks the truth may be repelled by evidence affecting his motives means the kind of motive we have been discussing. Finally it may be added that if for a moment it could be thought (the vital interest of this witness having been shown) that evidence of this remote motive, namely, that he was having trouble with the stockholders, could have exercised a more com-elling influence upon the witness to deceive, the answer is that he could not have deceived the court as to the measure of damages, for that was a matter of law, and as to the capacity of the refinery, his evidence may be rejected entirely, and there is left uncontradicted evidence of other witnesses, in no wise discredited, showing a capacity even greater than that which the court found.

[4] Appellant next contends that the obligation which defendant undertook was to supply sufficient crude oil for the capacity which the refinery had in January, the month when the contract was entered into. This is true. Appellant then argues that the complaint alleges, and by alleging admits, that defendant furnished oil up to the capacity of the refinery for the months of February, March, and April. Defendant then shows the amount of crude oil that was furnished in those three months, and, averaging the amount, finds that 5,482.18 barrels per month was the full capacity of the refinery. Wherefore, as appellant argues, it follows that the finding of the court that the capacity was 12,000 barrels per month is beyond the admission of the pleadings. In its argument appellant states that it was alleged by the plaintiff and admitted that "the defendant furnished crude oil in accordance with and as required by the contract." It was neither so alleged nor so admitted, the complaint in this regard stating merely that defendant began the delivery of crude oil and "up to and including the month of April, 1907, furnished and delivered to the plaintiff crude oil." This is far from being either an allegation or admission that during this period of time defendant furnished sufficient crude oil. It is a declaration merely that defendant furnished some, and that if there was a shortage in the delivery, plaintiff is not seeking a recovery on account of it. This is fully explained by reason of the fact that defendant's pipe line was incapable, during that time, of supplying the necessary quantity; that defendants seemed to be using its best endeavors to correct the situation and furnish the oil, and that plaintiff in its action has seen fit to waive any claim for compensation for the shortage during that time. Appellant likewise insists that the same matter—the monthly capacity of the refinery—is covered by a stipulation of the parties. We need not elaborate upon the matter nor say anything further than that this contention finds as little support as does the one we have just been considering, namely, that plaintiff's pleadings admit the capacity. Indeed, it would be remarkable if this were the case, since the actual capacity was upon the trial made the subject of voluminous evidence and was one of the important issues in the case.

[5] Next it is insisted that the court erred as to the measure of damages. It is said that the damages should be measured under sections 3353 and 3354 of the Civil Code, which have relation to violations of contract for the purchase and sale of personal property. The court for the measure of damages applied section 3300, which declares that the measure is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused by the breach. What the court did was to estimate the loss of profit to the plaintiff by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish oil at a fixed price and to repurchase the products after refinement, also at a fixed price. It was pleaded and proved that plaintiff, after the breach, was unable to purchase crude oil in the open market. The measure of damages adopted by the court was the precise one applicable to the case, and the case itself is exceptional in that to determine those profits no resort is necessary to the uncertainty of current market value, the price being fixed by the contract. That the loss of profits in a case such as this is a just element in the admeasurement of damages is abundantly established. Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, 48 Pac. 62; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242, 41 Pac. 1020; McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667.

No other matters seem to merit specific consideration.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HAPPY VALLEY LAND & WATER CO. v. NELSON et al. (Sac. 2167.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1915. Rehearing Denied April 26, 1915.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 27 — WATER RIGHTS IN PUBLIC LANDS — STATUTES.

A tunnel and flume company which actually appropriated and used a ditch constructed to convey water for mining purposes over government lands before their sale into private ownership acquired a vested, possessory title under the act of Congress of 1866 (Act July 26, 1866, c. 262, § 9, 14 Stat. 253 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 4647]), and required no further or other record title for its support.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. — 27.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 156 — CONVEYANCES — DESCRIPTION — SUFFICIENCY.

Where all the properties and rights of a tunnel and fluming company vested by grant in plaintiff, a public service corporation engaged in supplying water, without objection by any of the grantors, and plaintiff had paid taxes upon such properties for more than five years previous to its injunction suit, and defendants had recognized its rights by paying it for water, defendants could not successfully assert that the description in the mesne conveyance from the tunnel company to the plaintiff were so defective as to convey no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 153, 174-183; Dec. Dig. — 156.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 145 — APPROPRIATION — CHANGE IN USE.

Where a tunnel and fluming company was incorporated for "the purpose of ditching and conveying water for mining and other purposes," etc., its change from the sale of water for mining purposes to sales for irrigation and domestic uses was legitimate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. — 145.]

4. EVIDENCE — 471 — OPINIONS — FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS.

In a suit by a public service water company to enjoin defendants from interfering with its ditch and water, in which they claimed certain rights, where there was testimony that one H. had been in charge of the ditch as the agent of the company's predecessor, testimony of such agent that he was the superintendent and manager of the system and had always claimed the ditch in question as part of such system was admissible over objection that it was a conclusion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Chas. M. Head, Judge.

Action for injunction by the Happy Valley Land & Water Company against P. Nelson and others, with cross-complaint by defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wal. J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for appellants. Francis Carr, of Redding, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, a public service corporation, engaged in the rental, distribution, and sale of water, sued defendants, asserting title to certain water and water rights and a ditch through which the water was carried, and seeking to restrain defendants from interfering with the ditch and water. The complaint alleged that the defendants asserted some right and interest to the plaintiff's water and water rights and ditches, and asked a decree affirming and quieting its title and rights against those asserted by defendants. The court gave judgment for plaintiff, and from that judgment, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Upon the appeal no contention is made that the judgment is not supported by the findings; the questions on appeal being limited to the proposition that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

[1] It was established that plaintiff's predecessor in interest, the Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company, was incorporated for "the purpose of ditching and conveying water for mining and other purposes," etc. Years before the predecessors in interest of these defendants acquired title to their lands this corporation, with actual appropriation and user, had constructed the ditch in question, and was carrying water through it, originally for mining purposes, subsequently for purposes of irrigation and domestic use. These rights of plaintiff's predecessors, having been acquired over the government lands before their sale in private ownership, gave a vested possessory title under the act of Congress of 1866, and required no further or other record title for their support.

[2] Complaint is made by appellants that the description in the mesne conveyances from the Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company to plaintiff were so defective as really to convey nothing. But it is not controverted, and cannot successfully be controverted, that all of the properties and rights of the Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company have vested in this plaintiff without objection by any of the grantors; that taxes upon these properties have been paid by plaintiff and its predecessors for more than five years previous to the commencement of the action; and that there was upon the part of these defendants a recognition of plaintiff's rights, in that they paid for the use of the ditch and the water taken therefrom a sum of money seasonally, and, in addition, kept the ditch in repair. All this was done by them in subordination to, and in recognition of, the rights of plaintiff, and only when plaintiff raised its water rates shortly before the commencement of this action did the defendants refuse to pay, and assert title and ownership in themselves.

[3] The Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company having appropriated the water for a useful purpose, its articles of incorporation authorizing it to use the water for mining and "other purposes of said corporation," the change in the use from sale for mining purposes to sale for purposes of irrigation and domestic use was legitimate. Moreover, it is not questioned but that the plaintiff, which, as has been said, has succeeded to all of the rights of the Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company, is formally and regularly incorporated for the supplying of water as a public service corporation.

Certain rulings in the admission of evidence are objected to. It may not be doubted that some of those objections were well taken; the answers admitting improper hearsay evidence. But it is not perceived that the answers themselves were of such a nature as to prejudice the case of appellants.

[4] It was testified to without objection by the witness Taylor that Harvey was in charge of the ditch as the agent of the Dry Creek Tunnel & Fluming Company, and that the witness, using water from the ditch, recognized the right of the company to the ditch and water at all times. Subsequently Harvey, called as a witness, testified that he was the superintendent and manager of the ditch system, and was claiming the ditch in controversy as part of the system. The objection was made that the question was suggestive, called for the conclusion of the witness, and assumed that he had authority to make a claim on behalf of the company. Undoubtedly, the form in which the question was cast made it suggestive, but the evidence elicited by the question was competent, and the technical error worked no substantial injury.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of R. T. Harris, deceased. From an order determining that certain property belonged to Maria L. Harris, administratrix, and adjudging the account settled, Clara G. Fulsom appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for appellant. Scarborough & Forgy, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SHAW, J. [1] Personal property may be held by two or more persons in joint tenancy. There is no distinction, in this respect, between real property and personal property. Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. U., 127 Cal. 142, 59 Pac. 390, 78 Am. St. Rep. 35; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 146 Pac. 647.

[2] "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." Civ. Code, § 683.

"A transfer may be made without writing, in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute." Civ. Code, § 1052. Section 1091 of the Civil Code provides that an estate in real property can be transferred only by operation of law, or by a duly executed instrument in writing. But there is no provision of the Code which requires the execution of a writing to effect a transfer of personal property. It follows, therefore, that a joint tenancy in personal property may be created by an oral agreement by which the title to the property is transferred to two persons as joint tenants.

[3] One of the incidents of a joint tenancy is that, upon death of one of two joint tenants, the survivor thereupon becomes the sole owner of the entirety, not by descent, but by survivorship and in virtue of the original grant creating the tenancy. Hannon v. Southern P. R. R. Co., 12 Cal. App. 356, 107 Pac. 335; Kennedy v. Kennedy, supra; De Witt v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. 297; Greer v. Blanchard, 40 Cal. 197. No rights of creditors are involved in this case, and consequently we need not determine whether or not a creditor would have a right to resort to the estate of a decedent in property held in joint tenancy by him and another person.

[4] These propositions determine the rights of the parties here and uphold the decision of the court below. The decedent and Maria L. Harris were married 23 years before his death. Each had some separate property, and they accumulated other property by their joint efforts during the marriage. An agreement was made between them in the early years of their marriage, which, in effect, provided that all the property held or acquired by either or both of them during the marriage should be held together in joint ownership as joint tenants. To carry out this agreement, the money received from earnings, proceeds of property, and all other sources by either of them was deposited in a bank from time to time to their joint account in pursuance of an agreement between them, which was entered in writing in the passbook of said account as follows:

"It is expressly agreed that the money represented by the within account is, and all future deposits of the account shall be, the joint property of the undersigned, and is and shall be held in joint tenancy, subject to checks by either of us during life, and at the death of either the balance remaining in this account does and shall belong to the survivor, and the bank is directed to pay such balance to such survivor upon his or her check and the return of this book."

All the property in controversy was acquired with money from this joint account, and it was agreed between them that the title thereto should be taken and held by them as joint tenants in the same manner as the money was deposited. Some of it was corporate stock, the certificates whereof were issued to R. T. Harris and were by him indorsed and placed in a safe deposit box in which they kept the papers pertaining to the joint property. Part of it was loaned upon a note made payable to "R. T. Harris or Maria L. Harris."

Upon the death of R. T. Harris, his widow, respondent herein, was appointed administratrix of his estate. She filed her final account as such administratrix, showing total receipts of $5,040, and that she had paid out all of it and a little more on debts of the decedent and on expenses of administration. She did not include in the account the joint property in controversy, nor account for it at all in the administration. There were no children of the marriage, and Harris left no father, mother, or issue surviving. The appellant, a sister of Harris, objected to the final account, claiming that the property acquired as above stated was not held in joint tenancy, but was either community property of the marriage or the separate property of the decedent, in either of which alternatives a portion of it would descend to the sister, and all of it would have been subject to administration. The court overruled her objections, decided that the property belonged to Maria L. Harris, that nothing remained to be accounted for in the estate, and adjudged the account settled. From this order the sister appealed. The case is not essentially different from Kennedy v. Kennedy, supra. The property acquired with money taken from the bank account would retain the character of joint property, the same as the money with which it was obtained, unless by some agreement between the parties its character was changed. No such agreement was made, but the contrary was agreed upon. On the authority of the case of Kennedy v. Kennedy, the order of the court below is correct.

The order is affirmed.

CITY OF HANFORD v. HANFORD GAS & POWER CO. (Sac. 2118.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1915.)

TAXATION ⚡157—FRANCHISES—GROSS RECEIPTS.

Though a corporation maintained mains and laterals in city streets to supply gas to the city and its inhabitants, the city, on granting a franchise to the corporation to supply gas for heat, light, and power, could require payment to the city of a per cent. of the gross annual receipts from the operation of the franchise; for the corporation, on accepting the franchise, acquired the additional right to supply gas for heat and power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 277; Dec. Dig. ⚡157.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the City of Hanford against the Hanford Gas & Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John G. Covert, of Hanford, for appellant.
F. E. Kilpatrick, of Hanford, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The city of Hanford, a city of the sixth class, sued defendant, the Hanford Gas & Power Company, to recover judgment for a specific sum, with interest, this sum being 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts of the defendant, earned by operating its plant in the city of Hanford, under the provisions of Ordinance No. 115 of that city. Defendant demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled. Defendant declining to answer, judgment was given against it, and it appeals. It appears that the defendant, a public service corporation, was and had been for many years occupying the streets of the city of Hanford with mains and laterals for the supplying of gas to the inhabitants of the city. It was exercising this franchise under the constitutional grant and permission of section 19, art. 11, of the Constitution as it read prior to the amendment of October 10, 1911. The Legislature in 1901 enumerated certain franchises which a municipality might dispose of by sale, and provided for the manner of disposition. Stats. 1901, p. 265. Amongst these franchises was the franchise "to lay gas pipes for the purpose of carrying gas for heat and power." In 1902 an application was filed with the board of trustees of the city of Hanford for a franchise for the privilege of using the public streets and thoroughfares of the city for the purposes of laying pipes and conduits therein to supply the city and its inhabitants with gas "for heat, light, and power." Pursuing the course prescribed by the act of 1901, above cited, the city of Hanford advertised for bids, and sold this franchise to the applicant Young, who, in turn, conveyed and assigned all his franchise rights to defendant corporation. The act of 1901 required that the successful bidder and this assigns must, during the life of the franchise, pay to the municipality 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from the use and operation or possession of the franchise. Such provision was contained in the grant to Young. It is this 2 per cent. which defendant has refused to pay, and for which judgment was sought and obtained. Upon appeal appellant places reliance upon such cases as In re Johnson, 137 Cal. 115, 69 Pac. 973; Denninger v. Recorder's Court, 145 Cal. 629, 79 Pac. 360; People v. Los Angeles Gas Co., 150 Cal. 557, 89 Pac. 108; and Town of St. Helena v. Ewer (Cal.) 146 Pac. 191. To sum up its argument under these cases, appellant declares that, by virtue of the constitutional grant in section 19, art. 11, it had the free right to use the streets for gas mains and laterals without being subject to any charge for such use by the municipality. This may at once be conceded to be true. It argues that, while the Constitution limits the right of public service corporations to the use of the streets for the purpose of supplying "gaslight or other illuminating light," the fact that by the same mains and laterals the gas so carried and purveyed may be used for heat or power imposes no additional burden upon the municipality or its streets, and does not therefore become the legitimate subject-matter of a new franchise, with onerous payments and exactions thereunder; that therefore it acquired nothing by virtue of the franchise which it secured for the furnishing of gas for heat and power, and, as it acquired nothing, can be made to pay nothing for nothing. The cases upon which appellant relies, however, are not decisions in accordance with its contention, which contention was in no one of them involved. In re Johnson, 137 Cal. 115, 69 Pac. 973, merely decided that certain onerous provisions of an ordinance of the city of Pasadena unconstitutional hampered the right of public service corporations to lay their pipes for illuminating gas or water in the streets of that city, and, so far as the matter before us is concerned, it decided nothing more. To the suggestion on the part of the city of Pasadena that it was the purpose of the corporation to supply gas for other than illuminating purposes, this court answered that, even if the suggestion were founded upon fact, it did not deprive the corporation of the right conferred upon it by the Constitution (to lay pipes for the furnishing of gas for light) "or authorize the municipality to prevent it from enjoying that right." In Denninger v. Recorder's Court, 145 Cal. 632, 79 Pac. 361, an ordinance regulating and fixing gas rates was under consideration. The petitioner was convicted of having collected a rate in excess of the municipal rate. The conviction was upheld. In the course of the discussion this court said:

to lay pipes and conduits in the streets of a city in order to supply gas for cooking and heating purposes, but only so far as may be necessary for supplying the city and its inhabitants with gaslight. The same gas, however, which furnishes light also serves for cooking and heating, and the pipes and connections necessary for the one purpose make the gas available for the other purposes without subjecting the streets to any additional burden."

In People ex rel. City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Independent Gas Co., 150 Cal. 557, 89 Pac. 108, the state, by quo warranto, sought to forfeit the unquestioned constitutional franchise of the defendant gas company to use the streets for the supplying of gas for illuminating purposes because the company was also through the same mains, laterals, and connections supplying the same gas for purposes of heat, power, and cooking. It is to be borne in mind that the effort was not to prevent the defendant company from using a franchise which it did not possess, namely, the franchise to supply the gas for purposes other than illumination, but it was to forfeit its franchise for the supplying of gas for illumination because it was permitting the gas to be used for other purposes. The trial court refused to forfeit the franchise, and this court affirmed the judgment. In so doing it nowhere declared that a gas company, purveying gas under the Constitution for illuminating purposes, had under that constitutional franchise the right to supply it for other purposes. It held merely that it would not forfeit the franchise because it was so doing. It is not even intimated as to what the decision of this court would have been had the action been addressed to an effort to restrain the defendant corporation from exercising a franchise not given to it by the Constitution, namely, the franchise of supplying gas for heat, power, and cooking. It is said in this case, but only arguendo, that:

"The burden upon the street is in no way increased by the fact that the use of the gas carried through the pipe is not confined to illumination."

In St. Helena v. Ewer, supra, the Court of Appeal had under review an ordinance of the town of St. Helena granting a franchise for supplying the town and its inhabitants with water. The defendant acquired this franchise under a bid agreeing to pay 7½ per cent. of the gross annual receipts from the sale of water under the franchise. This franchise was one granted under the franchise act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 135), held to be unconstitutional in Pereria v. Wallace, 129 Cal. 397, 62 Pac. 61, as an attempt to impose illegal conditions upon the franchises freely granted by the Constitution under section 19, art. 11.

Manifestly, no one of these cases is in point upon the question here under consideration. The franchise granted by the city of Hanford did not attempt to touch upon, nor deal with, defendant's rights to supply gas for illuminating purposes. Unquestionably, while the same gas may be used through the same mains and laterals, the use of gas for heat and power is a distinct and different use from its use for illumination, and it is only the right to the latter use which is protected and, so to speak, given free under the Constitution. To say, as our decisions have said, that the franchise to supply illuminating gas will not be forfeited because the purveyor permits its gas to be used for purposes not covered by the franchise, is very different from saying that with the franchise to furnish gas for lighting purposes goes the franchise right to furnish it for the other purposes. The latter this court has never said, and from nothing that it has said can any such inference be derived. If the use is different, the right to the use is different. Conceivably a corporation might be formed for the purpose of supplying a gas unfit for illumination, but eminently well suited for purposes of heat and power. Could such a company without a franchise occupy the streets for this purpose under the constitutional grant of a right to occupy the streets for the supplying of illuminating gas? If it could not, then per contra a company supplying illuminating gas has acquired no right to supply a gas for the other separate enumerated uses. The vital question then is: Did the defendant, in accepting this franchise from the city of Hanford, acquire anything of value? If it did, then, no element of fraud entering into the case, it is bound by its contract. We think clearly that it did. Up to the time that it acquired the right to supply gas for purposes of heat and power it had the franchise right to supply gas solely for purposes of illumination, with the added guaranty under the decisions of this court that its franchise to supply illuminating gas would not be forfeited merely because it permitted its gas to be used for these other purposes. It was not told that it had the right, and it did not have the legal right, to permit its gas so to be used. If effort had been directed to that end, this use could undoubtedly have been restrained. The city of Hanford admittedly, under its charter (Mun. Cor. Act, [St. 1883, p. 270] § 862, subd. 13), had the power to grant the franchise for the use of its streets for the purveying of gas for heat and power, if the constitutional grant before referred to did not stand in the way. Clearly, it did not stand in the way, and, moreover, the Legislature itself had recognized that the different uses were subject to different franchise rights, and had made provision for the award by municipalities of separate franchises permitting these new uses.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

NICOLOSI v. CLARK. (Sac. 2174.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1915.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — 136 — INJURY TO CHILD — COMPLAINT—QUESTION OF LAW.

Though plaintiff, complaining of negligent injury, be a child of tender years, yet, the complaint setting forth all the facts and clearly establishing that he, through negligence or other cause, was so in fault as to destroy his right of action, there is no question for the jury, but the complaint is demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. —136.]

2. EXPLOSIVES — 8 — INJURY TO CHILD — TRESPASSER.

A boy of 10 years old, not alleged to be of deficient intellect and understanding, will be held as matter of law chargeable with knowledge that he has no right to take things from the open implement box of a contractor on a street, and so guilty of an unwarranted trespass in so doing, barring right of recovery for injury by dynamite caps so taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. —8.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Angelo Nicolosi, a minor, by L. Nicolosi, guardian ad litem, against T. E. Clark. Demurrer to complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John C. March, of Sacramento, for appellant. John W. Johnston, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The complaint charged that the defendant was a street contractor, and in pursuance of his business was engaged under a contract with the city of Sacramento in excavating a sewer trench in one of the streets of that city; that during the progress of this work the roadbed and sidewalks were open to the traveling public; that in the prosecution of his work defendant kept upon this street a large box, used for storing tools and implements; that this box was standing within three feet of the sidewalk; that there was kept in this large box a small box containing dynamite caps; that plaintiff, passing along the street, saw the large box, and—

“being a child of tender years, to wit, of the age of 10 years, and being attracted by the said open box, and being prompted by childish curiosity, said plaintiff approached the said open box and took therefrom the said small box containing said dynamite caps, and said plaintiff, being wholly ignorant of the dangerous character and composition of said dynamite caps, and without fault or negligence on his part, took from the small box one of the said dynamite caps, and while handling the same the said dynamite cap exploded with great force and violence, and by the explosion greatly bruised, maimed, and injured plaintiff.”

To this complaint a general demurrer was interposed and sustained. From the judgment which followed plaintiff appeals.

[1] The mere fact that plaintiff in such an action as this is of tender years does not require that the alleged cause of action be submitted to the jury to determine whether or not the plaintiff, through negligence or other cause, was himself so in fault as to destroy his right of action. Where the facts, as here, are set forth in the complaint, the question is one of law. If the complaint clearly establishes plaintiff's negligence in point of law, the demurrer was properly sustained. If the complaint does not do this, or even if it be reasonably debatable whether it does so or not, the question is one for the jury. Nagle v. California Southern R. R. Co., 88 Cal. 86, 25 Pac. 1106; Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 404, 53 Pac. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39; Bresette v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 162 Cal. 74, 121 Pac. 312.

[2] The contention of respondent upon this appeal is that the complaint itself shows such contributory negligence as to destroy plaintiff's right of action, even assuming that the placing of an open box for tools and appliances placed away from the sidewalk and on a highway in which street work was in progress was a negligent act of defendant. This court has so recently, in Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, entered into an elaborate consideration of the general question, that nothing further is necessary than a reference to that case. It is sought to bring this case within the principle of the turntable cases, the attractive machinery cases, and the attractive nuisance cases, a principle which has been applied in such cases as Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. 302, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, and Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700. To the contrary, however, the governing principle here is that declared in such cases as Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 349, 47 Pac. 113, 598, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, and Loftus v. Dehall, 133 Cal. 214, 65 Pac. 379. In the first of these, water had accumulated upon a vacant lot. Plaintiff, a child, playing in this water, was drowned. The child was a trespasser, and it was held that defendant owed no duty to guard his lot against such trespassers. In the latter, there was an open cellar upon a vacant lot. A child playing about the edge of it was pushed or fell in. It was declared that the fact that the lot was attractive to children as a playground did not cast a duty upon the owner of the lot to guard the cellar against trespassers. In Cahill v. Stone, supra, it was declared that the child, injured in playing about a push car upon the track of defendant, would have been a trespasser except for the allegation that “children were accustomed to play upon it with the knowledge and consent of the defendant.”

In the case at bar the plaintiff was clearly guilty of trespass, if not of pecculation. If a boy of 10 years of age is not chargeable with knowledge that he has no right to make free with the contents of a box placed such as this, manifestly a box belonging to other people and containing their goods, it can only be because that particular boy is of deficient intellect and understanding. But this is not alleged. Not being alleged, we hold it plain, as a proposition of law, that he was guilty of an unwarranted trespass, barring his right of recovery.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

I concur: LORIGAN, J.

MELVIN, J. I concur in the judgment, but I do not wish to be understood as unqualifiedly approving the decision of department 1 of this court in Cahill v. Stone, 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094. As a judge of the superior court I sustained the demurrer to the complaint in that case, and while having great respect for the learning and ability of the justices who rendered that opinion, a respect which has continued and grown through years of intimate association with them, I have not been able to agree with their conclusion that the facts pleaded in that complaint brought the case within the principle of the turntable cases. I thoroughly agree with Mr. Justice HENSHAW in his conclusion that a normal boy of 10 years knows that it is wrong for him to appropriate another's property, and I also believe that a boy of 12 having average intelligence, fully realizes the danger of playing on a loaded flat car. In the general discussion of law contained in the opinion in Cahill v. Stone, supra, I concur. I simply do not think that the facts set forth in that case justify the application of the rule in the turntable cases. In Cahill v. Stone, 167 Cal. 141, 138 Pac. 712, I concurred only in the affirmation of the order granting a new trial.

GLOUGIE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR COUNTY OF FRESNO. (S. F. 7358.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1915.)

PROHIBITION — 3 — GROUNDS — REMEDY BY APPEAL.

An application for prohibition presenting a question as to the jurisdiction of the superior court will be denied, where applicants had a remedy by appeal which, in view of the Supreme Court's power to prevent by supersedeas a retrial pending appeal, was plain, speedy, and adequate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-19; Dec. Dig. — 3.]

In Bank. Application by A. V. Glougie for alternative writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Fresno. Denied.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. We are of the opinion that the application should be denied. The petition does present a question as to the jurisdiction of the superior court. Petitioner, however, has his remedy by appeal, and in view of the power of this court to prevent by supersedeas a retrial pending appeal, if a sufficient showing is made to warrant such action, we are of the opinion that the remedy by appeal is sufficiently plain, speedy, and adequate.

The application is denied.

THOMAS v. VISALIA ELECTRIC R. CO. (Sac. 2168.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1915.)

1. TRIAL — 206 — INSTRUCTIONS — ISSUES AND EVIDENCE.

A litigant is entitled to proper instructions bearing upon any legitimate legal inference which may be drawn from evidence given, and is not limited to instructions addressed only to the positive evidence in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 500; Dec. Dig. — 206.]

2. EVIDENCE — 53 — "EVIDENTIARY PRESUMPTION" — "EVIDENTIARY INFERENCE."

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1958, defining an inference, and section 1959, defining a presumption, the difference between an "evidentiary presumption" and an "evidentiary inference" is that, when the law requires the jury to draw a certain designated conclusion from particular evidence, that conclusion is a presumption, and that, when mandatory presumptions are not exacted, it is the right and duty of the jury to draw such reasonable inferences from the evidence as may appeal to and satisfy their minds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. — 53.]

3. RAILROADS — 351 — INJURY FROM MAINTENANCE — ACTION — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against an electric railroad company for injuries from its negligence in maintaining its crossing without suitable approaches, so that the rails stood above the highway from four to six inches, whereby the wheels of plaintiff's vehicle struck them, broke the pole, frightened the horses, overturned the vehicle, and threw plaintiff out, wherein defendant offered evidence that many other people had driven across the tracks before and after without difficulty, although it was necessary to drive slowly and carefully, defendant was entitled to instructions on the negligence of plaintiff's driver and on defects in the vehicle.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1193-1211, 1213-1215; Dec. Dig. — 351.]

4. RAILROADS — 324 — CROSSING ACCIDENT.

In such case, plaintiff was not an insurer of the soundness of the vehicle, and he and the driver were not responsible for any defect therein, latent or otherwise, unless it was known or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1020-1025; Dec. Dig. — 324.]

5. RAILROADS — 351 — CROSSING & ACCIDENT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In such case, an instruction for defendant that whether "a requisite or ordinary prudence" required plaintiff to carry a light sufficient to show the defective condition of the highway, was properly refused as intimating that plaintiff was bound to carry such a light to enable her to determine whether defendant had obstructed the crossing.

6. RAILROADS § 307 — OBSTRUCTING CROSSING.

A railroad obstructing a highway, even under license, is bound to maintain proper barricades and warnings by day and proper signal lights by night.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 972-977, 979, 980; Dec. Dig. § 307.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Thomas against the Visalia Electric Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, J. W. McKinley, and A. W. Ashburn, Jr., all of Los Angeles, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia (W. R. Miller, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. E. I. Feemster and Feemster & Walker, all of Visalia, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries which she received in the manner hereinafter set forth. The cause was tried before a jury, which awarded her damages in the sum of $3,368. Defendant moved for a new trial. Upon denial of its motion it appealed from the judgment and from the order of the court.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff, in company with three other persons, was riding in a two-horse surrey along one of the public roads of Tulare county. Her brother was driving. It was in the nighttime. The railroad tracks of the defendant crossed this highway, and the crossing was so negligently maintained that there were not suitable approaches; the rails standing above the surface of the highway from four to six inches. The tracks of defendant did not cross this highway at right angles, but at an acute or obtuse angle, depending upon the direction of one's approach to them. As a result, it is asserted that, when the wheels of the vehicle struck the high rails, the wheels cramped, the doubletree broke, the singletrees and pole fell to the ground, and the horses became frightened, ran away, overturned the vehicle, and inflicted the injuries for which compensation was sought. The answer was by denial and set forth contributory negligence. Defendant having no eyewitnesses to the accident, nor any eyewitnesses to the physical condition of the surrey, produced evidence that many other people had driven across these tracks before and immediately after the accident and had experienced no particular difficulty in so doing. Care was required, and it was necessary to drive slowly, but that was all. Upon this evidence the defendant sought to have the jury draw the inference that the accident was occasioned either through the careless and reckless driving of plaintiff's brother, or through some defect in the vehicle itself; upon the one hand, that reckless driving, where care was required, occasioned the accident; upon the other, that, if the vehicle was being driven with due care, then the vehicle itself, by reason of rusted bolts or defective doubletree, was not physically capable of bearing the strain of ordinary careful driving, and so broke down and occasioned the accident. Certain instructions were proposed by defendant in support of this view, and the refusal of the court to give these instructions is the matter complained of on this appeal.

[1] A litigant is entitled to proper instructions bearing upon any legitimate legal inference which may be drawn from evidence given. He is not limited in this right to instructions addressed only to the positive evidence in the case. Inferences properly drawn are in many cases the only method of arriving at the truth. In every case where direct and positive evidence of a fact is not possible, proof, the result of evidence, must be reached either by presumption or by inference.

[2] The difference between an evidentiary presumption and an evidentiary inference is simply this: That, when the law requires the jury to draw a certain designated conclusion from particular evidence, that conclusion so forced upon the jury is a presumption. Where mandatory presumptions are not exacted, it is the right and duty of the jury to draw such reasonable inferences from the evidence as may appeal to and satisfy their minds. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176, 116 Pac. 530; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1958, 1959.

[3] Therefore appellant was within its rights in asking that instructions be given to the jury touching the conclusion which they should reach, if they did draw from the evidence in the case the inference of the negligence of plaintiff's driver or of a defective vehicle. The difficulty, however, is that the instructions which the defendant proposed went beyond its rights in the matter.

[4] Thus, defendant's proposed instruction 16 is as follows:

"If some of the appliances by which the horses were hitched to the rig in question were defective, and as the result of such defect broke, thereby causing the horses to run away and the vehicle to be overturned, you must find for the defendant, because such defect in said appliances and the running away of the horses were the direct and proximate cause of the accident."

This instruction, however, is not correct in point of law. It would in effect make the plaintiff an insurer of the soundness of the vehicle in which she was riding. But plaintiff and plaintiff's driver were not responsible for any defect in the vehicle, latent or otherwise, unless it was known or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care. To like effect are the other instructions also refused by the court.

[5, 6] Still another one, standing upon slightly different ground, informed the jury that in determining—

“whether or not plaintiff exercised ordinary care, you are instructed that you are to consider the circumstances surrounding the said plaintiff, in determining what amount of care should reasonably be expected of a person traveling along a road, as she was. In this respect, you will take into consideration the fact that she was traveling at night, the rate of speed at which she was traveling, the question of whether it was dark enough to make the use of lights on said vehicle a requisite of ordinary prudence, and the question of whether or not any lights were carried on said vehicle to show the condition of the road ahead, and all the circumstances and surroundings.”

The difficulty with this instruction, which justified the court's refusal to give it, is that, while in general terms it properly advises the jury that they were to determine from all the facts, circumstances, and surroundings in the case whether plaintiff's driver was exercising ordinary care, they are specifically told to consider whether “a requisite or ordinary prudence” required plaintiff to carry light sufficient to show the defective condition of the highway. We know of no law imposing any such duty in the exercise of ordinary care upon the driver of a horse-drawn vehicle upon the public highway. To the contrary, one who obstructs the highway, even under license, is under duty to maintain proper barricades and warnings by day and proper signal lights at night. There was in this, at least, an intimation to the jury that it was plaintiff's duty to carry upon her surrey some sort of a searchlight, not as a mere warning signal to other approaching vehicles, but to enable her to determine whether somebody else had obstructed the passage of a highway that she was entitled to believe was free and unobstructed. This particular instruction, for the indicated reason, was properly refused.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

KEATING v. KEATING et al. (L. A. 3234.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1915.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⚡131—STATEMENT OF CASE—SETTLEMENT.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 650, 659, as to settlement of statement of case for motion for new trial, held substantially complied with, though the proposed statement and proposed amendments were not formally presented by defendant to the judge, and though formal notices were not given, the statement and amendments having been filed with the clerk, the judge, who had been away, having on his return received the papers, and having then, from the bench, all the attorneys being present, given notice when the settlement would be taken up; the object of the statute being to prevent delay or surprise to the adverse party, and none having occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 263-269; Dec. Dig. ⚡131.]

2. JUDGES ⚡49—CHANGE FOR BIAS—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, requiring the judge about to try a case, on its appearing from affidavits that a party cannot have a fair trial before him, because of his prejudice or bias, to call in another judge to preside at the trial of said action or proceeding, applies to the hearing of a motion for new trial; such a motion being an independent proceeding, and the hearing thereof being a trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 187, 188; Dec. Dig. ⚡49.]

3. JUDGES ⚡51—CHANGE FOR BIAS—COUNTER AFFIDAVITS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, requiring the judge about to try a case, when it appears from affidavits that a party cannot have a fair trial before him, because of his prejudice or bias, to call in another judge to preside at the trial, the matter of change of judge must be determined on affidavits alone, and, there being no counter affidavit of the judge himself denying his alleged bias, he must grant the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-231; Dec. Dig. ⚡51.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1106—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL—DISQUALIFIED JUDGE.

The order of a judge denying a motion for new trial, heard by him after his erroneous denial of a motion to call in another judge, because of his bias, is void, on direct appeal, as made by a judge disqualified to sit on the hearing, and therefore, instead of being reversed, with the effect of granting a new trial will be vacated, and the cause restored to the trial court for hearing on the motion by a qualified judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4386-4398, 4585; Dec. Dig. ⚡1106.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action for divorce by Hazel M. Keating against Edward Keating, in which Mrs. Vinette Lehman was made correspondent. From an adverse judgment and orders, defendant Keating appeals. Order denying new trial vacated, and cause remanded, with directions.

See, also, 23 Cal. App. 384, 138 Pac. 118.

J. Wiseman Macdonald and Waldo M. York, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent. George L. Keefer, of Los Angeles, for correspondent.

HENSHAW, J. A rehearing was granted in this case for the correction of a statement of fact, mistakenly made, and for further consideration of the effect which a correction of the misstatement might have upon the merits of the controversy. In the previous opinion Mr. Justice Melvin, speaking for the court in bank, said:—

“Plaintiff sued for a divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty, and defendant answered.

Subsequently the plaintiff having obtained leave of court filed a supplemental complaint charging adultery, and defendant answered the supplemental complaint. Defendant also asked and received permission to file a cross-complaint setting up as cruelty the filing of plaintiff's supplemental complaint charging adultery and other matters. On motion of the plaintiff, Hazel M. Keating, part of his cross-complaint was stricken out. Judgment was in favor of plaintiff upon both grounds, adultery and cruelty, and against Edward Keating also on his cross-complaint. Alimony in the sum of $55,000 was awarded by the decree. He moved for a new trial, and his motion was denied on the 4th day of March, 1912. Meanwhile, on March 2, 1912, defendant applied to the trial court for a change of judges, but his application was denied. On March 4th he moved to strike out a portion of the certificate of the judge settling the statement. This motion was denied. Defendant's appeals are from the judgment, from the order denying his motion for a new trial, from the order denying the application for change of judges, from the order striking out a portion of his cross-complaint, and from the order denying his motion to eliminate part of the certificate to the engrossed statement on appeal.

[1] "Respondent objects to the consideration of the alleged statement of the case upon which the appeal from the judgment is wholly, and that from the motion for a new trial is partly, based. This objection is founded upon the supposed failure of the appellant to comply with sections 659 and 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure in preparing and presenting his said statement of the case. The same objections were urged before the trial court, and the learned judge in a written opinion overruled them. The facts are these: On September 2, 1911, defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial on a statement of the case and affidavits was filed. On November 16, 1911, the attorneys for defendant left with the deputy county clerk of the department in which the cause had been tried their proposed statement, which bore an admission of service signed by the attorney for plaintiff. On December 28th plaintiff's attorney left with said deputy clerk plaintiff's proposed amendments to the statement. The judge who tried the case was absent from the county from December 28, 1911, to January 20, 1912. On the last-named day he received all of the papers either from the clerk or from the judge of the department, in whose place he had presided during the trial. On that day the judge who had tried the case stated from the bench, in the presence of all the attorneys, that he would take up the settlement of the statement on January 27, 1912, at a certain hour. On the 20th of January counsel for plaintiff presented his objections, specifying that defendant had not given plaintiff notice at any time that he would present the proposed statement; that notice had been served upon plaintiff within ten days after service of plaintiff's proposed amendments of defendant's intention to present his proposed statement to the judge who tried the case; and that defendant failed, within ten days after the service of plaintiff's proposed amendments, to deliver the proposed statement and the offered amendments to the clerk of the court for the judge, nor had such delivery been made at any time. It is clear that the statute was substantially complied with. The purpose of the statute is to prevent delay or surprise to the adverse party. No such delay nor surprise occurred. The clerk had the proposed statement immediately after its service on the plaintiff's attorney. When the proposed amendments were prepared and served they were also left with the clerk. While they were not thereafter formally called to his attention or presented by the counsel for the appellant, they were as much in his possession for the judge as if the exact requirements of the statute had been complied with. And the judge received timely notice, upon his return to Los Angeles, of the pendency of the matter of settling the statement, and counsel for plaintiff, having received actual notice, was present in court. Curtin v. Ingle, 155 Cal. 55, 99 Pac. 480.

[2] "After the settlement of the statement on motion for a new trial, the defendant, Edward Keating, served upon plaintiff and filed a demand that the judge who had presided at the trial should secure the services of some other judge to hear said motion for a new trial. On the day set for the hearing on motion for a new trial Edward Keating, by his counsel, moved the court for a change of judges in accordance with the demand previously made, and in support of his motion read a number of affidavits tending to show that a member of the judge's family had attended the court sessions during the trial of the case of Keating v. Keating, had shown great interest in the success of the plaintiff in that litigation, and had expressed certain views with reference to the case in the presence of the judge. Affidavits were filed in opposition to the request for a change, and the court refused to comply with defendant's desires in the matter. The proceeding was held in contemplation of the fourth subdivision of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the outset respondent contends that this section applies only to the trial of causes, and not to the hearing of motions for new trials. We can see no reason for this distinction. If, after trial, and before the hearing of a motion for a new trial, one of the litigants should discover that the judge who had tried the cause was prejudiced against him, we see no reason why he might not invoke the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Estudillo v. Security Loan & Trust Co., 158 Cal. 70, 109 Pac. 884, the motion was made at this same stage of the case, and the proceeding was not questioned. A motion for a new trial is surely a 'trial' under the principles and the definition announced in Tregambo v. Comanche M. & M. Co., 57 Cal. 505, and such a motion has been held to be an independent proceeding. Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 296, 75 Pac. 831.

[3] "The judge did not subscribe any affidavit in answer to that of the defendant, and appellant's counsel insist that, as Mr. Keating's sworn allegation of the judge's prejudice stands uncontradicted, the refusal to grant the motion was erroneous, under the authority of People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 56 Pac. 44, and similar cases. We see no escape from this conclusion. The law of California upon this subject was discussed in an opinion by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the recent case of Bassford v. Earl, 162 Cal. 119, 121 Pac. 395, where the following language was used: 'The law governing the conduct of a judge upon the hearing and determination of a motion presented by authority of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure has often been discussed, and is well settled. The earlier rule announced in Heinlen v. Heilbron, 97 Cal. 107, 31 Pac. 838, that "the fact that a judge had acted in a trial must be held conclusive that, in his own opinion, he was competent to act, and in such a case he who would attack his right to act therein must show his disqualification by facts of a positive and unequivocal character," by force of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no longer obtains. The matter must be tried upon affidavits, and upon affidavits alone. Whatever knowledge may repose within the breast of the judge must now appear by affidavit, or it does not appear at all. Inferences or presumptions arising from the judicial decision in no wise control. The judge "must decide upon the facts averred in the affidavits, without reference to his own knowledge of his state of mind." Hoyt v. Zumwalt, 149 Cal. 388, 86 Pac. 600; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 412, 56 Pac. 44; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 136 Cal. 352, 68 Pac. 970.'

"It is true that many of the statements in the affidavits filed by defendant are squarely contradicted by counter affidavits, but the fact remains that the judge did not deny by affidavit the prejudice which was attributed to him in appellant's sworn statement, and the law is definitely settled that only by affidavit may that issue be met. Bias might have arisen from the statements admitted in the counter affidavits. It is idle to contend that the affidavit of Mr. Keating, although positive in form, must of necessity rest upon information and belief, and that therefore it should be rejected. Knowledge of facts which might cause a litigant to feel that a judge was prejudiced against him would naturally often be only that to be derived from information conveyed to him by others. Complete and effective denial of such alleged facts, while it might be the basis for a finding by the court that the litigant's conclusions were based upon false premises, would not dispose of the matter of the mental attitude of the judge, which may only be placed of record by his own solemn affidavit. This was lacking, and therefore his denial of the motion was error."

[4] The error which inadvertently crept into the statement is found in the sentence next following:

"The same affidavits as those upon which the demand for a change of judges was based were used on the motion for a new trial, and appellant contends that the motion should have been granted because of such an irregularity as is contemplated by subdivision 1 of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The conclusion from this was the necessary one, that the order denying a new trial should be reversed because of the showing of the disqualification, by bias and prejudice, of the judge who had conducted the trial.

Upon the petition for rehearing our attention was specifically directed to the fact that, in connection with, and as a part of, the motion for new trial, certain affidavits intimating the existence of bias and prejudice were filed by the moving party not later than November, and answering affidavits by respondent in December, but that no affidavit specifically charging bias and prejudice upon the part of the judge was filed in support of the motion for a new trial. Next, it was shown that, while the motion for new trial was pending, before, indeed, it had been heard, appellant, in February, filed another independent motion seeking a motion of the trial judge and the calling in of another; the ground of this motion being the bias and prejudice of the judge presiding, which bias and prejudice were specifically charged. This motion the judge denied. Thereafter he proceeded to hear and determine the motion for a new trial, upon which motion there was not judicially before him the affidavit or affidavits specifically charging bias and prejudice.

What are the legal consequences which necessarily flow from this state of facts? Everything that has been said by this court in the earlier opinion above quoted is affirmed. Resulting from this is the inevitable conclusion that the trial judge erroneously refused to call in another judge to hear and determine the motion for a new trial. His error in so doing necessitates a reversal of his ruling refusing to call in another judge, and with that reversal is imposed the duty to call in another judge who shall hear and determine the motion for a new trial. The order of the court refusing to grant the motion for a new trial is not, therefore, subject to reversal in the sense that a reversal would be the equivalent of an order granting a new trial. The order refusing to grant the motion for a new trial, under the circumstances attending its making, was void upon this direct appeal, as being an order made by a judge disqualified to sit on the hearing. For this reason the order refusing a new trial is not reversed, but is vacated and declared null, and the cause will be restored to the jurisdiction of the trial court, with directions to the qualified judge who may be called in to hear and determine that motion.

It is ordered accordingly.

SCHAFFER v. SMITH, City Treasurer.

(L. A. 3833.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1915.
Rehearing Denied April 29, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\S$ 294 — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — STREET WORK — BONDS REPRESENTING ASSESSMENT — STATUTE.

A resolution of a board of trustees of a city initiating certain street improvements, to cover the assessment for which bonds and securities were issued by the municipality under St. 1893, p. 33, providing for a system of street improvement bonds to represent assessments for street improvements within municipalities, was proper, although posted and published without having thereon the city clerk's certificate to its passage, which the clerk did not sign until after the posting and publication; the certificate being merely evidence on the minutes of the board of the fact that the resolution was passed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\S$ 485—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—ASSESSMENT—STATUTES.

Where the warrant of assessment for a street improvement was not certified by the street superintendent, but by the city engineer, who was acting as such superintendent and thus certified to his own previous acts as engineer, the bonds issued, representing assessments for the cost of the improvements, were not thereby rendered invalid, under St. 1893, p. 33, providing for the issuance of such bonds.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\S$ 485—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—ASSESSMENT—STATUTES.

Where the recorded warrant for a street improvement was not signed by the president of the board of trustees of the city, although the original warrant was so signed, bonds representing such assessment, issued under St. 1893, p.

33, providing a system of street improvement bonds to represent assessments for the cost of street improvements within municipalities, were not thereby invalidated.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ☞290—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞527—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—ASSESSMENT—BONDS—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

St. 1893, p. 33, provides a system of street improvement bonds to represent assessments for the cost of street work and improvements within municipalities. Section 4 provides that if any person shall present to the city treasurer his affidavit, accompanied by a certificate of a searcher of records, that he is the owner of a lot of land in the list of unpaid assessments, and if he notifies the treasurer in writing that he desires no bond to be issued for the assessment upon his lot, then no bond shall issue, and the payee of the warrant or his assigns shall retain his right for enforcing collection as if the lot had not been listed. Held, that the Legislature, having power to provide that bonds shall issue for the amount of a delinquent assessment, is not bound to give the property owner opportunity to avoid their issuance, further than his opportunity to pay the assessment before its becoming delinquent, and that in extending to him the further privilege, to avoid the issuance of bonds, in the statute, the Legislature has the right to impose upon such privilege reasonable conditions to its exercise, so that the section of the statute is not unconstitutional, as being in effect a taking of property without due process, through the provision requiring the property owner to present a certificate made by a searcher of records.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞474—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—ASSESSMENT OF RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—BONDS—VALIDITY—STATUTE.

Where street improvement bonds were issued to represent delinquent assessments on a certain betterment, the street being one occupied on one side by individual owners, who were assessed, and on the other by an unassessed railroad right of way, the assessment was void as partial, and the bonds securing delinquencies worthless, since, while the right of way could not be assessed, the land itself was land fronting upon the street, within the meaning of the street work act of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147), providing for work upon streets, and for the construction of sewers, within municipalities, and so assessable.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞562—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—BONDS REPRESENTING ASSESSMENTS—STATUTES.

Under St. 1893, p. 33, providing a system of street improvement bonds to represent delinquent assessments, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1204, providing that the bonds shall be conclusive evidence of regularity of issue, where, in suit against a city treasurer to compel the sale of property for the assessments upon which such bonds had been issued, it appeared that the original assessment for the work had been absolutely void, as partial, the fact was fatal to the validity of the bonds, since, despite the amended act, the issuance of the bonds is conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all required steps in the proceedings, except those that are necessary to constitute due process of law, or comply with any other constitutional prerequisites.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞562—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—STREET WORK—BONDS REPRESENTING ASSESSMENTS—STATUTES.

Under St. 1893, p. 33, providing a system of street improvement bonds to represent assessments for the cost of street work and improvements, and declaring that no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council, as provided under the street work act of 1885, where the owners, aggrieved by a partial assessment, did not appeal to the board of trustees of the city, bonds securing delinquent assessments being issued, in suit upon such bonds to force sale of the property they represented, the city treasurer could set up the invalidity of the partial assessment, such assessment being void on its face.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by M. E. Schaffer against Sarah A. Smith, as City Treasurer of the City of Watts. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. R. Holston, of Los Angeles, and Peebles Shoaff, of Watts, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in the above cause was ordered in this court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second District. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, written by Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey, is adopted as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

The plaintiff, as owner of certain street improvement bonds transferred to him by a holder who acquired them from Municipal Securities Company (a corporation), to which the bonds had been issued by the city of Watts, brought this proceeding against the defendant as city treasurer, and applied for a writ of mandate commanding defendant to advertise and sell the property described in the petition. The bonds, purporting to be issued as required by an act approved February 27, 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 33), are alleged to cover said property by lien claimed to exist under assessments made representing the cost of certain street work. From a judgment entered in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

The street work in question was done pursuant to a contract entered into by the superintendent of streets with a contractor, and the proceedings were in form according to the requirements of the street work act, commonly known as the Vrooman Act. The record of these proceedings, so far as necessary to be noted here, begins with a resolution of the board of trustees, adopted on December 28, 1909, and known as "Resolution No. 123," ordering the work to be done. The bonds are valid, unless their invalidity can be established for at least one of the reasons here presented by the respondent for our consideration.

[1] It is suggested by her counsel that the resolution, No. 123, was posted and published without having thereon the city clerk's certificate to its passage, and that the clerk did not sign the certificate until after such posting and publication. Respondent asserts that this was an omission of a legal requirement; but we do not find either in the resolution or in the statute anything which supports the assertion made. The certificate is evidence on the minutes of the fact that the resolution passed, and it is nothing more.

[2, 3] It is further claimed that the warrant and assessment were not certified by the duly appointed street superintendent, and that the original warrant was not signed by the president of the board of trustees. These points cannot be sustained. The record shows that A. B. Waddingham who, on July 29, 1911, signed the certificate to the record of warrants, diagrams, and assessments following upon the contractor's return thereof, was then acting as street superintendent. The only point made against this is that earlier in the proceedings he was city engineer, and had not yet relinquished that office, and that he as superintendent of streets was certifying to acts which had been done by him as city engineer. No reason is shown why he should not do this. Upon the objection that the original warrant was not signed by the president of the board of trustees, the answer is that the original warrant was so signed, although that signature is absent from the warrant as recorded. This omission is not material. Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 214, 220, 25 Pac. 351.

[4] Next it is contended that certain provisions contained in section 4 of the bond act are unreasonable and unconstitutional. That section as amended in 1899, and also in its original form (Stats. 1893, p. 33; Stats. 1899, p. 41) provides: "That if any person, or his authorized agent, shall at any time before the issuance of the bond for said assessment upon his lot or parcel of land, present to the city treasurer his affidavit, made before a competent officer, that he is the owner of a lot or parcel of land in said list, accompanied by the certificate of a searcher of records, that he is such owner of record, and with such affidavit and certificate, such person notifies said treasurer, in writing, that he desires no bond to be issued for the assessments upon said lot or parcel of land, then no such bond shall be issued therefor, and the payee of the warrant, or his assigns, shall retain his right for enforcing collection, as if said lot or parcel of land had not been so listed by the street superintendent."

The argument for respondent is that the provision requiring the property owner to present to the treasurer a certificate made by a searcher of records is in effect the taking of property without due process of law, and that it places upon the property holder a burden above his just share of the expense of the improvement. In our opinion, the statute does not have the effect thus claimed. The Legislature has the power to provide, as by this bond act it does provide, that bonds shall issue for the amount of a delinquent assessment. The Legislature is not bound to give the property owner any opportunity to avoid the issuance of bonds further than his opportunity to pay the assessment before the time fixed when it would become delinquent. In extending to him the further privilege whereby he may be subject to the assessment alone and may prevent the issuance of such bonds, any reasonable condition to the exercise of that privilege may be imposed. The rule requiring him to produce from the records some evidence that he owns the property imposes only a reasonable condition. The case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, cited by counsel for respondent, does not support their position. After much searching through the 82 pages of that decision, we think that we have found at page 396 the reference intended. The court there holds that where a person is about to be illegally deprived of his property by another person claiming to act as receiver, and where the superior court in appointing a receiver exceeded its jurisdiction, the property owner may have a writ of prohibition and is not obliged to submit to the wrong and rely on a long and expensive litigation for recovery of his property. But the provisions above quoted in the bond act are in their effect confined to proceedings within the jurisdiction of a city and its officers.

[5] In respondent's answer to the petition herein she alleged, and the court found, that along the westerly side of Melvin avenue, and along the entire length thereof within the north and south limits of the street work described in said Resolution No. 123, "extends the lands of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, which lands are used as a part of the right of way of said railway company for its line of railway from the city of Los Angeles to the city of Long Beach, and which right of way abuts and fronts upon the westerly side of said Melvin avenue between said Main street and Shorb avenue, the entire distance." After deducting from the total cost of the street work certain amounts which were paid partly by the city out of a street improvement fund obtained from the proceeds of a municipal bond issue, and partly by $1,500 voluntarily paid by the Pacific Electric Railway Company to the city of Watts on account of said street improvements, the remainder of said cost (such remainder amounting to much more than half of the total cost) was assessed solely and only against the lots and lands fronting on the easterly side of Melvin avenue between Main street and Shorb avenue. The bonds here in question are based upon this assessment.

Upon the facts above stated, the respondent claims that the land covered by the railroad right of way is part of the land fronting on the improved street, and that the assessment is void because the right of way land is not included therein, or that if by reason of the principles of law controlling assessments against rights of way no interest in this land could be subjected to assessment, then the street could not be improved at all under the street work act. In Pennsylvania it has been held that for the purposes of asserting claims for street paving against the roadbed of a railway company "the distinction between the right of way and the fee is a shadowy one." Junction City R. Co. v. City of Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 424. In California this point appears to be not definitely decided. In Southern California Ry. Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 80, 79 Pac. 586, 82 Pac. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583, it was decided that a railroad right of way could not be sold under a street work assessment. With respect to the question now under consideration, the statute applicable to this work on Melvin avenue was the same as that under which the case last mentioned was determined. At that time the Legislature had not provided for such sales of rights of way. In that decision the Supreme Court declined to decide whether or not the fee or reversion in right of way land could be assessed, as it held that the proceeding there was merely "for the purpose of enjoining a sale of plaintiff's right of way—that is to say, its easement." In Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 204, 100 Pac. 243, 247, referring to the same proceedings as in the earlier case, the court again found that the question of right to assess the fee separately from the right of way was not involved, and said: "The court did not, therefore, in the former decision, determine that the fee, subject to the easement, could not be, or that it had not been assessed. The judgment there affirmed merely declared that the bond created no lien upon the right of way. It could not bar plaintiff's right to have the fee, subject to such easement, sold. * * * Here the plaintiff, having at most a right to compel the sale of the fee, subject to the easement, made a demand for a sale of property described in terms covering both fee and easement. The officer was justified in refusing to comply with this excessive demand, and no liability for damages accrued upon such refusal."

If the case of Fox v. Workman does not carry an intimation that lands subject to a railroad right of way, as were the lands of the Pacific Electric Railway on the west side of Melvin avenue, are subject to assessment and should be assessed as lands fronting on the street, but excluding from such assessment the easement held for right of way purposes, we are at least left free to deal with the subject as an undetermined matter. From the record in this case we are unable to say that the right of way over the land in question is complete either in the sense of being perpetual, or of being such as to necessarily require the company to continue to occupy the whole thereof in the operation of its railroad. This land abutting upon the street, although subject to such right of way, may have a substantial value to the owner of the fee. Our conclusion is that, while the right of way cannot be assessed, the land itself is land fronting upon the street within the meaning of the street work act, and under the limitations defined is subject to assessment.

[6, 7] But it is suggested on behalf of appellant that the property owners aggrieved by the assessment as it was made did not, within the time required by law, appeal to the board of trustees from the assessment, and that since they did not so appeal the assessment became final and is not further subject to attack on account of the alleged errors. The statute declares that no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council as provided in section 11 of the street work act (Stats. 1885, p. 156), for any error, informality, or other defect in any of the proceedings prior to the assessment, or in the assessment itself, where notice of the intention of the city council to order the work to be done has been published in accordance with law.

Appellant further calls attention to the fact that on June 26, 1911, four days before issuance of the warrant of assessment in the case at bar, there became effective an amendment to section 4 of the street improvement bond act, providing that bonds issued thereunder "shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto under said street work act and under this act, previous to the making of the certified list of all assessments unpaid to the amount of twenty-five dollars or over by the street superintendent to the city treasurer, and of the validity of said lien up to the date of said list." Stats. 1911, p. 1204. In Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 30 Pac. 81, the Supreme Court declared its interpretation of the meaning of the conclusive evidence clause as formerly contained in the same section of the statute. Without repeating at length the principles there set forth, we find the decision in substance to be that under the quoted clause of the statute the issuance of the bonds shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all the required steps in the proceedings leading up to the bonds, excepting those that are necessary to constitute due process of law, or to comply with any other constitutional prerequisite. Answering the question as to what are the essentials the non-observance of which cannot be cured, one item specified is that there must be an assessment or apportionment of the amount to be raised. The court there calls attention to the fact (citing Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 381, 45 Am. St. Rep. 33) that power could not be given to the street superintendent to change the amount of the contract price and of the assessment. Such attempted plan would be beyond the reach of a curative provision, because it would give power to that officer to improve the street and levy an assessment without a substantial compliance with the constitutional conditions. After pointing out some of the objections made to the proceedings in that case, the court said: "All of them relate to the manner of the work and the method of procedure to get it done, and not to the subjects of the notice to the owners, the hearing of grievances, the fact that work was done, nor to the existence of a uniform assessment."

But in the case at bar the claim is, under the facts to which we have referred, that the attempted assessment made wholly against the lots on the easterly side of Melvin avenue is not a uniform assessment, and that on its face it shows a willful failure to make an assessment according to the plan provided by law. We think this claim should be sustained, and that the assessment belongs to that class where the owner may, without appealing to the city council, resist the enforcement of the assessment because it is void on its face. In Perine v. Lewis, 128 Cal. 236, 241, 60 Pac. 422, 423, referring to an assessment made upon a plan not in accordance with the law and which resulted in assessing certain lots in double the right amount, the court said: "As the objection did not require extrinsic evidence for the purpose of establishing the fact, but the assessment appeared upon its face to have been made in violation of the statute, the defendants are not precluded from making the objection without having previously appealed to the board of supervisors." To the same effect is Kenny v. Kelly, 113 Cal. 364, 45 Pac. 699. In San Diego Investment Co. v. Shaw, 129 Cal. 273, 61 Pac. 1082, no question was raised with respect to the right of the property owner to resist the enforcement of a street assessment lien for irregularities that might have been passed upon by the city council, but it was there directly decided that where the whole cost of certain street grading work was apportioned and assessed against the lots fronting on one side of the street, when according to the statute both sides should have been assessed, the assessment was void and the lien claimed thereunder could not be enforced.

Since the assessment in the present case was void upon its face, and since the bonds issued pursuant to such assessment were also void, it follows that no duty has devolved upon the defendant city treasurer to foreclose those bonds or sell the property described therein. This being so, the appellant is not injured or aggrieved by the affirmative part of the judgment which directs that defendant cancel of record the bonds and assessments described in plaintiff's petition.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by I. E. Thayer against Carl R. Tyler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Oliver, of San Francisco, and John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, for appellant. Prewett & Chamberlain, of Auburn, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of a ranch situated in the county of Placer; that the ranch was of about 500 acres, 50 acres of it being planted to orange and other fruit trees. The remainder was grazing land on which were a number of cattle. He employed defendant for a period of three years from April, 1909, as manager of the ranch. He authorized defendant to procure from business houses in the city of Lincoln, near the ranch, all materials necessary properly to care for the orchard and properly to feed and care for the stock. Plaintiff alleged that he had ample credit in the business houses of Lincoln to enable defendant so to procure all of the indicated necessities; that defendant negligently failed to care for the orange trees, so that 400 or more of them died, and he negligently and willfully failed to procure sufficient feed for the stock and to properly and sufficiently feed them, whereby about 20 head of cattle died from starvation and diseases incident thereto. He laid his damages for the loss of his orange trees in the sum of $4,000, and for his cattle in the sum of $600, and prayed judgment accordingly. The answer denied substantially all the allegations of the complaint. In denying the existence of the contract between the parties set up in the complaint, defendant averred a specific contract in terms as follows:

"March 20, 1909.

"Mr. Carl R. Tyler, Lincoln, California—Dear Sir: In regard to future management of Valle Vista, I offer the following for your consideration:

"I will pay you a monthly salary of $75.00 and you to do the best you can to early get the place on a paying basis. In addition to monthly salary, if on the first of April each year, it is found that the income from the orchard and cattle exceeds the expense of maintenance, you to then receive 25 per cent. of that net profit.

"Agreement for three years from April 1st, 1909.

"Yours very truly, I. E. Thayer."

By way of alleged counterclaim and cross-complaint defendant set forth the due performance of his duties under this contract and an indebtedness in his favor arising thereunder in the sum of $697.51. He further alleged that profits had accrued under his management, and asked for an accounting of these profits. By a separate defense, alleged by way of counterclaim and cross-complaint he set forth an indebtedness due him from plaintiff in the sum of $9 for merchandise purchased for plaintiff at his special instance and request. The court found and concluded as follows:

"The court finds that each and all the allegations of the amended complaint of plaintiff are untrue and that each and all the denials and allegations of the answer, counterclaim, and cross-complaint of defendant are true, except that no profits have accrued from the ranch, and except that only $518.30 is due to defendant (instead of $697.50).

"The court concludes that defendant is entitled to a judgment, that plaintiff take nothing by this action and that defendant should have judgment for $518.30, and costs."

[1, 2] These general findings of the untruth of each and all of the allegations of the complaint are made the basis of the attack upon this appeal. Thus it is said that in this general finding is embraced the finding that plaintiff was not the owner of the land in question, and that this was abundantly proved. Appellant is correct in this respect. The general finding declares it to be untrue that defendant entered upon the properties of plaintiff and accepted employment from him, while the uncontroverted evidence establishes that defendant did so. In this also appellant is correct. Again it is said that the findings negative the allegations of the complaint that plaintiff had full and ample credit in the business houses of the city of Lincoln for all necessary purposes connected with the operation of his ranch. The evidence abundantly establishes that he did have such credit. The findings negative the allegations of the complaint that 400 or more orange trees died, and this finding is certainly contrary to the evidence. Sufficient has been said to exemplify the proposition which appellant advances upon this appeal. But as to some of these allegations there was no denial in the answer. As to the others, if the judgment depended upon them, a reversal would be necessitated. But, as we shall proceed to show, they are not material to the decision of the case and the judgment which the court gave is not dependent on them. It is only when a judgment rests for its validity upon a finding which is not supported, or which negatives a fact admitted by the pleadings, that injury is worked and a reversal must follow. Silvey v. Neary, 59 Cal. 98; Estate of Doyle, 73 Cal. 570, 15 Pac. 125; Diefendorf v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 343, 28 Pac. 265, 30 Pac. 549; Machado v. Kinney, 135 Cal. 354, 67 Pac. 331. Thus, assuming for the moment that plaintiff did own the ranch, that he did have ample credit, that 400 orange trees of the value of $4,000 died, that cattle to the value of $600 died, underlying all these facts, to establish the responsibility of defendant, it must be shown that the death of the orange trees and the cattle resulted from his negligent performance of the duties imposed upon him. For if these losses did not so result, there is an end of defendant's responsibility and so of plaintiff's cause of action. Upon this all vital proposition the evidence is conflicting, and the determination of the trial court in defendant's favor may not here be disturbed.

[3] A minor objection advanced by plaintiff is that the findings are contradictory and therefore will not support the judgment. The attack under this proposition is based upon the finding of the court that the allegations of the answer, counterclaim, and cross-complaint are true, except that no profits accrued from the ranch, and that only $518.30 is due to the defendant instead of $697.50, the amount defendant alleges. We need not follow in detail appellant's argument. It is, in brief, to the effect that if all the allegations of the counterclaim and cross-complaint are true, there was due to defendant $697.50 under the first item of counterclaim, and $9 under the second. But the court awarded only $518.30. It is said that the court evidently did not, in its own mind, believe the allegations of the counterclaims to be true, or it would have awarded this amount, and that it cannot be determined what of these allegations the court believed to be untrue when it awarded only $518.30. We are not able to approve this reasoning. Manifestly what the court meant was that while defendant asserted a right to recover upon one counterclaim and cross-complaint $697.50, and upon another independent claim $9, it finds that the total amount under the two which he is entitled to recover is $518.30. So construed, there is no contradictoriness nor even ambiguity.

[4] Julius Hibbe, called upon the part of the defendant, testified that he was a rancher by occupation, lived in the neighborhood of the Thayer ranch for 15 years and knew the ranch well; that he had worked upon it; that his work was to attend to the irrigation of the ranch; that the water used in the irrigation was obtained from the South Yuba Company; that frequently there was a shortage of water—and then answered, over the objection of plaintiff, certain questions, to the effect that in 1910 there was not water enough to irrigate the orchard, using all of the water available; that the same was true in 1909. It is contended that these answers were inadmissible; but as the witness was not shown to be an expert in the matter of the water requirements of an orange orchard, some practical knowledge and familiarity with conditions were necessary before any witness could intelligently and properly answer the question. But it by no means follows that a man who has been a farmer for 15 years, who has been engaged in the work of cultivating the orchard in question and in attending to its water supply, was not qualified to answer upon these matters of fact.

No other matters advanced by appellant call for specific consideration.

For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

A seller suing a corporation for the balance due on goods sold to it need only allege a sale to and purchase by the corporation, and the corporation, denying the averments, may show want of authority on the part of the officer making the purchase, and, when that is done, the seller may rely on ostensible authority, estoppel, or ratification, though not pleaded.

2. CORPORATIONS ⇐410, 426—ACTS OF OFFICERS—OSTENSIBLE AUTHORITY—RATIFICATION.

A corporation in the real estate business employed a dozen or more salesmen. Automobiles were used in the business, and the secretary of the corporation contracted in the name of the corporation for the purchase of an automobile to be paid for in monthly installments. He was one of the managers of the business. Two installments and accrued interest were paid, and repairs made on the car were paid. The corporation assumed ownership in an endeavor to exchange the car with the seller for another type of car. Held, that the secretary had ostensible authority to make the purchase, and that the purchase was ratified, and the corporation could not repudiate the transaction under Civ. Code, §§ 2318, 2319, defining the authority of agents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by the A. Meister & Sons Company against the Wood & Tatum Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Miller & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant. Butler & Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover the sum of $775, and interest, being the balance alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff for the purchase of an automobile. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had findings and judgment in its favor. Defendant appeals from the judgment upon transcript brought up under the alternative method. Plaintiff and defendant are corporations.

The sole question presented in defendant's brief is: Did F. P. Tatum, who was secretary of defendant corporation, have authority to purchase the automobile for his company?

The contract for the purchase of the car was originally made by I. T. Roberts under the name of I. T. Roberts Company, a corporation, on June 26, 1910, upon an installment or rental plan. Roberts subsequently became a salesman in the employ of defendant, making use of this automobile in connection with his services. Failing in his payment of the installment due November 20, 1910, defendant took possession of the car shortly thereafter, and before November 28th. On November 28, 1910, Tatum met E. A. Meister, secretary of plaintiff corporation, at the office of defendant. Meister testified that:

Tatum "wanted to get the terms reduced to $50 a month; he said that is all they could afford to pay out at that time. The Court: Q. Who could pay out? A. Wood & Tatum Company. He asked how much was due on the car, and went into the thing very carefully. We made the indorsements that appear on the contract. * * * Q. What did you finally do? A. Finally reduced it to $50 a month; he made a payment of $50. Q. When you reduced it to $50 a month what did he say about it? A. He told me to make the indorsement on this contract, Exhibit A. (Exhibit A is the contract with I. T. Roberts.) Q. Did he say whether his company would pay for that; whether they would or would not? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say? A. He said we would have no further trouble getting our money; we would get our money promptly as it came due. Q. From whom? A. From Wood & Tatum Company. Q. Did you have that contract with you at that time? A. Yes, sir; I made the following indorsement: 'The monthly installments on the within lease are hereby reduced from $75 to $50 per month, from October 20, 1910. Signed A. Meister & Sons Co., per E. A. Meister.' He made a payment in currency of $50, and $24.83 interest—back interest. Then we went out to the front office. He had Mr. Roberts assign his interest in this contract to Wood & Tatum Company, * * * and he accepted the assignment. Mr. Swisler: Q. How did he accept it? A. By writing the following: 'The Wood & Tatum Company hereby accepts the above assignment. Wood & Tatum Co., by F. P. Tatum.' * * * Then he re-read the contract. He said: 'You haven't signed yourself that you agree to deliver a bill of sale.' He suggested that I put the following indorsement on the contract: 'We herewith agree to all the conditions contained in the above agreement. A. Meister & Sons Company, per E. A. Meister, Secretary.' * * * Q. What was done with reference to the car? A. The car was delivered to a representative of Wood & Tatum Company. Q. But not until all had been done that you have testified to? A. Yes, sir. Q. You still had the car in your possession up to that time? A. Up to that time; yes."

It appeared further: That Mr. Wood was president and F. P. Tatum secretary, and both were directors and held a majority of the shares of the corporation, each owning 300 shares; that the three other directors were the only other stockholders, two holding merely enough shares to qualify them to act, and the third had 200 shares; that the company was engaged in the real estate business in the city of Sacramento; that the company's salesmen used automobiles and the company owned some horses and buggies, but had not owned automobiles prior to this alleged purchase; that automobiles were useful, and were used in the business, and had been rented and used by the corporation; that Salesman Roberts had previously used this car in the course of his employment, as he was serving for a small salary and on a percentage of commission earned in sales made by him, and he continued to use the car, both Wood and Tatum also using it on occasion; that Wood had repairs of the car made, and the defendant paid the bills by its checks; that Wood endeavored to effect a trade of this car with plaintiff for a Stoddard-Dayton car. In addition to the cash payment made on November 28th, defendant paid by its check, on account of the transaction, $55.53, on December 22, 1910, $5.53 of which was interest. Mr. Tatum testified that he and Mr. Wood "practically administered the policy of the corporation," and that "the board of directors never overruled the judgment of himself and Mr. Wood," and that both he and Mr. Wood had equal managerial authority.

It appeared that, on October 20, 1910, when Roberts paid an installment on the contract, the money was advanced to him by defendant, and Roberts executed an assignment of his interest in the contract to defendant as security. The claim of defendant was that when Tatum made the contract testified to by Meister he was merely getting possession of the car for Roberts and to secure his company for payments made and to be made, and was not purchasing it for the Wood & Tatum Company. There was no evidence that plaintiff knew of Roberts' assignment of October 20th to defendant, and Tatum's testimony showed that he had no very clear recollection of having explained to Meister his purpose in taking over the Roberts contract on November 28th.

In rebuttal, Meister was asked if Tatum, on the 28th day of November, 1910, or at any other time, told him that he had taken an assignment or was taking an assignment to secure him, or the Wood & Tatum Company, for advances they had made or advances they would make for I. T. Roberts, and answered: "He did not." It was admitted that the minutes of the corporation showed no resolution authorizing the purchase of this car and Mr. Wood testified that while he knew that Mr. Tatum had made some deal with plaintiff concerning it he did not know until about the time the suit was brought that the indorsements shown were on the contract, and he had no recollection of Tatum having explained the matter to him.

In support of its contention that Tatum had no authority to purchase the automobile, appellant advances the following: That the secretary of a corporation has no power to bind the corporation in such a purchase; that Tatum was given no direct authority and hence plaintiff must rely upon ostensible authority or ratification; that neither ostensible authority nor ratification was pleaded or proven.

[1] We do not deem it necessary to inquire to what extent the secretary of a corporation may bind the latter without the express authority of its directors. The question was discussed, to some extent, in Newhall v. Joseph Levy Bag Co., 19 Cal. App. 9, 124 Pac. 875, and in Leitch v. Marx, 21 Cal. App. 208, 131 Pac. 328. See, also, Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, 164 Cal. 242, 128 Pac. 399. We think there was sufficient shown here to establish both ostensible authority and ratification. It was not necessary to plead the one or the other. Plaintiff alleged the sale by it and the purchase by defendant of the automobile, and defendant denied the averments. Under the issues defendant could and did endeavor to show want of authority. The cause of action did not rest upon either ostensible authority, estoppel, or ratification. These elements of the transaction developed in reply to the defense made and were open to plaintiff without having pleaded them. Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 421, 49 Pac. 559; Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 484, 95 Pac. 888; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252.

[2] Here was a corporation extensively engaged in selling real estate, employing, as Mr. Wood testified, "a dozen or more salesmen"; automobiles were used in the business, and it may be safely said that they have become almost indispensable to the successful conduct of that business; the liability of $50 per month, incurred by Tatum in the name of the corporation, was comparatively small as an expense in the conduct of the business and was reasonably within the general scope of the company's powers; he held himself out to be, and was, in fact, one of the managers of the business, and plaintiff might reasonably have assumed that he had authority to make the purchase for his company; this assumption by plaintiff was confirmed by the fact that defendant took the car into its service, used it, paid two installments and accrued interest on account of the purchase, had repairs made on the car and paid for them, and assumed ownership in an endeavor to exchange it with plaintiff for another type of car. These and other circumstances, in our opinion, show both ostensible authority in Tatum to make the purchase, and ratification of the transaction. Upon every principle of right and fair dealing, defendant is estopped to repudiate its agreement. Civ. Code, §§ 2318, 2319; Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 316, 33 Pac. 913; McKiernan v. Lenzen, 56 Cal. 61, 63; Stevens v. Selma Fruit Co., 18 Cal. App. 242, 123 Pac. 212; Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, supra.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. HAMMEL,
Sheriff, et al. (Civ. 1605.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 18, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1915.)

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⇐28 — FEES — SALARIES.

Pol. Code, § 4290, providing that the salaries and fees prescribed should be in full compensation of all services rendered, declares that the sheriff shall be entitled to receive certain per diem and mileage for conveying prisoners and insane persons to state prisons and asylums, and may retain for his own use the mileage for service of process. The charter of the county of Los Angeles adopted pursuant to the authority given by Const. art. 11, § 7½, provides that the board of supervisors shall fix by ordinance the compensation of elective officers which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which they were elected nor within 90 days preceding election. Other sections provide that all fees collected by any county officer shall be paid to the county treasurer. Held, that a sheriff elected before the adoption of the charter, and whose term continued thereafter, was entitled to retain as part of his salary the mileage and per diem prescribed by Pol. Code, § 4290.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the County of Los Angeles against W. A. Hammel, Sheriff, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Leon F. Moss, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Judgment in favor of defendants followed upon the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint being sustained without leave to amend. This appeal is from that judgment.

Appellant, the county of Los Angeles, sought by its action to recover from respondent Hammel and his codefendants, the sureties on his official bond, a sum of money which it was alleged had been collected after June 1, 1913, as fees for services rendered by said Hammel in his official capacity as sheriff of the county. It was the contention of the sheriff that the law entitled him to retain the fees for his own use as part of his compensation. The judgment of the lower court was in agreement with that contention. The people of the county, at the November election of 1912, adopted for the purposes of local government a charter pursuant to the authority given by an amendment to the state Constitution, known as section 7½ of article 11. At the time this charter became of effect the sheriff of the county was serving an unexpired portion of the term for which he had theretofore been elected. In addition to the salary allowed him, he had received and retained certain fees. These fees were retained by him under express authority of section 4290, Political Code, which in the part material to this consideration, provides as follows:

"The salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in this title either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this title otherwise provided. * * * Provided, further, that the sheriff shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use, five dollars per diem for conveying prisoners to and from the state prisons, and for conveying persons to and from the insane asylums, or other state institutions not otherwise provided for by law; also, all expenses necessarily incurred in conveying insane persons to and from the insane asylums, and in conveying persons to and from the state prisons, or other state institutions, which per diem and expenses shall be allowed by the board of examiners and collected from the state. * * * The sheriff may retain for his own use the mileage for service of papers or process issued by any court of the state. * * *

Under this provision the authority of the sheriff to retain the fees as a part of his general compensation is too clear to admit of dispute. We then have to determine as to whether the charter adopted by the people for the government of the county worked any change in the matter of the amount of the sheriff's compensation. Under the power given by the constitutional amendment to counties, permitting them to adopt charters for the control of their local affairs, it is provided that it shall be competent in such charters to provide for the election and appointment of officers, and—

"for the times at which and the terms for which, said officers shall be elected or appointed, and for their compensation, or for the fixing of such compensation by boards of supervisors."

Agreeable to the terms of this provision, it was provided by section 11, art. 3, of the Los Angeles county charter, that the board of supervisors should provide by ordinance for the compensation of elective officers, unless such compensation was otherwise fixed by the charter. There was a further provision, being section 52, art. 11, which provided that:

"The compensation of any elective county or township officer shall not be increased nor diminished during the term for which he was elected, nor within ninety days preceding his election."

In the same article, section 56 provided as follows:

"Nothing in this charter is intended to affect, or shall be construed as affecting, the tenure of office of any of the elective officers of the county or of any district, township or division thereof, in office at the time this charter goes into effect, and such officers shall continue to hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they shall have been elected unless sooner removed in the manner provided by law; nor shall anything in this charter be construed as changing or affecting the compensation of any such officer during the term for which he shall have been elected. But the successors of each and all of such officers shall be elected or appointed as in this charter provided, and not otherwise."

Under the provisions of the charter the office of sheriff remained elective, as it had theretofore been. The claim of appellant, which if sustained would require a reversal of the judgment, is based wholly upon a section of the charter which provides that:

"All fees collected by any county officer, board or commission shall be paid into the county treasury on the first Monday of each calendar month, together with a detailed statement of the same in writing, a duplicate copy of which shall be filed with the auditor at the same time." Article 4, § 15, Charter of L. A. County.

It is argued that the fees which the sheriff retains should not be classed as a part of his compensation; that the salary as fixed by law is the compensation intended. This view is entirely inconsistent with the provisions of section 4290, Pol. Code, as above cited, wherein it is stated that "the salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services." As a part of the same section, the fees which it is here sought to have the sheriff account for are provided to be paid to him for his own use. How to justify the distinction between the fees provided to be paid to an officer for his own use and the lump sum as salary for the same purpose, as not both being by way of compensation, we are unable to produce any logical reason and have failed to find any such in the brief of appellant. Those decisions touching cases where it has been held that the compensation of an officer might properly be changed during his term of office from that of a salary to fees, or from fees only to a salary, throw no light upon the question here presented. Without any doubt at all, the conclusion is impressed that the fees allowed by law to the sheriff for his own services were allowed by way of compensation and not otherwise. Now, in determining the effect of the charter provisions upon this question, appellant asks the court, in brief, to adopt one of the express provisions of the charter and make it effective, and discard altogether another plain provision which places a clear limitation upon the effect of the former; in other words, we are to take the expressed will of the people in one direction without admitting a qualification which they have placed upon their declarations, and give the charter an effect which it was not intended to have. From the sections we have quoted it must appear very clear that the people have intended that neither the tenure of office nor the compensation to be paid to officers elected theretofore should be changed or altered until they had served the terms for which they had been chosen by the electorate. Not only that, but it was also declared that the compensation of any elective county or township officer should not be increased nor diminished during the term for which he was elected, nor within 90 days preceding his election. It was altogether within the power of the people in adopting the charter to provide for the compensation to be paid to the officers of the county, and as an incident thereto, it certainly would be within the scope of that power to provide as to when the diminished compensation, if any, provided to be paid should commence, or as to the time when the board of supervisors might begin to exercise the authority granted to it, to make changes in the amount of compensation allowed to such officers.

In our opinion, the ruling of the trial judge as made in this case was in conformity with the plain declaration of the law.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 395—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit begun May 17th, for compensation due for the use of horses and wagons in April, the court found that payment should be made on the 10th of each month for the preceding month, or as soon thereafter as defendants received their money for grading. There were other findings that between the 1st and 10th of May defendants received approximately the amount sued for, and that on or about the 10th of May they received another amount considerably in excess of the sum claimed. Held, that these findings, taken in connection with defendants' admission of the amount due, and that it should be paid as soon after the 10th of the month as they received their compensation, warranted a judgment for plaintiff showing that, at the date of suit, his claim was matured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by F. A. Calkins against Samuel Berliner and William J. Taylor, partners trading as Taylor & Berliner. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert T. Linney and Ralph W. Schoonover, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. T. A. Williams and W. O. Morton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendants appeal from the judgment rendered against them for a specified sum of money, and the appeal is presented on the judgment roll alone.

In January, 1913, a contract was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, under which the defendants, as lessees, took possession of certain mules and wagons delivered to them by the plaintiff, and were to pay to plaintiff a certain sum per month for each pair of mules and another certain sum per month for each wagon. The complaint alleged that on May 17, 1913, when the action was commenced, there was due the plaintiff under said contract, as rental for the month of April, the sum of $454.32, and for the month of May, up to the 17th day of May, $247.98, which said sums had been demanded and payment refused. As the court held that, in respect to the latter amount, the action was prematurely brought, and only rendered judgment for the indebtedness accruing in April, it is not necessary to discuss any questions arising, except with reference to the demand for April.

[1] The answer of the defendants admitted that on May 1, 1913, they were indebted to plaintiff on account of the use of said personal property for the month of April in a sum $1 less than the amount stated in the complaint, and alleged that said sum was not due or payable, in whole or in part, to plaintiff "until on or after May 10, 1913." They further alleged that by the terms of the contract they were to pay the rental accruing in any one month upon a day subsequent to the 10th day of the succeeding month, the exact day to be determined by the date of the "actual receipt by defendants of the amount earned by them in grading during the preceding months" under a contract of the defendants with other parties for grading upon the Ardmore Heights Tract, in the county of Los Angeles. The court found that the rental due for April was $453.32, as stated in the answer; and that the money due for the use of said property should be paid on the 10th of each month for the preceding month, "or as soon after the 10th day of the month as the money was received by the defendants from the Ardmore Heights Tract Company." The court further found that between the 1st and 10th of May, 1913, defendants received from said company a payment of approximately $450, and on or about the 19th of May, $500.

The claim urged by the appellants, that the findings of fact above stated do not show that the April rental had become due to plaintiff, is a claim which could not be sustained, except by exceedingly technical construction of the words used in the finding with reference to said moneys which were received by the defendants. But the rule of construction runs the other way. Bank of Willows v. Small, 144 Cal. 709, 711, 78 Pac. 263; Lomita L. & W. Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 39, 97 Pac. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106. We think that these findings, taken together with the admissions to which we have referred, as contained in the answer, are sufficient to establish both the amount of indebtedness included in the judgment and the fact that it was due and payable at the time of commencement of this action.

[2] The findings and judgment ignore a counterclaim of $11.50 upon facts set forth in the answer. As the evidence is not presented on this appeal, we should assume, in favor of the judgment, that the defendants offered no evidence concerning this counterclaim, and the omission of the court to find upon the issue thus raised by defendants' pleading is not a sufficient ground for reversal of the judgment. Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66.

[3] The answer alleged that on May 9th, and on other days to and including May 19, 1913, in certain actions against the plaintiff, attachments had been issued and duly and legally served upon the defendants herein,

"whereby all the moneys then owing from defendants herein to plaintiff herein were attached and garnished under order of court." The findings are silent as to two of these attachments, and it may be assumed, as in the case of the counterclaim above stated, that no evidence concerning them was received. The court did find, however, that one of said attachments was served on the defendants and was released prior to the commencement of this action; and that another of said attachments was served on defendants herein on May 13th, and had not been released at the time of commencement of this action.

The matter thus pleaded by the defendants did not constitute a defense. The defendants here did not apply for a suspension of the action until the action of the attaching creditor could be disposed of, and did not ask for any stay of execution. Under these circumstances, the court was justified in rendering judgment absolute for the sum found to be due. Glugermovich v. Zicovich, 113 Cal. 64, 45 Pac. 174.

The judgment is affirmed.

COSTS $\S$ 203—TAXATION—MEMORANDUM OF COSTS—FILING AND SERVING—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The purpose of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1033, providing that the party recovering judgment and claiming costs must deliver to the clerk and serve on the adverse party, within 5 days after verdict or judgment, a memorandum of the item of his costs in the action, and an adverse party may, within 5 days after notice, file a motion to have the costs taxed by the court, is to limit the time within which the question of costs, if it arises, may be determined, and a party who fails, within the time prescribed, to file and serve memorandum of costs is conclusively deemed to waive costs accruing in his favor; and, where the memorandum has been in due form filed and served within the time prescribed, the adverse party, failing within the specified time to file the notice of motion to have the costs taxed, is conclusively deemed to waive any objections thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Jesse Griffith against Welbanks & Co. From an order striking from the files plaintiff's memorandum of costs in the action, he appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell and Dudley D. Sales, both of San Francisco, and E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant. W. H. Mahoney, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order striking from the files the plaintiff's memorandum of costs in this action.

The order appealed from was based upon and is the culmination of a motion duly interposed by the defendant for that purpose upon the ground that the plaintiff did not serve upon it or its attorney a copy of said memorandum of costs within five days after the rendition by the jury of the verdict in this action, as required by section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said motion was supported by an affidavit by the attorney for the defendant, in which it is alleged that the verdict was rendered on the 4th (stated in the briefs of counsel on both sides as the "5th") day of December, 1913; that a bill of costs was filed by the plaintiff with the clerk of the superior court of Napa county on the 5th day of December, 1913, purporting to contain a statement of the costs and disbursements accruing in favor of and made by the plaintiff in this action, but that the plaintiff did not, within five days after the rendition of the verdict in the action, serve upon the defendant or its attorney a copy of said bill of costs, or any notice of the filing of the same. The affidavit then proceeds:

"That on the 15th day of December, 1913, affiant received at his office in San Francisco, through the United States mail, an inclosed envelope, addressed to him, containing a paper purporting to be a copy of a bill of costs in said action, and indorsed upon the back thereof the following: 'Filed this 5th day of Dec., A. D. 1913. N. W. Collins, Clerk of the Superior Court.' That said envelope also contained a letter, bearing date December 13, 1913, containing the following words: 'The cost bill was filed on December 5th, 1913, with the clerk.' That affiant herein never saw or had any knowledge of said alleged cost bill, or the items contained therein, or of the date of filing the same, until said 15th day of December, 1913, when said communication was received by affiant through the mail as aforesaid; and no other or further notice or service of said bill of costs, or of the time of filing same, has been made or given to affiant by the plaintiff or his said attorney."

The plaintiff, contesting the motion, filed an affidavit by one Emil Locarnini, a law clerk in the office of E. S. Bell, Esq., one of the attorneys for the plaintiff. He declares that, having been directed so to do by said E. S. Bell, he, on the 5th day of December, 1913, prepared and filed with the clerk of the superior court of Napa county the plaintiff's memorandum of costs; that on the following day he wrote a letter to W. H. Mahoney, attorney for the defendant, and inclosed said letter in a sealed envelope, properly directed to said Mahoney, at his law office in San Francisco, prepaid the postage thereon, and on said 6th day of December, 1913, caused the same to be duly deposited in the post office at the city of Napa; "that, in addition to inclosing said letter in said envelope, this affiant also inclosed a copy of a notice of entry of judgment, * * * and affiant verily believes, and upon such belief alleges the fact to be, that at the same time and place he inclosed in said envelope a true copy of the memorandum of costs above referred to." It appears from said affidavit that on or about the 11th day of December, 1913, said E. S. Bell received a letter from the attorney for the defendant, dated at San Francisco, December 10, 1913, acknowledging receipt of Bell's letter and notice of the entry of judgment in this action, but saying that "the envelope did not contain a copy of the cost bill, as your letter indicates." The affidavit then proceeds to aver that investigation was immediately started by said Bell to ascertain, if possible, whether a copy of the cost bill had actually been inclosed in the envelope, with the letter and notice of the entry of judgment, addressed to the said Mahoney, and sets forth in minute detail certain probative facts and circumstances which, it is claimed, strongly tend to show that a copy of said memorandum of costs must have been inclosed in said letter addressed to Mahoney by the affiant.

Upon the facts thus briefly narrated, the court predicated its order striking the plaintiff's cost bill from the files.

It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff that, the evidence being conflicting upon the question, the finding of the court that a copy of the memorandum of costs was not served upon the defendant or its attorney within the time prescribed by the statute cannot be successfully challenged. It is contended, however, that the evidence discloses a substantial compliance with the terms of the statute, and that this is all that is required; the argument being that the "provisions of section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be liberally construed with a view to effecting its objects and to promote justice (section 4, Code Civ. Proc.), and its substance rather than its form should be respected (section 3528, Civ. Code)."

Section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"The party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk, and serve upon the adverse party, within five days after the verdict, or notice of the decision of the court or referee, or, if the entry of the judgment on the verdict or decision be stayed, then, before such entry is made, a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding, which memorandum must be verified by the oath of the party, or his attorney or agent, or by the clerk of his attorney, stating that to the best of his knowledge and belief the items are correct, and that the disbursements have been necessarily incurred in the action or proceeding. A party dissatisfied with the costs claimed may, within five days after notice of filing of the bill of costs, file a motion to have the same taxed by the court in which the judgment was rendered, or by the judge thereof at chambers. * * *"

Originally said section contained no provision requiring the memorandum or a copy thereof to be served on the adverse party, but the Legislature of 1874 (St. 1873-74, p. 343) so amended it as to require such service, with the result that service of the memorandum is now one of the indispensable steps to be taken before the matter of costs may be considered by the court or judge.

The manifest purpose of the section is to limit the time, after verdict or judgment, within which the question of costs, if it arises, may be definitively determined, so that, when ascertained and taxed, the costs may be included in the judgment, to the end that the party entitled thereto may secure his rights as speedily as practicable. The section cannot therefore, be held to mean anything less than what its language plainly expresses. In other words, the terms of said section are mandatory, and a substantially strict compliance therewith is required, not alone of the party claiming costs, but also of the party dissatisfied with the costs claimed. Indeed, section 1033, as to the subject to which it applies, is a statute of limitation, and to it, no less than to statutes prescribing and limiting the time within which actions may be brought, is applicable the maxim, "Vigilantibus et non dormientibus servat lex." No one would, for a moment, undertake to maintain that the time limit prescribed for the bringing of actions is not a vital and mandatory requirement of the statute.

It follows that if the one party fails, within the time prescribed, to file and serve his memorandum of costs, then he is to be conclusively deemed to have waived the costs, if any, accruing in his favor. And if, the memorandum having been in due form filed and served within the time prescribed, the adverse party fails, within the specified time, to file or notice a motion to have the costs taxed, he is conclusively deemed to have waived any and all objections thereto. Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 403; Hotchkiss v. Smith, 108 Cal. 285, 41 Pac. 304; Galindo v. Roach, 130 Cal. 389, 390, 62 Pac. 597.

The rule applied in the case of Carpy v. Dowdell, 129 Cal. 244, 61 Pac. 1126 (cited by the appellant), while proper enough in that case, cannot be applied here without rendering nugatory what we conceive to be the vital purpose of section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There the defendants, against whom judgment was had, in due time served notice on the plaintiff that they were dissatisfied with the cost bill filed by the plaintiff, and that they would make a motion to strike out certain items specified therein. When the hearing of the matter came on, the plaintiff objected to the consideration of the application on the ground that no written motion to strike out said items had been filed, and the court, conceiving that a written motion and none other was contemplated by section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure, sustained the objection. Reversing the order, the Supreme Court held that, proper written notice of the motion having been given within the time fixed by said section, an oral motion amounted to a substantial compliance with the requirement thereof in that particular. There is, as is readily perceivable, a marked difference between the proposition thus established and the one here. In that case the parties had acted within the time limited by the statute, and knew precisely what was proposed to be done in the proceeding. The manner in which the proceeding, then regularly before the court or judge, was to be presented, involved nothing more than a mere matter of form. In other words, there was no deviation from the requirements constituting the substance of the law or the essentially vital parts thereof. But even in that same case the court said that:

"The substance of the law as it stands is that the party who is dissatisfied with the bill of costs as filed must within a certain time, make his objection known and the grounds on which he will move the court to correct or strike out the cost bill. When this is done by the proper notice in writing, served and filed, specifying the time when the application to the court or judge will be made, the object of the law would seem to have been complied with."

Thus it will be perceived, the court holds, at least inferentially, that the requirement as to the time within which the parties must act in order to preserve and secure their rights with respect to costs, involves a matter of substance and not of mere form, and that it must be followed as it is laid down in the Code.

Our conclusion is that, under the facts as disclosed, no other course was open to the court below but to make the order appealed from.

Some other points in support of the order are made and discussed, but, in view of the position taken and the conclusion arrived at herein, they do not call for consideration.

The order is affirmed

PACIFIC CARBONATOR CO. v. HAYDES & SON. (Civ. 162.)

1. SALES ⇐479—CONDITIONAL SALES—DEFAULT OPTION.

Where property is sold and possession given under a contract providing that in case of default in payment of an installment, the seller may repossess himself of the property and forfeit all payments, and that the whole amount of the purchase price shall become at the seller's option immediately due and payable, the seller may either retake the property and forfeit the installments paid, or sue for the entire purchase price.

2. SALES ⇐479—CONDITIONAL SALES—RIGHT OF SELLER.

The agent of a seller of property under a conditional contract of sale upon default demanded payment of the installment and gave the buyers three days to make that payment. After that time he again demanded payment, and the buyers confessed their inability. Held, that though the agent on his second call stated that he had come for the money or the property, it was not an election by the buyer to retake the property and not to sue for the price.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Carbonator Company against Haydes & Son, a copartnership. From a judgment and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Irwin, White & Rosecrans, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bowman & Rodabaugh, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff sued on two counts, one being for merchandise sold to defendants, and the other for a balance of $640, with interest, alleged to be due on a promissory note executed by defendants in favor of plaintiff. The trial court awarded judgment to plaintiff for $22.50 on account of the merchandise sold, but denied judgment for any amount on the promissory note. The appeal is taken by the plaintiff from the judgment so rendered against it, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The promissory note was given as evidence of an indebtedness created by a written contract under which a certain lot of machinery was sold to defendants. The promissory note was made payable in monthly installments of $40, which represented the terms under which the machinery was to be purchased. That the transaction amounted to a conditional sale, with title reserved in the vendor until all payments had been made, is admitted by both parties. It is also admitted that only the sum of $160 was paid by the defendants on account of the contract for the purchase of the machinery. The trial court made the following finding of fact under which the judgment was directed to be entered in favor of defendants:

"That defendant was unable to make the payments that became due thereafter and during the month of April, 1913, plaintiff informed defendant that owing to its being unable to make the payments when due, under the provisions of the said written agreement hereinbefore set forth, plaintiff would take the property described and remove it from the possession of defendant, and that all of the payments made thereon would be forfeited to plaintiff, to all of which defendant agreed, and plaintiff elected to cancel said contract, and take back said property, and, believing and relying on plaintiff's said statement and election, defendant immediately procured other machinery and apparatus, and without delay notified plaintiff to remove the said machinery and apparatus from the premises of defendant."

It is claimed, among other contentions, that the evidence does not support the findings. In examining this point, we are referred to a statement of the evidence which was agreed to by the plaintiff and the defendants. In that statement the testimony of one of the defendants is given. This party testified that he and his codefendant were unable to make payments which became due after February, 1913, under this contract; that during the month of April, 1913, the agent of the plaintiff informed the defendants that:

"Owing to defendants' failure to make the payments when due under the provisions of the written agreement between defendants and plaintiff, he was instructed by plaintiff to take the property described in the said agreement and remove it from the possession of defendants, and that all payments which had been made thereon would be forfeited to plaintiff; that Mr. Edmunds informed defendants that he would give them until a certain time, about three days thereafter, in which to make the payments then due, or that he would take out the machinery, and at the end of said three days Mr. Edmunds came to defendants' place of business and informed defendants that he had come for the money or to take the machinery; defendants informed Mr. Edmunds that they did not have the money, and that he would have to take the machinery, that it was the best they could do, to which Mr. Edmunds replied, 'All right,' and immediately left defendants' place of business, but before leaving he adjusted a valve on one of the machines, but did not remove machinery from defendants' premises; that believing and relying upon the statements of Mr. Edmunds that plaintiff was going to take out the machinery because the overdue installments were not paid, and not being able to make the said payments, defendants believed that they would be left without the necessary machinery to carry on the business, and in order to protect themselves immediately, on the same day of their last conversation with Mr. Edmunds, purchased other machinery to take the place of that which they expected plaintiff to remove, and immediately, upon the receipt of the new machinery, the machinery of plaintiff was taken down and piled in one end of the building, and notice sent to plaintiff that it was stored there, subject to plaintiff's orders, but that said machinery had not been removed by plaintiff; that at the time of the trial of this action, a bottling attachment belonging to the plaintiff's machinery was attached to the new machinery purchased by defendants; that defendants had used said attachment after notifying the plaintiff to remove the said machinery from the defendants' place of business and until the new bottling attachment had arrived, but that it had not been used after defendants' new bottling attachment had arrived, but was kept mounted on said new machinery besides defendants' new bottling attachment, to prevent it from being broken by piling it with the remainder of plaintiff's machinery."

The foregoing statement constitutes all of the material evidence shown in the transcript from which the court made the deductions set forth in the findings.

[1, 2] A vendor of property which has been delivered to his vendee under a conditional sale contract has the option, in case of default, either to recover payments provided to be made under the contract, or to retake the property and put at an end all further obligation on the part of either party. The contract in this case expressly provided that, in the event of default as to any payment agreed to be made by the vendees, repossession of the machinery sold might be acquired by the vendor, and in that event all payments theretofore made should be deemed and considered as having been paid for the use of the machinery. In fact, the agreement accorded in its general terms with the usual and ordinary contract for conditional sale. The contract being considered here also provided that, in event default was made as to any payment, the whole amount of the purchase price mentioned in the contract should become immediately due and payable. It was in enforcement of its right under this term of the contract that plaintiff brought this action to recover the entire balance due on the promissory note. That the vendor under a conditional sale agreement may either retake the property or pursue his remedy to recover the purchase price is formulated as a general rule by the text-books and decisions. Mechem on Sales, vol. 1, § 615; Williston on Sales, § 579. There is no dispute made by counsel for respondents as to the general rules and principles applicable to contracts of the class mentioned. It is contended, however, in support of the judgment as rendered, that the vendor definitely elected to retake the property agreed to be sold and that he, having manifested his election, was estopped from bringing this action to recover the balance of the purchase price. We have examined very carefully the cases cited in the argument advanced in support of this proposition, as found in the brief of respondents, but have not been able to reach the same conclusion as indicated by the judgment of the court. We do not believe that the vendor was bound by its statement as to an intent to retake the property until some affirmative step was shown to have been made in that direction. All that was shown in this case was the fact that appellant was endeavoring to secure payment of the amount of the installments due to it under the contract, and had threatened to take the machinery in the event respondents failed to fulfill their obligations. Further, that the agent of appellant, after having notified respondents that it would take the property unless payment was made, called again to insist upon payment and was then told that respondents had no money, and that he could take the property. His reply was, "All right" but he neither then demanded that possession be turned over to him, nor did the appellant make any subsequent demand for its possession. The agent of appellant adjusted a valve on the machinery and left it in the possession of respondents and in a condition to be used by them. At no time prior to the day of the trial does it appear that he returned; nor does it appear that appellant made any request for possession of the property or attempted in any way to take it. Respondents say that they took it for granted that the property would be taken away, and proceeded to purchase new machinery which they installed. They continued to use, however, a part of the machinery received from the appellant, and the property never was received by appellant from them. As to whether anything was paid for the new machinery, or how respondents were damaged because of their belief that appellant would retake the property in dispute, does not appear in any way by the testimony shown in the transcript. But, even though it had appeared that respondents had assumed some obligation by reason of their reliance upon the declaration of appellant's agent, we are of the opinion that they were not justified in so doing until appellant had exercised its option to retake the property by giving notice or performing some act such as would amount, at least, to a demand for its possession, or show an actual attempt to get it.

Holding these views, we think that the judgment as entered is not justified.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

(HILLE et al., Interveners).

(Civ. 1534.)

1. STIPULATIONS — COSTS — TAXATION.

A stipulation made subsequent to a decision of the Supreme Court modifying and affirming the judgment appealed from, which recites that, pending the agreement, rights adjudged to either party by the judgment shall be held in abeyance, does not prevent the successful party from perfecting his judgment and inserting therein the costs allowed on appeal.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR — PRESUMPTIONS — OFFICIAL DUTIES — CLERK OF SUPREME COURT.

The court, on appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion to tax costs claimed by defendant and interveners, will presume that the clerk of the Supreme Court, modifying and affirming the judgment, inserted the direction as to costs in compliance with Supreme Court rule 23 (119 Pac. xiii), providing that, where the order of reversal or modification of a judgment contains no direction as to costs, the clerk will enter on the record a judgment that appellant recover costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by John Burr against the Maclay Rancho Water Company, in which R. H. Hille and another intervened. From an order denying the motion of plaintiff to tax costs, claimed by defendant and interveners, he appeals. Affirmed.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff herein appealed from an order made in the superior court denying his motion to tax the costs claimed by respondents as having been incurred by them as expense on an appeal taken to the Supreme Court from a judgment theretofore made in the action. That judgment on the appeal taken by respondents was by the Supreme Court modified. Burr v. Maclay Rancho Water Co., 160 Cal. 268, 116 Pac. 715. Subsequently a bill of costs was regularly filed in the superior court on behalf jointly of defendant and the interveners, who were the appellants in the appeal mentioned. Plaintiff made his objections thereto in due time in writing, and moved the court to disallow all of the items of the cost bill on two grounds: First, that because of a stipulation entered into between the parties the entry of any costs would be premature; and, second, that interveners were not entitled to costs, and it could not be ascertained from the joint statement as to what costs were properly chargeable as the expense incurred by defendant and what by the interveners.

[1] It seems that after decision by the Supreme Court, reported in the volume and at the page above stated, the parties entered into a stipulation which, in part provided as follows:

"During the currency of this agreement, all rights finally adjudged to either party by the judgment in the action of John Burr against the second party herein, and others, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, Cal., as modified and affirmed by the Supreme Court by its judgment, shall be held in abeyance."

As the terms of that agreement present themselves to us, they seem to indicate the understanding of the parties to have been only that their rights, as affecting the matter of taking water from their several lands, should be held in abeyance because they had, temporarily at least, agreed upon conditions affecting the matter. But, giving the stipulation its greater effect, as claimed for it by appellant, it still falls short of showing any term which can properly be said to have limited respondents in their right to have the judgment as made in their favor perfected or completed by the insertion therein of costs allowed to them on appeal.

[2] By reference to the decision rendered by the Supreme Court on the appeal of these respondents, as hereinabove cited, we find that there was a modification made of the judgment, and it cannot be said that such modification was not beneficial to interveners, who were claiming under defendant in the action. Rule 23 (119 Pac. xiii), as adopted by the Supreme Court, provides that:

"In all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified, and the order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to the costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the appellant recover the costs of appeal."

The bill of exceptions does not show what was provided by the remittitur issued by the clerk of the Supreme Court, although counsel for the parties in their briefs state it as a fact that the remittitur did direct that the costs of the appellants be recovered. It will be presumed that the clerk followed the practice required of him, and did insert the direction that the costs be recovered. The matter of determining what costs shall be allowed on appeal is largely one which is regulated by the appellate court in the absence of statute. We are of the opinion that costs were properly allowed in this case, and that the superior court did not err in refusing to tax the same upon the motion of the plaintiff.

The order is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J. A motion to dismiss the appeal in this case was denied by order of this court entered November 11, 1914. 145 Pac. 146. Respondent now further insists that the appeal should have been dismissed, and that this court has no jurisdiction other than to enter a dismissal.

[1, 2] The order of November 11, 1914, being now final, is the law of the case on the points involved in the motion. The motion to dismiss was based upon the ground that notice of appeal and request for a transcript was not filed within 10 days after notice to the defendant of the entry of the judgment. We think that the order denying said motion to dismiss was correctly made, since there was nothing in the record showing that the defendant ever had notice of entry of judgment, or ever waived notice of entry of judgment by any act done by him prior to filing his notice of appeal. The document upon which respondent relied as showing actual notice was a paper not capable of being considered as part of the record, and the filing of that paper did not constitute a waiver of the notice of entry of judgment referred to in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] While the order denying the motion to dismiss was therefore a correct order in this case, the opinion of this court contained one statement which it seems should be modified. Referring to section 953a, we said:

"The notice of entry of the judgment contemplated by this section, while not so stated, must nevertheless, under section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be a written notice."

In Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, at page 114, 110 Pac. 109, at page 111, the Supreme Court said concerning the same section 953a:

"The proposition that a written notice of the entry of the order is necessary to start running the time for filing the notice to the clerk by the appellant is not sustained, as we understand the authorities."

The court then proceeds to a comparison between sections 953a and 941b, and holds that, although the notice (of entry of judgment) under section 941b is intended to be necessarily a notice in writing, the words used in section 953a with reference to notice of entry of judgment are such, as to that section, that—

"actual notice established by satisfactory evidence of record will start the statute in motion without the service of a formal written notice."

[4] The plaintiff's action is brought to recover a sum due on an account stated. Plaintiff had judgment for the amount of his demand and the defendant appeals therefrom. It is claimed by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that there was an account stated between plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff had made sales of merchandise from time to time to the defendant, and on that account defendant was indebted to the plaintiff, but they were not agreed as to the amount due. Whether, as claimed by appellant, the items, or any of them, were barred by the statute of limitations, is not material to the case presented. A short time before the commencement of this action a statement purporting to show the account and the balance due was presented by the representative of plaintiff to the defendant. After some discussion, a correction was made and a new balance shown at the foot of the statement. At the bottom of the sheet the plaintiff's agent wrote as follows:

"Nov. 10, 1913.

"This last above mentioned amount ($495.00) is hereby agreed to be correct, which said amount I will pay."

This was signed: "Frank Alderete, by Annie Alderete." Plaintiff's agent testified at the trial that Frank Alderete assented to this statement and asked his daughter, Annie Alderete, to sign it for him, which she did in the presence of plaintiff's agent and the defendant. Frank Alderete and Annie Alderete both admitted that she made the signature at that time, and that her father was present in the same room at that time. They denied that the defendant assented to the amount as correct, or that he requested his daughter to make the signature. As there was testimony directly to the contrary, in accordance with which the trial court made its finding, we must assume the facts in accordance with such finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALKER v. ROCKWOOD. (Civ. 1694.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 23, 1915.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES ☞ 474 — ACTIONS — PLEADINGS—ISSUES.

An answer in an action on interest notes which alleges the execution of a no-interest note, and that one of the interest notes was executed to take the place of the no-interest note, but which does not ask for any affirmative relief as to the no-interest note, does not justify a decree canceling the no-interest note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1508-1513; Dec. Dig. ☞ 474.]

2. GIFTS ☞32—COMPLETION OF GIFT AFTER DEATH OF DONOR.

A gift of a note executed by the donor to the donee is not complete unless the donor definitely pays the note, and the donee may not after the death of the donor complete the gift by applying to the note a payment made by the donor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 63, 64; Dec. Dig. ☞32.]

3. PAYMENT ☞41—APPLICATION—PRESUMPTIONS.

The payee of interest notes for $3,000 and $1,500 sought a recovery of $2,015 due on the $3,000 note and $1,500 on the other note, and admitted a payment by the maker of $3,985, and showed that the maker had delivered to the payee a $3,000 no-interest note as a gift. There was no specific declaration as to the application of the payment admitted. Held that, in the absence of any definite direction from the maker, the court would presume that he intended the payment to be applied as a credit on the interest notes, instead of on the no-interest note delivered as a gift.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Charley Walker against C. R. Rockwood, administrator of Peter P. Walker, deceased. From a judgment granting partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

F. E. Dunlap, of Stockton, H. F. Bridges, of Sierra Madre, and M. W. Conkling, of El Centro, for appellant. Collier & Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $2,015, with interest, being a balance claimed to be due and unpaid on a $3,000 note; and also the sum of $1,500, and interest, claimed to be due and unpaid on a $1,500 note. It is alleged that these notes were made and delivered to plaintiff by Peter P. Walker, who died on May 6, 1912, and the defendant became administrator of his estate. It is admitted that the claims were duly presented, and were rejected by the administrator prior to the filing of complaint herein. Judgment having been entered for an amount less than that demanded by plaintiff, he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first of these notes was not dated, but was made on August 12, 1908. The second note bears date August 12, 1909. On the 25th day of October, 1910, Peter P. Walker paid to plaintiff the sum of $3,985. The court found that no other sum was ever paid, and that at the time of this payment the accrued interest on the notes respectively amounted to $528.66 and $144.23; that, after applying the payment of $3,985 first to the satisfaction of the larger note and the remainder on account of the smaller note, there remained due $1,187.89; that prior to the commencement of this action the defendant offered to pay said sum of $1,187.89, with interest, from October 25, 1910, and that the plaintiff refused said offer; and that (presumably on account of the offer thus made) the plaintiff was not entitled to have interest after the 5th day of August, 1912, which is the date of filing of complaint herein, and is less than a week after the claims had been wholly rejected by the administrator.

Respondent's counsel admit that the record does not disclose any evidence in support of said finding as to an offer to pay the amount now conceded to have been due, and admit that the judgment should be modified by including the accrued interest for the entire period from October 25, 1910, down to the day of entry of judgment.

[1] In the answer filed by defendant it was alleged that on the 12th day of August, 1908, Peter P. Walker executed to plaintiff another note for $3,000 in like terms as the $3,000 note set forth in the complaint, except that this other note so referred to in the answer was to be without interest until paid. Defendant alleged that the $3,000 note sued on was executed several months after, and for the sole purpose of taking the place of and canceling the no-interest note, and was given for the same and no other consideration. No affirmative relief was demanded by the defendant. No reason appears for the allegations in the answer concerning the no-interest note, unless we may infer that defendant considered it necessary to set up the facts above stated in order to overcome an anticipated claim by plaintiff that $3,000 of the money received by him on October 25, 1910, was a payment of the no-interest note.

Concerning this last-mentioned note, the court found that it was without consideration, and was a gift, and was executed on August 12, 1908; from which facts the court made a conclusion of law that said no-interest note was "void and unenforceable, and should be delivered up and canceled." The judgment, in addition to allowing recovery by plaintiff of the sums found to be due and unpaid as above shown, follows this conclusion of law and orders that the no-interest note be delivered up to defendant and canceled. The court further concluded that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs, and the judgment provides that he shall not recover any costs.

The case presented by the pleadings does not raise any issue upon the determination of which a decree could properly be entered in this action for cancellation of the note.

[2, 3] But the evidence which was received concerning this note is relevant to the case in connection with plaintiff's claim that $3,000 of the money received by him on October 25, 1910, was received in payment of the no-interest note, and that there remained only $985 to be applied as a credit on either of the two notes sued on in this action. When the plaintiff received said sum of $3,985, he did not deliver up either of the notes to the maker. He says in his testimony that decedent told him "to indorse the amount on the two $3,000 notes"; and in another place he says that decedent told him "to indorse on one of the notes the amount he had paid"; and plaintiff says that his failure to return one of the notes to Peter P. Walker was due to neglect.

We think that the court was justified by the evidence in believing that the $3,000 no-interest note was delivered by decedent to plaintiff without consideration, and was in the nature of a gift. The plaintiff has not shown that he had acquired any interest in the business of Peter P. Walker, or that plaintiff parted with any interest in that business, or with anything else of value, in consideration of said no-interest note. If the evidence had established that the deceased paid $3,000 to the plaintiff clearly and definitely as a payment of that note, then there would have been a completed gift, and the money so paid could not be credited on the other note. But upon the evidence in this regard it appears that neither party made a specific declaration or election on the subject. In the absence of a definite direction from Peter P. Walker, the court was entitled to presume that he intended the money to be applied as a credit upon the note that was a legal obligation against him, rather than upon one which was not a legal and enforceable obligation; and, as to the plaintiff, since he retained both notes, and did nothing to definitely show satisfaction of the gift note during the lifetime of the maker, he cannot by his own act complete the gift to himself after the death of the intending donor. It follows that the $3,000, together with the additional $985, paid to the plaintiff, must be considered as having been applied upon the payment of the other two notes, and that it should be credited as so applied in the order of priority of the notes.

In the following order, wherein we shall strike from the judgment certain provisions relating to the said no-interest note, we make such order, not as an adjudication that the note is valid, but solely because the judgment on that subject and for cancellation of the note is without foundation in the pleadings in this action.

The order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

It is further ordered that the judgment be modified as follows: By striking therefrom the paragraph numbered "First," and reading as follows:

"That said one-day promissory note executed on the 12th day of August, 1908, by Peter P. Walker, deceased, in plaintiff's favor for $3,000, without interest, was at the time of its execution, and at all times thereafter, and is now, void and not enforceable, and that the same shall be immediately delivered up to defendant and canceled."

It is further ordered and directed that the amount to be recovered by plaintiff be modified by allowing the plaintiff, in addition to the sum of $1,187.89, the interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 25th day of October, 1910, to the time of the entry of the judgment, to wit, the 20th day of January, 1913.

It is further ordered that said judgment be modified by striking therefrom the order "that plaintiff do not recover his costs and disbursements herein, and that defendant do have and recover his costs and disbursements herein, amounting to the sum of $28.80," and substituting therefor an order allowing costs directions therefor, is affirmed.

The judgment, as modified by the foregoing directions therefor, is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CLAYBERG. (Cr. 279.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 20, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1915.)

1. RAPE $\S$ 31—INFORMATION—SURPLUSAGE.

The allegations, in an information charging statutory rape, that force and violence were employed by accused in perpetrating the crime are mere surplusage and do not justify the setting aside of the information on the ground that accused had, by complaint, been charged only with the statutory offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 31.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\S$ 45—REFILING OF INFORMATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Pen. Code, § 1008, as amended by St. 1911, p. 436, authorizing amendments to informations in specified particulars, does not apply to an information filed in lieu of one set aside on motion pursuant to order of the court, directing the district attorney to file an information, but the action of the court is authorized by section 997, providing that the court setting aside an information must discharge accused from custody, unless it directs the filing of another information.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 45.]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\S$ 45—REFILING OF INFORMATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Where the information filed goes beyond the magistrate's commitment or charges an offense, different from that for which accused was committed the court setting it aside on that ground, may order the filing of a proper information pursuant to Pen. Code, § 997, providing that if an information is set aside, the court must discharge accused from custody unless it directs the filing of another information.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 45.]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\hookrightarrow$ 45—REFILING OF INFORMATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Pen. Code, § 997, providing that the court setting aside an information must discharge accused unless it directs the filing of an information, does not limit the right of the court to direct the filing of an information only once, and where the district attorney fails to charge the proper offense in any information, the court may direct the filing of a proper information without reference to the number of informations previously filed.

5. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 703 — ARGUMENT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

Though in statutory rape actual force is not an element, the state may show actual force if existing, and hence the opening statement of the district attorney, to the effect that the state would prove acts of actual force and violence, was not improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1659; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 703.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 730—IMPROPER ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—INSTRUCTIONS—WITHDRAWAL OF ARGUMENT.

Where, on objection to the statement of the district attorney, wherein he referred to a third person serving time in the penitentiary for a similar offense, the court promptly stopped him and directed the jury to disregard that part of the argument, and the district attorney withdrew it, the objectionable remarks were not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 730.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 807—INSTRUCTIONS—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that the policy of the law is opposed to the infliction of unusual and severe punishment is properly refused because argumentative.

8. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 829—PUNISHMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on a trial for statutory rape, punishable by Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, the court in its charge told the jury of their power, by virtue of section 264 as amended by St. 1913, p. 212, in the matter of designating the prison in which accused should be confined in case of his conviction, and correctly charged on reasonable doubt, and the jury designated the state prison as the place of punishment, refusal to charge on the power of the jury to determine the nature and extent of the punishment which might be inflicted and to determine whether accused, if convicted, should be punished by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison, and that the jury should consider all the circumstances with a view to a just determination of the mode of punishment, was not erroneous.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction for statutory rape.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

C. E. Clayberg was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Frost and Coonan & Kehoe, all of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by an information, filed in the superior court of Humboldt county, with the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed on the 29th day of May, 1914, upon the person of one Garland White, a female. Upon said information the defendant was duly tried, and a verdict of guilty of the offense so charged was returned by the jury. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the judgment and the order denying said motion he presents these appeals.

The first point made by the defendant is that the district attorney was without authority to file a new or, as he calls it, "an amended" information, after a second information, substituted for the original filed by the district attorney, had been set aside on motion. It appears that by the complaint filed in the magistrate's court, and which constituted the foundation of the preliminary hearing of the charge against the defendant, the latter was accused of statutory rape—that is to say, he was thus accused of criminally violating the person of the prosecutrix, "then and there under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of 17 years," the element of force not being therein alleged. Upon the conclusion of the preliminary examination of the charge, the magistrate indorsed on said complaint an order committing the defendant to trial in the following language:

"It appearing to me that the offense of rape as herein set forth has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within named C. E. Clayberg guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer the same."

Within due time after the commitment of the accused, the district attorney filed an information in the superior court charging the defendant with the crime as it was stated in the complaint filed before the magistrate and the order of commitment. Thereafter, upon his own initiative or without an order or authority from the court so to do, the district attorney filed in the place of the original a new information, charging the defendant with the crime for which he had been committed, but therein alleged, in addition to the statement that the prosecutrix was under the age of legal consent in such cases, that the act of sexual intercourse so charged was accomplished by the defendant by a resort to force and violence, "and without the consent and against the will of the said Garland White," and that she "resisted the accomplishment of said act of sexual intercourse, but her resistance was then overcome by force and violence upon" her by said de-defendant, etc. The defendant demurred to the information as so filed and the demurrer was overruled, and thereupon he filed and the court granted a motion to set said pleading aside upon the ground that, before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate. Section 995, Penal Code. In granting said motion, the court ordered "that a new information be filed herein against said defendant by the district attorney of the county of Humboldt, state of California," and thereupon that officer filed another information whose allegations conform to the charge as it was stated in the complaint and the magistrate's commitment of the defendant for trial.

[1] The information set aside by the court charged the offense for which the defendant was committed, and its allegations that force and violence were employed by the accused in the perpetration of the crime of rape were mere surplusage. The crime as described in the commitment or the depositions upon which the commitment was founded was also alleged. In our opinion, the motion to set aside the information should have been disallowed.

[2] However, we shall, in considering the argument against the action of the court in allowing another information to be filed by the district attorney, assume that the information set aside was defective in that it exceeded the scope of the commitment in stating the offense for which the accused was held, or, in other words in practical effect, the information did not state the precise crime for which the accused was committed.

Counsel for the defendant refer to the information upon which the defendant was tried as "an amendment to an amended information," and assert that there is no warrant of law for amending an information which is itself an amendment of the one previously filed. But the information last filed in this case was not an amendment of the information previously filed. Amendments of indictments or informations may be made by authority alone of section 1008 of the Penal Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 436. That section expressly authorizes the amendment of an indictment or information in certain indicated particulars. The information upon which the defendant was tried, however, was the information which the district attorney may file, in lieu of one set aside on motion, upon an order by the court directing him to adopt that course, and is the result of a proceeding authorized by section 997 of the Penal Code. That section provides that, if the motion to set aside the indictment or information is granted—

"the court must order that the defendant, if in custody, be discharged therefrom; * * * unless it directs that the case be resubmitted to the same or another grand jury, or that an information be filed by the district attorney; provided, that after such order of resubmission the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him, as in other cases, if before indictment or information filed he has not been examined and committed by a magistrate."

[3] There can be no doubt that where it is made to appear that an information as filed by the district attorney has gone beyond the scope of the magistrate's commitment or charges an offense different from that for which the accused has been committed by the magistrate, and the superior court for that reason sets it aside, as in such case it would be its duty to do, said court by the power vested in it by said section of the Penal Code, may authorize, by a proper order, the district attorney to file another information upon and conformably to the commitment as made by the magistrate upon the preliminary hearing of the charge. People v. Lane, 101 Cal. 513, 36 Pac. 16; Carpenter v. Nutter, 127 Cal. 61, 64, 59 Pac. 301; Ex parte Fowler, 5 Cal. App. 549, 90 Pac. 938. This is as it should be. The commitment is based upon testimony taken at the hearing, and, where an information has been set aside upon the ground that it does not charge the offense for which the accused has been committed, and the court thereupon directs, by a proper order, that another information be filed on such commitment, there is no conceivable reason calling for a re-examination of the same charge, thus necessitating the re-taking of testimony once heard, where the commitment, founded upon such testimony, discloses that an offense of which the superior court has jurisdiction has been committed, and that there is reasonable ground arising from the testimony so taken for committing the accused for trial upon the charge. Indeed, a document purporting to be an information, founded on a commitment by a magistrate, and which charges a different offense from that for which the accused has been so committed, is, in point of law, the same as no information at all in that case, and hence it was with much wisdom, indeed, that the Legislature authorized, in such circumstances, a procedure for the filing of a proper information which would obviate the necessity of repeating a proceeding which, having once been had, could accomplish no useful purpose either to the defendant or to the people. Section 997, as so construed, can certainly work no prejudice to the rights of the accused, and harmonizes with the spirit and central purpose of the reformed procedure.

[4] But counsel seem to lay particular stress upon the proposition that the court allowed the district attorney to file three informations in this case, two having been set aside, contending that, even if section 997 contemplates that an information may at all be filed in the place of one set aside on motion, without a re-examination of the charge, said section is to be so construed as to limit the right of the court to direct it to be done and of the district attorney to file it under such direction to one time only in a single case. In other words, the contention appears to be that the procedure authorized by said section as to the filing of another information upon the setting aside of one previously filed may be resorted to but once in any one case, and that before a second information can legally be filed, two previous ones having been set aside, there must be another preliminary examination of the charge before a magistrate. The language of the section does not support that contention. We can see no reason why the same procedure may not be invoked more than once in any one case, where the district attorney fails to charge in any information he may file in such case the crime for which the accused has been committed and it appears that an information can be filed stating such offense.

[5] The next assignment involves the complaint that, in declaring to the jury in his opening statement that he would prove certain acts of actual force and violence on the part of the defendant in the accomplishment of the act of sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, the district attorney went beyond the issues tendered by the information, inasmuch as the element of actual force was not of the essence of the crime as charged. But, while it is true that the crime as set forth in the information was not of that character to require the proof of force to establish its consummation, the district attorney nevertheless had the right to show the circumstances under which the crime was committed and to state to the jury his intention and ability to prove those circumstances, and if, perchance, they developed some element not essential to the consummation of the crime as charged, the defendant cannot complain, so long as they related to the transaction or act directly resulting in the consummation of the crime. In so-called statutory rape, actual force is not an element, but therein the law supplies the element of force by declaring that a sexual act with a female not the wife of the seducer and under a certain age is against her consent and therefore a crime. In such a case, in other words, force is implied, and proof of actual force in the commission of the crime of statutory rape can make it none the more a crime than if that element were absent.

The prosecutrix, in detailing the circumstances under which the defendant met and assaulted her, testified that he used actual force upon her; that he forcibly dragged her to the spot where the act was perpetrated, and that he gagged and administered chloroform to her and then violated her person. Thus the district attorney, not only with eminent propriety, showed how the act to the execution of which the prosecutrix could not in law consent was committed, but made good his promise to the jury that he would prove that the act was committed under the circumstances as outlined by him in his opening statement.

[6] Again, it is urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct seriously violating the substantial rights of the defendant by referring, in his argument of the case to the jury, to an assault of the same general character as that charged against the defendant, which was made by another party upon another female on a previous occasion, in Humboldt county, and calling attention to the fact that the assailant "is now doing time in San Quentin for that crime." The district attorney obviously had no right to refer to other cases having no connection whatever with the present case in his argument to the jury, and this proposition the trial judge in this case readily recognized, for, upon objection by the attorney for the defendant, the court promptly stopped the prosecutor from further reference to the case mentioned by him and instructed the jury to disregard that part of the argument, "and not to be influenced by it in any respect." The district attorney thereupon also said, "I will withdraw that part of my argument and consent that it be stricken out." The prompt and emphatic admonition by the court to the jury to disregard and not to be governed by the objectionable remarks of the district attorney were no doubt obeyed by the jury. At any rate, we must so presume, and that whatever damaging effect said remarks might otherwise have had upon the rights of the accused was overcome by the timely instruction of the court to disregard them. People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. 865, 20 Pac. 129; People v. Molina, 126 Cal. 507, 59 Pac. 34; People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 439, 66 Pac. 589, 863; People v. McRoberts, 1 Cal. App. 28, 81 Pac. 734; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435.

[7, 8] It is next insisted that the court, erroneously and to the prejudice of the defendant, disallowed instruction V, as proposed by him. Said instruction related to the power vested in juries by section 264 of the Penal Code (Stats. 1913, p. 212), in cases arising under subdivision 1 of section 261 of said Code, to determine practically the nature and extent of the punishment which may be inflicted. By the terms of the former section, it is incumbent upon the jury, where the prosecution is based upon subdivision 1 of section 261, to determine whether the defendant, if convicted, shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison. The rejected instruction explained the law as it is declared in those sections of the Code, and proceeded to declare that it was the duty of the jury to consider all the circumstances of the present case with a view to a just determination of which mode of punishment authorized by said section 261 "will best conserve the interest of society and the interest of the defendant," in the event that they found the defendant guilty. The instruction also had something to say about the policy of the law being opposed to the infliction of "unusual or severe punishment," etc., which statement could have no just place in the court's charge; it being argumentative in character. The instruction was properly refused. The court, in its charge, told the jury of the power and duty resting upon them by virtue of the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code in the matter of designating the prison in which the defendant should be incarcerated in case of his conviction of the crime charged (the crime charged here being based on subdivision 1 of said section 261), and the jury, heeding that instruction, by their verdict, designated the state prison as the place of punishment. The court, furthermore, very clearly explained to the jury their general duty as such, and told them that a verdict of conviction could be reached only upon their being convinced, after a fair and impartial consideration of all the evidence, of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt.

[9] The last point made by the defendant calling for special notice is that the verdict is devoid of sufficient support; but this claim is wholly without merit, as an examination of the evidence will readily disclose. The crime was committed at about the hour of 9 o'clock on the evening of May 29, 1914. The prosecutrix, at the time of the assault upon her, was under the age of 18 years, having been born in the month of November, 1896. She testified that, at about the hour named, while she was on the way from her home to a grocery store and while walking over a path which passes through a large park, in the city of Eureka, known as "Sequoia Park," she saw a man (who turned out to be the defendant) coming toward her. "As he got up to me," she continued, "he flashed a light in my face, and I turned to run, and he grabbed me. I beat him, and he got me down and held me and chloroformed me, and when I came to he was dragging me out in the road by the park, and dragged me quite a ways, and whenever I did anything he put the chloroform to my nose, and took me over by the park over beyond the road going through the park. * * * He tied a handkerchief over my mouth and put a gag in my mouth to keep me from hallooing. That was after he dragged me and in the road quite a ways, and dragged me off the county road. * * * He said if I would not go he would make me go. * * * He took me over the stile and around next to the fence. He did not take me down the road but a little ways, then he took off and left the road, the county road, and took me into the woods." She proceeded to say that he finally forced her to a lonely spot in the woods, a considerable distance from the road, made her lie down upon the ground, and then had sexual relations with her. After the defendant had finished his relations with the girl, she returned to her home, reaching there at about a quarter to 11 o'clock. She thereupon immediately made complaint to her mother of the treatment she had received at the hands of the defendant.

The mother of the prosecutrix testified that the latter arrived at her home at about 11 o'clock on the night of May 29, 1914; that the young woman's hair was nearly torn from her head—

"and she was dirt all over; her shoes were full of dirt, and she seemed to be just wrecked all over. * * * There was not a hairpin left in her hair. Her teeth were chattering like she had the worst chill that could be; * * * she was nervous and excited. * * * She made complaint to me that something had happened to her. * * * I examined her underclothing; * * * they were badly soiled. * * * I detected strong odor of chloroform; * * * I am familiar with the odor of chloroform; * * * I followed nursing for 10 years; * * * her lips were scorched all across here [showing]. * * * I picked her up off the floor where she fell beside my bedside, and she told me what had happened; * * * she was in such a bad condition, so weak in her excitement, that I went and helped her get to bed. * * * She had a chill—a nervous chill—after I put her to bed. * * * I telephoned to the police that night; her and I went to the telephone together, just across the yard to Mrs. Walker's. * * * She herself [the prosecutrix] gave [to the police] a description of the man. * * * Mrs. Walker was present when we telephoned to the police."

The witness Snodgrass was confined in the city jail of Eureka a short while after the defendant's arrest, and there he met and conversed with the latter, with whom he was acquainted, and who, while not admitting that he had sexual relations with the prosecutrix, said to the witness that he had met her on the night of the assault. The defendant requested the witness to go to his (defendant's) room, in the Brooklyn House, and secure and destroy some bottles containing chloroform which were in said room. The witness went to the room as requested and searched for the bottles, but was unable to find them. Later the defendant gave the witness a more specific description of the place in the room where the bottles were situated and, on returning to the room, accompanied by an officer, and again looking for the bottles, found them, the officer then being present. They contained chloroform.

The chief of police of Eureka testified that, upon searching the room of the defendant, shortly after the latter's arrest, he found a searchlight. The chief also testified that he was with and saw the witness Snodgrass locate the bottles of chloroform which the latter found in the defendant's room.

C. L. Koker testified that, after the arrest of the defendant, he held a conversation with him in the county jail; that the accused admitted in said conversation that he met the prosecutrix in the dark and flashed the light on her. Subsequently, in another conversation, the defendant remarked to the witness that "if the chloroform was found, it was all off with him, and if the chloroform was not found, he had a chance."

The witness Lee testified that the defendant admitted to him that he had had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix. He further admitted to the witness that he had sent Snodgrass to his (defendant's) room to get and dispose of the chloroform, and requested Lee to find out whether Snodgrass had done as he (defendant) had directed him to do. Lee further said that defendant requested him to "try and get this girl to go for a ride with me, and get a confession from her that she was over 18 years old."

Thus, in substance, we have presented the testimony which stands as the support to the verdict, and that it is ample support there is no substantial reason for doubting. It appears to be true and, indeed, it may be conceded, that the story of the prosecutrix is characterized by some inconsistencies or contradictions. These, however, bear particularly upon the question whether the defendant employed force in the perpetration of the crime. But, the prosecutrix being under the age of consent, it is manifestly immaterial whether the defendant used force in the accomplishment of the act or not. The mere act of having sexual relation with a female under the age of legal consent itself constitutes the crime charged, and it still remains a crime even though it be shown that the female actually consented to the act. Besides, contradictions arising in the testimony of a witness constitute considerations with which appellate courts cannot concern themselves unless it clearly appears that such contradictions impart to the whole story of the witness such inherent infirmities as will render the entire material portions of his testimony palpably improbable or unbelievable.

Some of the rulings of the court upon the evidence are criticized, but we have found nothing in the few assignments under this head which calls for special consideration.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

HARRISON v. ARMOUR et al. (L. A. 3360.)
(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1915.)

1. CORPORATIONS — 228 — UNPAID STOCK — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

The amount due on corporate stock issued when not fully paid up is deemed money due the corporation, and judgment creditors of the corporation may resort to such fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 874, 878; Dec. Dig. — 228.]

2. CORPORATIONS — 232 — STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Where stock is sold for money, and the purchase price is less than the par value, the difference between the par value and the amount paid is the measure of the stockholders' liability to judgment creditors of the corporation; but, where stock is exchanged for property, the valuation of the property fixed by the parties is conclusive, unless fraudulent, and, if fraudulent, the actual value of the property will control.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 879, 880, 883, 884, 987; Dec. Dig. — 232.]

3. CORPORATIONS — 232 — STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY — PATENT RIGHT AS CONSIDERATION.

Where corporate stock was exchanged for exclusive patent rights of unascertained value, nothing more being shown, the stock will be considered fully paid as to judgment creditors of the corporation, and neither the fact that the term "fully paid" was not used in the transaction between the parties or in the certificate of stock, or the fact that prior to the exchange the corporation had authorized cash sales of stock at one-quarter par value, would be proof that the stock was not fully paid.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordweil, Judge.

Action by C. W. Harrison, doing business as the Harrison Machine Works, against R. M. Armour, R. W. Kemp, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Armour and Kemp appeal. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

James P. Clark, C. A. Post, and H. S. Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. J. B. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action by a judgment creditor of a corporation, to subject to the payment of his claim the unpaid subscriptions of various stockholders.

The complaint alleged the incorporation, in June, 1907, of Marine Power & Electric Company, the recovery by the plaintiff on July 7, 1911, of a judgment against said corporation for $1,127.35, and costs, the return of the execution unsatisfied, and the non-payment of the judgment. It alleged further that the capital stock of the corporation was divided into shares of the par value of $1 each, and that the various defendants had subscribed for, and were the owners of, certain numbers of shares for which no more than 25 cents per share had been paid; the balance of 75 cents per share being still unpaid and subject to the payment of plaintiff's judgment. Of the various defendants, R. M. Armour was alleged to be the owner of 11,000 shares and R. W. Kemp of 6,000 shares. The judgment went in favor of the plaintiff against all the defendants. Armour and Kemp appeal from the judgment. As they are the only appellants, the situation of the other defendants need not engage our further attention.

The two appellants answered jointly. They denied, among other things, that any sum remained unpaid on account of their stock. The court found in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues; the finding on the immediate point just referred to being that Armour was the owner of 11,000 shares of stock, for which no more than 25 cents per share had been paid, and upon which there was unpaid and subject to the payment of the corporate debts and of plaintiff's judgment the sum of $8,250. With respect to Kemp the finding is similar, except that the number of shares owned by him was 6,000 shares, and the balance of the subscription price found to be unpaid was $4,500. These findings, so far as they relate to the amount paid in on the stock, are attacked as unsustained by the evidence. We think the objection is well founded.

The Marine Power & Electric Company was organized in June, 1907, with a nominal capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 1,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. Some two months theretofore a corporation known as the Bancroft-Compton Realty Company had been organized. The last-named corporation had secured from the government of the United States and other governments patents for a device to utilize the power of ocean waves. On June 8, 1907, its directors, at a meeting regularly held, adopted a resolution that the Bancroft-Compton Realty Company enter into negotiations with the Marine Power & Electric Company "whereby they receive 60,000 shares of the Marine Power & Electric Company's stock, in payment for the sole rights to use the said Bancroft-Compton Realty Company's wave motor in the five counties, viz., Los Angeles, Orange, San Diego, San Bernardino, and Riverside, and, furthermore, that they receive 5 per cent. of the gross income of all plants erected by the said Marine Power & Electric Company within the five above named counties." This proposal was made to the directors of the Marine Power & Electric Company, and was by them accepted. Pursuant thereto a written contract between the two corporations was executed on July 10, 1907. This agreement provides that Bancroft-Compton Realty Company, "in consideration of the transfer to it of 60,000 shares of the capital stock of the said Marine Power & Electric Company, and in consideration of the said Marine Power & Electric Company agreeing with the said Bancroft-Compton Realty Company to pay to the said Bancroft-Compton Realty Company 5 per cent. of the gross income of any plant or plants that may be erected under the said patents by the said Marine Power & Electric Company," agrees to assign, sell, and transfer to the Marine Power & Electric Company the exclusive right to use the said patents in the five counties above mentioned.

Pursuant to this contract certificates for 60,000 shares were issued to the Bancroft-Compton Realty Company, and that corporation divided up these shares among its own stockholders in certain proportions. It was under this distribution that Armour received his 11,000 shares and Kemp the 6,000 owned by him. No evidence whatever was offered to show the value of the rights thus transferred in return for the 60,000 shares of stock. It appeared, however, that at a meeting held on the 8th day of June, 1907, the board of directors of the Marine Power & Electric Company had adopted a resolution providing that a block of 100,000 shares of the company's stock be offered for sale at 25 cents per share, "or increased in price at any time by direction of the board of directors" for the purpose of erecting a commercial plant. This was two days prior to the meeting at which the offer of the Bancroft-Compton Realty Company was accepted by the directors of the Marine Power & Electric Company. Pursuant to this authorization a number of sales of stock at 25 cents per share in cash were made to various persons.

[1] It is thoroughly settled in this state and in other jurisdictions that, "where the stock of a corporation is issued without being fully paid up, the amount remaining unpaid is, so far as its creditors are concerned, deemed to be money due to the corporation from its stockholders," and resort to such fund may be had by such creditors. Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488.

[2] The doctrine has been applied in two classes of cases. Where the stock was sold for money and the purchase price was less than the par value of the stock, the difference between the par value and the amount actually paid is the measure of the stockholder's liability. A typical instance of this kind was presented in the leading case of Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, where $20 per share in cash had been paid on shares of the par value of $100. There are, however, many cases in which the stock is not sold for cash, but is issued in return for real or personal property having no defined value. In such cases the rule is that, where the corporation and stockholder have agreed upon a given valuation for the property transferred, such valuation is binding and conclusive, unless it is fraudulent in purpose or effect. But, if the parties have put upon the property a valuation in excess of what they knew or believed to be its true value, this is a constructive fraud upon the creditors, and the stock will be deemed paid only to the extent of the actual value of the property received in exchange for it. Herron Co. v. Shaw, supra.

[3] In this case we think the plaintiff and the court below fell into error in confusing these two classes of cases. There was no attempt to show that the patent rights transferred to the corporation were overvalued, knowingly or otherwise. So far as appears, they may, at the time of the transaction, have been worth $60,000, the amount of the par value of the stock issued in exchange for them, or more. The theory of the court below seems to have been, not that property worth less than $60,000 was taken at $60,000, but that the property—i. e., the patent rights—were turned into the corporation as a 25 per cent. payment on account of the stock; the respective boards of directors agreeing, expressly or impliedly, that said rights should be taken at a valuation of $15,000, or 25 per cent. of the par value of the stock issued in exchange for them. We see nothing in the record to justify this view. The transaction between the two corporations was one whereby certain property, of unascertained value, was turned over to the Marine Power & Electric Company in exchange for 60,000 shares of its stock. The natural and ordinary interpretation of such a transaction is that the property is taken in payment for the given number of shares, and, in the absence of anything showing the fixing of a smaller valuation upon the property, it must be deemed to be transferred and taken as payment of the par value of the shares. In other words, the two corporations plainly intended to issue the stock as fully paid. It is true that neither the resolutions adopted by the respective boards of directors, nor the contract itself, contained the term "fully paid stock." But this is unimportant; there being nothing to show that there was any attempt to fix a valuation which would make it less than fully paid. Nor do we attach any significance to the fact that the certificates of stock did not describe the shares as fully paid. It is a very common practice to issue certificates containing nothing to show whether the stock is fully or part paid. No inference against full payment is to be drawn from the silence of the certificate. On the contrary, where the case involved the rights of purchasers from the original subscribers, it has been held that the presumption arising from a certificate in this form, if there be any presumption, is that the stock is fully paid for. 1 Cook on Corp. (6th Ed.) § 50; Johnson v. Lullman, 15 Mo. App. 55.

The circumstance upon which the respondent places his main reliance is that, prior to the agreement for the issuance of the 60,000 shares, the directors of the Marine Power & Electric Company had authorized the sale of 100,000 shares at 25 cents per share. But the 60,000 shares issued in return for the patent rights were no part of the stock thus authorized to be sold. The sale of the 100,000 shares was to be made for the purpose of erecting a plant, and the resolution authorizing it evidently contemplated sales for cash. The fact that cash sales were made at 25 cents per share is no proof that an issue of stock in exchange for patent rights was intended to be or was at the same rate. The two transactions are essentially different, and the nature of each must be determined from its own facts.

Under the allegations of the complaint, it would have been open to the plaintiff to prove that the patent rights, although turned in at a valuation of $60,000, were, and were known or believed by the parties to be, worth much less. Herron Co. v. Shaw, supra. But no such proof was offered. In its absence there is no adequate support for the finding that only 25 cents per share had been paid on the stock held by appellants.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BROWN v. BROWN. (Sac. 2121.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1915.)

1. DIVORCE ⇐170—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE—PROPERTY—EFFECT ON COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 131, 132, providing for interlocutory and final decrees in divorce actions, an interlocutory decree, with respect to the rights of husband and wife in the property of one another, does not sever the marriage relation, which subsists in that respect until the final decree is pronounced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 552, 553; Dec. Dig. ⇐170.]

2. DIVORCE ⇐322—FINAL DECREE—PROPERTY—EFFECT ON COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, providing that, if a final decree for divorce be rendered for extreme cruelty or adultery, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court may deem just, and that, if the decree be rendered on any other ground, the community property shall be equally divided, where the final decree of divorce makes no disposition of the property, the parties become tenants in common, and, if the cause of divorce was not cruelty or adultery, each will thereafter be owner of an undivided one-half, without further order of the court; but, if the decree was for either of such causes, the respective interests of the parties in the community property are subject to the determination in a subsequent proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-825; Dec. Dig. ⇐322.]

3. DIVORCE ⚭322—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE — PROPERTY SUBSEQUENTLY ACQUIRED — STATUS.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 131, 132, providing for interlocutory and final decrees in divorce actions, property acquired by a husband otherwise than by gift, devise, or descent before or after interlocutory decree, but before final decree, becomes community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-825; Dec. Dig. ⚭322.]

4. DIVORCE ⚭322—FINAL DECREE—EFFECT ON COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Where the complaint in a divorce action alleges that there is no community property, an interlocutory, and eventually a final, decree for the wife being entered thereon by default, the former wife, on death of the husband intestate, has no rights in realty which was his property before the divorce suit; such a judgment or decree being, in effect, a contract between the parties that it shall finally adjudicate everything embraced in the allegations of the complaint.

5. DIVORCE ⚭322—FINAL DECREE—EFFECT ON COMMUNITY PROPERTY ACQUIRED DURING PENDENCY OF SUIT.

Where the complaint in a divorce action alleged that there was no community property, an interlocutory, and eventually a final, decree being entered thereon by default for the wife, she, upon death of the husband intestate, became tenant in common with his administrator in realty which he had acquired after the interlocutory, but before the final, decree; since there was no issue tendered in the action concerning the specific property for the decree to adjudicate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-825; Dec. Dig. ⚭322.]

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚭279—SEPARATION AGREEMENT—RESCISSION.

Where a wife, by separation agreement, purported to release her rights in the community property, and to declare subsequently acquired property the separate property of the person acquiring it, after the execution of the agreement, the parties becoming reconciled and living together as husband and wife for several months, orally agreeing to set aside and annul such separation agreement, it was effectually canceled; the oral agreement having been executed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Ruby D. Brown against Eva S. Brown, as administratrix. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & March (H. C. Beach, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. J. C. Sims and Myer Jacobs, both of San Francisco (T. E. Pawlicki, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The object of the plaintiff's action herein is to establish her title as tenant in common in 800 acres of land of which John S. Brown died seised, and to be let into possession thereof in common with the defendant, who is the administratrix of the estate of said decedent. The court below made findings and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and claims that it is not sustained by the findings.

The plaintiff and the decedent, John S. Brown, intermarried on May 1, 1903, and remained in the relation of husband and wife until June 25, 1909, when the marriage was dissolved by a final decree of divorce in the superior court of San Francisco. The interlocutory decree on which the final decree was founded was entered on June 22, 1908. John S. Brown acquired the land in controversy by conveyances made to him on December 31, 1908. It was not acquired either by gift, devise, or descent. This, it will be noted, was after the interlocutory decree of divorce and before the final decree.

[1, 2] The plaintiff's claim is based in part on certain rules of law which have been settled by former decisions of this court and which it is proper here to state. With respect to the rights of a husband and wife, respectively, in the property of the other, an interlocutory decree of divorce, given under the provisions of sections 131 and 132 of the Civil Code, does not sever the marriage relation, and they remain in that relation until the final decree of divorce is pronounced. Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 121 Pac. 320; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 9, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107; Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 250, 79 Pac. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23. The theory of these cases seems to be that the provision for interlocutory decrees and the subsequent delay of one year before the entry of a final decree was intended to operate as a method of prolonging the action, so as to prevent the divorce from being hastily accomplished, and that the interlocutory decree, so far as the termination of the marriage relation is concerned at least, is a mere step in the proceedings. Where the final decree of divorce makes no disposition of the community property, the parties become tenants in common of such property. If the cause of divorce was neither cruelty nor adultery, each will thereafter be the owner of an undivided one-half of the community property without further order of the court, but, if given for either of said causes, the respective interests of the parties in the community property left undisposed of is subject to the determination of a court of competent jurisdiction in a subsequent action or proceeding. Civ. Code, § 146, subds. 1, 2; De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 162; Biggi v. Biggi, 98 Cal. 38, 32 Pac. 803, 35 Am. St. Rep. 141; Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 505, 42 Pac. 1064. The divorce in this case was rendered upon the ground of willful neglect on the part of the husband.

[3] That property acquired by the husband otherwise than by gift, devise, or descent after the action is begun and before the final decree is community property is manifest from a consideration of the law defining such property and the effect of sections 131 and 132 of the Civil Code. The office of the interlocutory decree, under section 131, is merely that of "declaring that the party in whose favor the court decides is entitled to a divorce." This stands for a year. In the meantime neither party, alone, may dismiss the action. After the year the final decree may be given granting the divorce, and it is at that time that the Code specifies (section 132), that the court may give "such other and further relief as may be necessary for the complete disposition of the action." As we have seen, the marriage status remains until the final decree. Such property acquired after the interlocutory decree and before final decree is acquired "after marriage" and before its termination, and is therefore community property. Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164. There is nothing anywhere in the statute that will justify any distinction, in this respect, between property acquired before the suit is begun and that acquired afterward during the existence of the marriage relation, or to sanction the theory that the interlocutory decree affects the character of property acquired afterward, and not disposed of thereby.

Under the rules just stated, we think it must be conceded that the plaintiff is seised of an undivided one-half of this property, unless it shall appear that the matter was adjudicated otherwise by the decree of divorce. For the consideration of this question a further statement of facts is necessary.

[4, 5] The action for divorce was begun on May 23, 1908. The complaint alleged "that there is no community property," and that Brown was worth about $500, was in receipt of a professional income of $250 a month, and was able to support the plaintiff. There was no prayer for alimony or for an allowance for the support of the plaintiff. The defendant, Brown, was duly served with summons and complaint, and made default in the action, whereupon the court, upon evidence produced in support of the allegations of the complaint, made the interlocutory decree as above stated. This decree recited that all the allegations of the complaint were sustained by the testimony and were true; it adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce, and declared that at the time of the final decree the court should "grant such other and further relief as may be necessary to a complete disposition of this action." It did not mention the subject of community property or property rights of any kind. No other or further pleadings were filed, and at the expiration of the year the final decree was made upon the motion of Ruby D. Brown and upon the records and papers in the case. It adjudged the dissolution of the marriage, and made no order, direction, or even mention of property or other rights.

It is earnestly contended by the respondent that the final decree is of no force whatever upon the right of the plaintiff in the property of the husband. In this we think the plaintiff is mistaken. Where a defendant is served with a summons and complaint stating the facts upon which he is required to act, and he makes default, he is presumed to admit all the facts which are well pleaded in the complaint. The judgment which follows upon this sort of admission is, in contemplation of law, a complete adjudication of all the rights of the parties embraced in the prayer for relief and arising from the facts stated in the complaint, including the facts in his favor as well as those against him. The defendant here is presumed to have acceded to the proposition embraced in the complaint and to have consented that plaintiff should obtain the relief therein prayed for, upon the conditions and facts set forth in the complaint. The proceeding is equivalent to a statement by Brown to plaintiff that he did not object to a divorce for the cause alleged, based upon the theory that there was no community property existing at the time the action was begun. When judgment is rendered upon such a complaint and default, it becomes, in effect, a contract between the parties that the judgment shall be final with respect to everything properly embraced within the allegations of the complaint and in the prayer for relief. 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 330; Hoh v. Hoh, 84 Wis. 378, 54 N. W. 731. Although the final decree is silent as to property, it nevertheless operates as an adjudication that at the time the action was begun there was no community property. Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 227; Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 21 Pac. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126.

This proposition, however, does not determine the case. The plaintiff does not here seek an interest in community property existing when the action for divorce was begun; she asserts an interest in that which came into existence after the interlocutory decree therein was given. The general rule that a judgment is conclusive, not only as to that which is actually determined, but also as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the action, is not always applicable literally. Mr. Freeman on this subject says:

"It may be that the plaintiff might have united other causes of action with that set out in his complaint, or that the defendant might have interposed counterclaims, cross-bills, and equitable defenses, or either of the parties may have acquired new rights pending the litigation, which might, by permission of the court, have been pleaded by supplemental complaint or answer, and therefore might have been litigated in the action. But, as long as those several matters are not tendered as issues in the action, they are not affected by it." (Italics ours.)

And further:

"Thus in an action to recover real estate, the defendant cannot put in evidence a title acquired pendente lite, unless he has pleaded it by a supplemental answer (see Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 129 [99 Am. Dec. 256]); and therefore, where he had not so pleaded it, he is not concluded from asserting it in a subsequent action." 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 249.

Pertinent to this point is the following from section 329 of the same volume:

"It is well settled that the issues in a case ordinarily refer to the beginning of the suit, and that matters occurring during its pendency are not in issue, and cannot be received in evidence, unless under some supplemental pleading filed by permission of the court. So far as the plaintiff is concerned, no doubt he is not estopped from asserting any title acquired after the commencement of the action, because he must generally recover upon the cause of action held by him at that time, and cannot be aided by rights of action arising afterwards."

These principles have been followed in this state. Thus in Maddux v. County Bank, 129 Cal. 665, 62 Pac. 264, 79 Am. St. Rep. 143, the defendant in a foreclosure judgment was allowed, by a subsequent action, to recover money which the foreclosure plaintiff had received from collateral held by it as security for the mortgage debt, where it appeared that the money had been so received after the action of foreclosure was begun and before the foreclosure judgment, and had not been then credited so as to reduce the judgment, and that the defendant had not appeared and pleaded the same as part payment. In People's Bank v. Hodgdon, 64 Cal. 97, 27 Pac. 938, the defendant, against whom a judgment in ejectment had been rendered in a former action between the parties, the title having been there put in issue, was permitted to assert a title acquired by her after the issues were framed in the former action and two years before the judgment against her therein. See, also, People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 443, 9 Pac. 655; Id., 93 Cal. 245, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Valentine v. Mahoney, 37 Cal. 396; Hentig v. Redden, 26 Am. St. Rep. 97, note.

Upon the same principle we think it is clear that the judgment of divorce will not prevent plaintiff from claiming an interest in community property acquired after the beginning of the action and before the final judgment, if there was no issue tendered in that action concerning such property. The record shows that no adjudication was made in that case barring the rights of the wife in the property here in controversy. It follows that the court below properly decided that the plaintiff was entitled to an undivided one-half of the property.

[6] With regard to the separation agreement made by Brown and wife in 1906, which purported to release her rights in the community and to declare subsequently acquired property the separate property of the person acquiring it, and which it is claimed bars the present action of plaintiff, we need only say that the findings declare that some four months after its execution the parties agreed to become, and were, reconciled; that they thenceforth for several months lived and cohabited together as husband and wife; and that, in pursuance of the agreement to so live, they further orally agreed to, and did, set aside and annul said agreement. This was an executed oral agreement, and it was a sufficient cancellation of the previous written agreement of separation. Civ. Code, § 1698; Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 325, 95 Pac. 154, 159. Furthermore, it has been said that the reconciliation coupled with cohabitation in pursuance thereof operates to avoid the agreement for separation. Wells v. Stout, 9 Cal. 498; Sargent v. Sargent, 106 Cal. 546, 39 Pac. 931. This, however, it is not necessary to decide.

We perceive no ground for the contention that the plaintiff is estopped by laches.

The judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. BROWN. (Sac. 2122.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1915.)

DIVORCE §172—FINAL DECREE—EFFECT ON COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Where the complaint in a divorce action alleged that there was no community property, a final decree being entered thereon by default, the former wife, upon the death of the husband intestate, had no rights in an insurance policy which had, in fact, become his property before the action for divorce; such judgment being a final adjudication of everything properly embraced in the allegations of the complaint and the prayer for relief.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Ruby D. Brown against Eva S. Brown, as administratrix. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harris & March (H. C. Beach, of counsel), for appellant. J. C. Sims and Myer Jacobs, both of San Francisco (T. E. Pawlicki, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action, in all except two particulars, is the same as the action of Brown v. Brown, 147 Pac. 1168 (Sac. 2122), this day decided. We refer to that action for a more particular statement of the facts. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to a division of the proceeds of a life insurance policy belonging to the estate of John S. Brown, deceased.

The only difference between this case and the other case above mentioned is that here the property is personal property, while there it was real estate, and here it consists of an insurance policy which had become the property of Brown before the action for divorce was begun. In consequence of the date of its acquisition by Brown, said policy, if it was community property, was in existence as such at the time the action for divorce was begun. Upon the principles laid down in case No. 2121, aforesaid, it would follow that the judgment of divorce, based upon the complaint declaring that there was no community property, is a conclusive determination against the plaintiff that this property is not community property, and by said judgment she is estopped from claiming any interest whatever in this part of the estate of Brown.

The judgment is reversed.

ESCONDIDO MUTUAL WATER CO. v.
CITY OF ESCONDIDO.
(L. A. 3446.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐200—
PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—MUTUAL IRRIGATION COMPANY.

A mutual irrigation company, which never voluntarily furnished water to a city or its inhabitants except the proportionate share to which it was entitled by virtue of its ownership of stock in the corporation, did not assume the public duty of supplying water to the city for municipal purposes, so as to be required to continue to perform that duty in accordance with the needs of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇐200.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐200—
PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—MUTUAL IRRIGATION COMPANY.

A mutual irrigation company, which acquired, with the consent of a city, from a water works company, the right to the water which that company had formerly used to supply the city, and which thereafter was devoted to the purposes of the irrigation company, did not thereby take upon itself the duty of supplying the city with water, since the right of the city to the continued use of the water was abandoned by its consent to the transfer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇐200.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐200—MUTUAL IRRIGATION COMPANY — CITY AS STOCKHOLDER.

Where a city purchased stock in a mutual irrigation company which had bought the water rights of a waterworks company which previously furnished water to the city, it thereby contracted that it was entitled to receive only the amount of water represented by its stock, and it cannot claim that the company was bound to continue to supply it with sufficient water for its needs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇐200.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐200—MUTUAL IRRIGATION COMPANY — CITY AS STOCKHOLDER—ULTRA VIRES PURCHASE.

If the purchase of the stock was ultra vires, that would not entitle the city to demand a continuance of the former service, but would only show that it was not entitled to receive any water.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by the Escondido Mutual Water Company against the City of Escondido. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Thompson, of Escondido, and J. C. Hizar, of San Diego, for appellant. Wright & Winnek, of San Diego, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff pleaded that it is a mutual water company, organized under the laws of the state of California; that the defendant, at the time of plaintiff's organization, subscribed for, purchased, and ever since has been the owner of a given number of shares of its capital stock; that, by virtue of the law of its creation and by virtue of its by-laws, it was plaintiff's duty to apportion the water which it controlled and allot it to its stockholders in the proportion which their shares of stock bore to the total issued stock of the company; that it so did and notified defendant of the amount of water to which the latter would be entitled for the year beginning on the 1st day of May, 1911; that by August, 1911, the defendant had used and consumed all of the water which it was entitled to receive from plaintiff; that plaintiff notified defendant of this fact, and further informed defendant that it was entitled to receive no more water unless it secured the right to additional water by the purchase of additional stock. Defendant refused to consider this suggestion, and plaintiff caused defendant's supply of water to be shut off. Whereupon defendant, through its town marshal, turned on the supply and continued to use additional water, in violation of the law and of the rights of plaintiff. Plaintiff, as a mutual water company, secures, impounds, and distributes water to its stockholders ratably and at cost. By the law of its creation it is not a corporation organized for profit, and this illegal and unwarranted taking by defendant of plaintiff's water is to the great injury of plaintiff's other stockholders, the trustee for all of whom plaintiff is. Plaintiff prayed for an injunction to restrain these illegal acts. The complaint was verified. Defendant answered by denial. It admitted and pleaded that it did own the shares of stock of plaintiff which plaintiff asserted that it owned, but denied that it owned them in any other way "except as a mere incident to the land held by said city for public purposes, and that said stock is appurtenant to the land, so held by the city of Escondido." Affirmatively it alleged:

"That the Land & Town Company of Escondido constructed the water system in the city of Escondido. That thereafter the Escondido irrigation district purchased said system, and that said Escondido irrigation district purchased water and constructed a reservoir, all of which water was held in trust for distribution in the district of which the city of Escondido is a part. That said water so impounded was sold to the inhabitants of said district. That thereafter the plaintiff became the purchaser of the holdings of the Escondido irrigation district. That said water so obtained by plaintiff is subject to all of the conditions impressed by the laws of the state of California thereon. That the said plaintiff has continued to furnish water to numerous parties in the city of Escondido in the same manner in which the same was furnished and under all of the conditions as the same was furnished by the Escondido irrigation district. That the city of Escondido, exercising its functions as a municipal corporation, constructed a sewer system. That after said sewer system was constructed said city applied to the plaintiff for water to flush said sewer system. That thereupon the said plaintiff connected said sewer system with the pipes of plaintiff and has continued ever since to furnish water to plaintiff for said sewer system. That as compensation for said water so furnished by plaintiff the city of Escondido has paid all bills presented by said water company for such water so furnished, and the bills for such service have been presented since the filing of this suit and paid by the city of Escondido to the 30th day of November, 1911. That the city of Escondido owns no shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation in connection with said sewer system, or in any manner connected therewith. That the city of Escondido does own certain shares of stock in the plaintiff corporation which were delivered to the city of Escondido in connection with certain real estate owned by said city, and not otherwise."

The court found all of the allegations of the complaint true. Touching the affirmative defense of defendant it found:

"That plaintiff did, during the year 189-, acquire the reservoir and distributing system now owned by it from the Escondido irrigation district. That at all times prior to the transfer of said reservoir and distributing system to the Escondido Mutual Water Company the said Escondido irrigation district was engaged in the diversion, storing, and distribution of water as an irrigation district under the laws of the state of California, and was at no time engaged in the diversion, collection, storing, and distribution of water as a public service corporation; that, at all times since the organization of the Escondido Mutual Water Company and the transfer to it of the reservoir and distributing system referred to in said complaint and answer, said Mutual Water Company has diverted, stored, and distributed water to the city of Escondido and its inhabitants under its by-laws, rules, and regulations, for cost only and not for profit. That the said city of Escondido, defendant herein, has not purchased water from the plaintiff for its sewer system, and that said defendant, the city of Escondido, has used only the water which was apportioned to it by the Escondido Mutual Water Company, by the resolution referred to in its complaint, making the annual apportionment of water for the year 1911 and ending April 30, 1912, and such additional water as said defendant took from plaintiff's system without plaintiff's consent."

In addition to these findings, it was stipulated:

"That in 1886 the Escondido Land & Town Company laid certain pipes in the city of Escondido, or the then town of Escondido, and that through that pipe line, or pipe lines, it supplied water to the inhabitants of the town from wells located near the city. That some years later, to wit, about the year 1895, the Escondido irrigation system was organized under what was then known as the Wright Irrigation Act, now known as the Bridgeford Act, and that subsequent to its organization it took over the wells and pipe line that had been laid by the Land & Town Company. That the Escondido irrigation district filed upon and appropriated and diverted and impounded water from the San Luis Rey river and distributed water to the inhabitants of the Escondido irrigation district through its aqueducts and from its reservoir located about six miles from the city of Escondido until the year 1905. That during that year, under proceedings brought by the Escondido irrigation district, under the act of 1903, known as an act to provide for the dissolution of irrigation districts, the Escondido irrigation district was dissolved by a decree of court, from which no appeal was taken. That the Escondido Mutual Water Company was formed the same year by authority of the same act, being the act of the Legislature providing for the dissolution of irrigation districts, passed in the year 1903, for the express purpose of taking over the franchises, distributing system, and all of the assets of the Escondido irrigation district. That a sale was made by the Escondido irrigation district of its franchises and all its assets, including the distributing system, and all the pipe line which has been constructed by the Land & Town Company, to the Escondido Mutual Water Company. That that sale was approved by the court, and thereafter the distributing system, franchises, and all of the property became the property of the Escondido Mutual Water Company. The city of Escondido was part of the Escondido irrigation district and is now within the territory supplied with water by the Escondido Mutual Water Company."

[1] Appellant's primary and principal contention is that respondent is charged with the public duty of supplying to appellant such water as it may require for municipal purposes. In short, that respondent is a corporation which has undertaken to perform this particular character of public service and may be compelled to continue to do so in accordance with the needs of the municipality up to the capacity of respondent's ability to supply water. Under this general head, appellant's argument is twofold, one branch of it being that plaintiff has voluntarily undertaken the duty of furnishing defendant with water for its inhabitants and for municipal purposes, such as the flushing of its sewers, and having engaged in this public enterprise, under familiar principles, will be compelled to continue in the performance of the duty so long as it controls the water supply devoted to that use. This contention, however, may be disposed of by a brief reference to the findings, which are abundantly supported and which establish that the only water which the plaintiff ever voluntarily furnished to defendant was the proportionate share of water to which it was entitled by virtue of its relationship to plaintiff as one of its stockholders, and that all excess of water which defendant may have received was taken from plaintiff by defendant by force and against plaintiff's protest. Certainly no such right as that contended for can arise under this state of facts.

[2] The second branch of the argument is to the effect that as the Escondido Land & Town Company had laid certain pipes through which the water was carried for the supplying of the inhabitants of the town of Escondido, and as by mesne conveyance the plaintiff has acquired the water rights, franchise, pipes, and pipe line of this company, this acquisition was subject always to the public use impressed upon these properties and franchises of the Escondido Land & Town Company. Or, in other words, that it became the continuing duty of the Escondido irrigation district, which first acquired these properties, and so in turn plaintiff's, which acquired the properties of the Escondido irrigation system, to perform the public service which the Escondido Land & Town Company had taken upon itself to discharge. Here, again, it may be pointed out that the findings negative this argument, for it is distinctly found that the Escondido irrigation district "was at no time engaged in the diversion, collection, storing, and distribution of water as a public service corporation," and that it stored and distributed water to the inhabitants and landowners in accordance with the law governing the use of waters controlled by such irrigation district.

It would be sufficient here to point out that a public use in waters may cease and determine, and that this may be accomplished by consent of all parties in interest, or by operation of law. It is to be borne in mind that it is only the use of water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution which is a public use under the constitution (article 14, § 1), and while it is true that when any water has been so devoted to a public use, the public, and each individual member thereof as a part of the public, has a right to the continued use of that water, so that the use may not be changed to the injury of those entitled to rely upon its continuance, and, if abandoned by the purveyors of the use, may be taken over to the end that the use may be continued, it by no means follows, as said in Fellows v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 52, 90 Pac. 137, that the public use impressed upon any particular water supply may not be abandoned. A simple illustration will make clear our meaning. A man has developed water from wells and springs upon his own land and has devoted that water to the public service of a nearby town. He is using the water for rental, distribution, and sale. He has impressed it with this public use. Should he undertake to sell his supply, the purchaser would buy it with the burden of this use attached. Should he sell his lands, the purchaser of the lands, if he acquired the water by that purchase, would take them under the same burden. But the time comes when the municipality acquires a separate and independent supply, and itself engages in the business of furnishing its inhabitants as well as itself with water. It and its inhabitants absolutely discontinue the use of the other supply. The owner or controller of it finds that he can no longer dispose of it by rental, distribution and sale. Can it be doubted that he is entitled to apply this water to beneficial purposes upon his own land, and that the public use, with which theretofore it had been impressed, has absolutely ceased? So in this case, while there is no direct finding upon the question, every inference to be drawn from the findings made is that there was such or a similar abandonment upon the part of the town of Escondido of the right to such water as the Escondido Land & Town Company had been supplying. This inference, we say, necessarily follows from the specific finding that the irrigation district was at no time engaged in the distribution of water as a public service corporation. And this finding, coupled with the evidentiary fact that the Escondido Land & Town Company secured water from wells and that the wells for years had been abandoned, confirms the view we have just stated.

[3] But it is not necessary even to go so far. It certainly is manifest from the findings that the city of Escondido and the Escondido Mutual Water Company entered into a contractual adjustment of the matter, which adjustment was evidenced by the city becoming a stockholder of the plaintiff; that the result of this was that the city agreed to take water from the plaintiff under the mutual plan, by which plan alone the plaintiff could legally furnish water. The quantum of water to which it was entitled was governed by the law of plaintiff's creation and by the by-laws under that law which it had adopted. It is idle for appellant to contend that because it had been receiving water under this arrangement plaintiff had dedicated to defendant's use all of the water which defendant's growing needs might require, to the last drop which it might be able to impound.

[4] Equally futile is appellant's argument that its acquisition of this water stock for the indicated purposes was ultra vires. Appellant uses this argument in an effort to show that, as it had no right to acquire the stock, so it had no right to take the water as a stockholder, and therefore it was taking the water for public service and the water was impressed with the public use. But the logical conclusion, if force is to be given to appellant's argument that the acquisition of this stock was ultra vires and void, is that plaintiff is under no legal compulsion to supply defendant with any water whatsoever—a logical and legal result far from that which defendant seeks.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

PRICE v. OCCIDENTAL LIFE INS. CO.

(Sac. 2116.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1915.)

1. INSURANCE — 646 — ACTIONS ON POLICIES — BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action on a policy insuring against bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, plaintiff was bound to allege and prove, as a part of her case, that the death of insured resulted from accident, and it was not incumbent on defendant to negative accident, as it was not relying upon any exception, forfeiture, breach of warranty, or other affirmative ground of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555, 1645-1668; Dec. Dig. — 646.]

2. TRIAL — 404 — FINDINGS — FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS.

In an action on a policy insuring against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, a finding that insured's death did not result from accidental causes was one of fact and not a mere conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 957-962; Dec. Dig. — 404.]

3. TRIAL — 404 — FINDINGS — INCONSISTENCY — CONSTRUCTION.

The findings of the trial court must be liberally construed in support of the judgment and reconciled, if possible, so as to prevent conflict upon material points, and if, without transgressing the bounds of fairness and reason, any state of facts is conceivable upon which all of the findings would be true, it must be assumed that such state of facts was shown; the evidence not being before the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 957-962; Dec. Dig. — 404.]

4. INSURANCE — 449 — ACCIDENT INSURANCE — CONSTRUCTION — "ACCIDENT."

An "accident," within a policy insuring against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, is a casualty, something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly and without any design on the part of the person injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1162; Dec. Dig. — 449.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accident.]

5. TRIAL — 398 — FINDINGS — INCONSISTENCY — CONSTRUCTION.

While the fact that a person insured against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means was killed by a bullet from a firearm, discharged by another person, would, standing alone, justify, if not require, the inference that the killing was accidental, this inference might be overcome by other evidence, since if the killing was the result of an encounter with deadly weapons, and if insured himself invited and brought on such conflict, the death would not be accidental; and hence findings that insured was killed by a bullet from a revolver discharged by another person, and that his death did not result from accidental causes, were not in irreconcilable conflict and supported a judgment for the insurance company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 946, 947; Dec. Dig. — 398.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Agnes M. Price against the Occidental Life Insurance Company. Judgment, for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action on a policy of accident insurance. The evidence is not before us, and we are called upon to determine the one question, whether the findings of fact support the judgment.

By the policy, William A. Price, the husband of plaintiff, was insured in the principal sum of $2,500, "against bodily injuries not intentionally self-inflicted, sustained by the insured while sane, and effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent, and accidental means (suicide, sane or insane, not included)." The policy was made payable, in case of death, to the plaintiff.

The complaint set up a cause of action based on the death of Price. The findings which raise the question to be decided are as follows:

"That on the 5th day of July, 1910, * * * said William A. Price * * * sustained bodily injuries from a bullet then and there striking and entering his body, from a revolver then and there discharged by the hands of one Frank Kates, by reason whereof the said William A. Price then and there died. The court finds that the death of the said William A. Price did not result directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means. That the death of said William A. Price did not result from accidental causes."

The contention of the appellant is that the specific findings regarding the cause and manner of Price's death conclusively establish that the death resulted from violent, external, and accidental means. The further finding that death did not result from accidental means is asserted to be a mere conclusion, and a conclusion at variance with the specific facts found.

[1, 2] The plaintiff was bound to establish, as a part of her case, that death resulted from accident. It was not incumbent on the defendant to negative accident. The insuring company was not relying upon any exception, forfeiture, breach of warranty, or other affirmative ground of defense. The contract was one which insured against death resulting from injuries "effected directly * * * through external, violent, and accidental means." In order to recover, the plaintiff was bound to allege and prove an injury of the kind covered by the contract; i. e., one effected through external, violent, and accidental means. 1 Cyc. 289; Carnes v. Iowa State Ass'n, 106 Iowa, 281, 76 N. W. 683, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306; Nat. Mas. Ass'n v. Shryock, 73 Fed. 775, 20 C. C. A. 3; Jenkins v. Pac. Mut. L. Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac.

180. Whether or not Price's death resulted from accidental means was a material issue presented by the pleadings, and the finding on this issue was one of fact.

[3-5] The findings made by the trial court must, under our settled rule, be given a liberal construction in support of the judgment, and are, if possible, to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict upon material points. Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005; Murray v. Tulare Irr. Co., 120 Cal. 311, 49 Pac. 563, 52 Pac. 586; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309; Peo. H. Sav. Bk. v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858. If we can, without transgressing the bounds of fairness and reason, conceive of any state of facts upon which all of the findings would be true, we are bound to assume that this state of facts was shown. The term "accident" is defined in Richards v. Trav. Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 170, 26 Pac. 762, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, as "a casualty—something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly, and without any design on the part of the person injured." The fact that the insured was killed by a bullet from a firearm discharged by another person would, standing alone, justify, if not require, the inference that the killing was, as to the insured, accidental. Jenkin v. Mut. L. Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac. 180. But this is an inference which may be overcome by other evidence. If it should appear that the killing had been the result of an encounter with deadly weapons, and that the deceased had himself invited and brought on such conflict, the fatal result would not have been accidental, so far as he was concerned. A situation of this kind was presented in Taliaferro v. Trav. Prot. Ass'n, 80 Fed. 368, 25 C. C. A. 494. There the court, in upholding a directed verdict in favor of the insurance company, said:

"Where a person thus invites another to a deadly encounter, and does so voluntarily, his death, if he sustains a mortal wound, cannot be regarded as accidental, by any definition of that term which has heretofore been adopted. It might as well be claimed that death is accidental when a man intentionally throws himself across a railroad track in front of an approaching train, or leaps from a high precipice, or swallows a deadly poison. It is possible that death may not result from either of these acts, but death is the result which would naturally be expected, and, if such is the result, it is not accidental."

The case is directly in point, and we think its reasoning is convincing. Lovelace v. Trav. Prot. Ass'n, 126 Mo. 104, 28 S. W. 877, 30 L. R. A. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638, relied on by appellant, is not in conflict. There the deceased had engaged in a quarrel, in the course of which he was killed, but it did not appear that he drew a weapon, or that he knew his opponent was armed. It was very properly held that the killing was "accidental," because the circumstances did not show that the insured "voluntarily assumed the risk of death." Here, however, in the absence of the evidence produced below, we must take the facts to be that Price did voluntarily assume the risk of death. If he did, the findings are reconcilable, and support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Black & Clark, of San Francisco, for appellant. Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action (quo warranto) instituted by the people of the state of California upon the relation of appellants, the relators alone are attempting to appeal from a judgment for defendant given upon sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. The notice of appeal states that they take the appeal "because they are parties in interest and because the Attorney General declines to take an appeal in the name of the state." Under our law such an action may be brought and maintained only by the Attorney General in the name of the people of the state, and the relators are not "parties" to the action. An attempt to appeal by them alone is necessarily ineffectual for any purpose.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

Where plaintiff accused defendants, as factors charged with the sale of goods, with acting in bad faith, and on being threatened with suit, based on their action in the matter, an adjustment of the controversy was had, whereby defendants bought the goods and gave a note for the price, title to the goods passed to defendants on the giving of the note, which was supported by sufficient consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by Mariano Randisi against V. B. Simone and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

MacGowen & Haas, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Joseph Smith and Carroll E. King, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover upon a promissory note made and delivered to plaintiff by defendants. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal upon the judgment roll.

The note was given in renewal of a prior note made to plaintiff by defendants, which note, as appears from the findings, was given under circumstances as follows: Some months before the making thereof, plaintiff and defendants agreed that the former should, in June, 1911, ship, consigned to the latter in New York City, a car load of wine, which plaintiff then had in the city of Los Angeles, and which defendants would sell; it being agreed that as compensation for their service in effecting such sale they should retain all the proceeds thereof in excess of $13 per barrel; that by reason of the wine being of an inferior quality defendants were unable to readily sell the same; that thereupon defendants paid the shipping charges and stored the wine, and two months later, on their return to Los Angeles, informed plaintiff of their inability to make the sale and of the fact that they had stored the same. Thereupon plaintiff charged them with bad faith and threatened them with a suit, but stated "that, if they would sign a note for $900, he would make for them within three months thereafter $3,000"; "that thereupon said defendants signed a note for $900, dated September 11, 1911, due one year after date, and delivered the same to said plaintiff; that said oral promise was made in September, 1911, and that the said note so dated September 11, 1911, was so given partly in reliance of this promise, partly to avoid a suit, and partly as a bond of security for the car load of wine which then stood in defendants' name in New York City; that thereafter, in December of 1911, defendants sold said wine so stored in New York City for an amount hardly sufficient to pay costs of shipping and storage of the same; and that said plaintiff never has made for said defendants the said sum of $3,000 in accordance with said promise."

[1, 2] Appellants attack the findings, insisting that they do not support the judgment. It is a rule of construction that findings will be so construed as to uphold, rather than to defeat, the judgment; and when, from facts found by the court, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court. The compromise of a doubtful claim asserted in good faith constitutes a sufficient consideration for a new promise. Whether or not defendants' conduct with reference to and the handling of the wine had been such as to justify plaintiff, in good faith, in believing he had a cause of action against them, is not specifically found. Since, however, plaintiff did assert a claim upon which he threatened to sue them, which, if made in good faith, the surrender thereof would constitute a sufficient consideration for the note, such finding will be deemed implied.

[3] It is immaterial that other matters than the compromise of this claim may have entered into the consideration for the giving of the note. "The law does not weigh the quantum of the consideration." Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 389, 64 Pac. 560. Construing the findings, as we must, most favorably in support of the judgment, it appears therefrom that the plaintiff accused defendants, as factors charged with the sale of the wine, with acting in bad faith, and upon being threatened with suit based upon their action in the matter, an adjustment of the controversy was had, whereby defendants bought the wine, for the purchase price of which they gave their note for $900. This view is borne out by the fact that, in December following the date of the original note, they sold the wine without regard to the price fixed therefor by plaintiff in the original contract, and made no accounting to him of the proceeds. We think it sufficiently appears from the findings that upon the giving of the note the title to the wine passed to defendants, who thereafter disposed of it as their own; neither plaintiff asserting nor defendants recognizing in him any right or interest therein.

So far as concerns the promise of plaintiff to make $3,000 within three months for defendants, it is to be noted that when they gave their renewal note the time had long since passed for the performance of such promise, and it may well be claimed that, if defendants relied upon such unfulfilled promise as a defense to the note, they should have asserted such claim when called upon to renew the original note; otherwise be deemed to have waived it.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TRAICHOFF. (Cr. 566.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 26, 1915.)

1. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 282 — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PREMEDITATION.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to take to the jury the question whether the defendant acted with premeditation, so as to be guilty of murder in the first degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 282.]

2. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 22—FIRST DEGREE MURDER—PREMEDITATION.

For a homicide to be premeditated, so as to be first degree murder, there need be no appreciable time between the intent to kill and the killing, if the act be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Chris. Traichoff was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry B. Lister and D. J. Fitzsimmons, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and F. L. Guarena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder and convicted of murder in the first degree, with recommendation of life imprisonment, and sentenced accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order of the court denying the defendant's motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial.

[1] Defendant concedes that the evidence in the case shows that the defendant killed the deceased without sufficient provocation and with malice, but claims that there was no evidence to show premeditation, and hence asserts that a verdict of murder in the second degree is all that the evidence in this case will support.

The deceased was a married woman, whom defendant had met a short time prior to the homicide in Portland, Or., from whence he brought her to San Francisco, where they lived together until he shot her. One of the witnesses testified that the defendant stated to him that the reason he shot the deceased was that she was going to leave him; that he had spent about $700 on her; and that she had left him before. A friend of the couple, who was visiting them just prior to the shooting, stated that they had had a quarrel over the defendant's refusal to get the deceased some needles; that the deceased swore at the defendant, stating that she was going to leave him, and proceeded to pack her trunk, whereupon the defendant said that he would leave, too, opened his suit case, and took out a revolver, whereupon the witness left the room. Just as he was closing the door he heard a shot. The autopsy surgeon testified that six bullets had been fired into the body of the deceased.

[2] There need be no appreciable space of time between the intent to kill and the act of killing. It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer; and, if such is the case, the killing is murder in the first degree (People v. Williams, 43 Cal. 344; People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 585; People v. Cotta, 49 Cal. 166; People v. Jamarillo, 57 Cal. 111); and the question of whether or not the defendant in this case acted with deliberation or premeditation in the act of killing was, under the circumstances just narrated, clearly a question of fact for the jury.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by R. E. Muncy against William Thompson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stahl & Sayles, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft and S. W. Odell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action by a real estate broker to recover commissions for negotiating a sale by exchange of defendant's real estate. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff.

It appears that defendant, by written instrument, expressed a desire to make an exchange of certain real estate therein described and owned by him for certain property owned by one L. H. Webb; the terms and conditions of the exchange proposed being set forth in said writing, which further contained the following provisions:

"R. E. Muncy is hereby authorized to act as my agent in negotiating an exchange, and I agree that if I shall secure an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above-described property on the above terms. * * * And it is further agreed with said R. E. Muncy that when he has secured an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above-described property on the above terms, will then pay the sum of commissions as per verbal agreement, ... dollars, as commissions for such services. * * * [Signed] Wm. Thompson."

Plaintiff procured Webb's acceptance, and, with some slight modification of the contract made by the parties thereto, the exchange was consummated.

[1] The written instrument, construed according to the plain import of its language, clearly shows that defendant authorized plaintiff to negotiate the exchange. The authorization being in writing, the fact that it did not specify the commission to be paid for the service rendered did not subject it to the objection that it was void under the provisions of subdivision 6, § 1624, Civil Code. In the absence of any agreement as to commission, the agent, if authorized in writing to negotiate a sale of real estate, is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services. Here it was agreed that plaintiff should receive the commission as per verbal agreement, which verbal agreement was clearly and properly established by parol evidence.

[2] In his answer defendant alleged that his signature to the instrument was procured by means of fraud and misrepresentations of plaintiff. The court, upon abundant evidence, found these allegations to be untrue; indeed, the only evidence in support of the allegations is that of defendant, who testified that he signed the instrument when he did not have his eyeglasses with him and did not know whether or not it contained the provision as to the payment of commissions. The document was presented to him by plaintiff, who, so far as shown, made no representations whatever as to its contents, and defendant makes no claim that he was unable to read without glasses. At most, his evidence merely shows his own negligence in signing a contract without first acquainting himself with its terms and conditions. Such fact does not entitle him to set aside a contract upon the grounds of fraud and misrepresentation.

The appeal is wholly without merit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

1. JUDGMENT ⇨143 — DISCRETION OF THE COURT — SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the court, on application therefor within a reasonable time, to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through inadvertence or excusable neglect, the superior court's denial of defendant's motion to vacate a default judgment against him, on conflicting evidence as to his illness when served with the summons and complaint, which judgment was not entered until four days after the time to plead had elapsed, and which motion was not filed until six days after defendant's notice of the default, was not an abuse of its discretion.

2. PLEADING ⇨46 — DESIGNATION AND DESCRIPTION OF PARTIES—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, in which the caption of the complaint described plaintiffs as husband and wife, such designation was merely descriptio personae, and, in the absence of a demurrer, the reference to them in the complaint as "the above-named plaintiffs" made the caption part of the complaint proper, so that it was not defective for want of allegation that the plaintiffs were married.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Morton and wife against W. W. Shannon. Judgment for plaintiffs, by default, and, from an order denying his motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Wm. Hoff Cook and Charles Stewart, both of San Francisco, for appellant. C. A. Henning, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM, This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside a default judgment entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and also from the judgment itself.

The complaint states a cause of action in the form of a common count for certain goods sold and delivered, alleging a reasonable value of $501.25, and prays for interest and costs of suit.

[1] As to whether or not a default should be set aside upon motion made under the terms of section 473 is a matter that rests so largely in the discretion of the trial court that its action in such a proceeding will not be disturbed on appeal unless it shall be made clearly to appear that there was an abuse of discretion. True it is that the Supreme Court of this state has said, by way of advice to trial courts, that their discretion is better exercised when it tends to bring about a decision of the cause upon its merits; still the rule itself as just announced has never been relaxed. To repeat:

"Unless the record clearly shows that the trial court has abused its discretion, its order, whether it be to grant or deny the application, will be affirmed." Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165; Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 78 Pac. 878.

Testing the record on this appeal by the rule announced, we are constrained to hold that the order of the trial court must be affirmed.

According to one of the affidavits filed on behalf of the appellant, he was sick on the 3d day of October, 1913, the day he was served with a copy of the summons and complaint; and he was delirious and out of his mind from that date until the 17th day of the same month, the day on which his default was entered. This affidavit was not corroborated by the affidavit of a physician, or by any one, except the defendant's brother, who says that on the 16th day of October the defendant appeared to be in a dazed condition of mind. In an affidavit of the process server, a disinterested party, he averred that the defendant was not ill on the day he was served with summons and complaint, and that he appeared to be in a normal condition of mind. The trial court must have accepted this testimony of the process server as true, in which event he must have withheld credence from the affidavit filed on behalf of the defendant just referred to.

This is not a case of "snap judgment," as suggested by appellant, for his default was not taken until four days after the time to plead had elapsed, and it was several days after that, and six days according to his own version of the matter, after he had knowledge of the default, before notice of motion to vacate the same was served and filed, so that his own conduct in the premises seems to lend weight to the averment by the process server that the defendant, when served with summons, stated that he would do nothing, meaning perhaps, as plaintiff argues, that defendant intended to suffer a default to be taken against him, for at no time did he dispute receiving the goods, and he now raises a defense which although, in view of the object of the statute under which such defense is made, may be considered meritorious, is still largely technical in character.

[2] As to the appeal from the judgment, the appellant asserts that the judgment is not sustained by the judgment roll, for the reason that while the caption of the complaint states the plaintiffs as Frank H. Morton and Margaret Morton, husband and wife, there is no allegation in the complaint itself that the plaintiffs are married. A case can easily be imagined where an allegation of marriage would be necessary; but this is not one of that character of cases where any rights arising by reason of the marriage relation are involved. The plaintiffs both sue and are described in the caption as being husband and wife; and in a case of this kind the words are purely descriptio personæ. Wright v. Burroughs, 61 Vt. 390, 18 Atl. 311; Chicago Clock Co. v. Tobin, 123 Cal. 377, 55 Pac. 1007; Fallon v. Brittan, 84 Cal. 511, 24 Pac. 381; Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 75 Pac. 174. Aside from this, however, the body of the complaint referred to the plaintiffs as "the above-named plaintiffs," and, in the absence of a demurrer, we think this reference was sufficient to make the caption part of the complaint proper.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SABIN v. SMITH. (Civ. 1451.)

(District Court of Appeal. First District, California. Feb. 27, 1915.)

1. ANIMALS ⇐96 — KILLING TRESPASSING ANIMALS—DOG WORRYING CHICKENS.

In Civ. Code, § 3341, making the owner of any dog that shall kill or worry any sheep, goat, or poultry liable in damages, subdivision 2 of which provides that any person who finds any dog, not on the premises of its owner, worrying or killing sheep or goats may kill the dog without liability to its owner, the second subdivision authorizes any one not the owner of sheep to kill the dog as a public nuisance and does not by exclusion take from the owner of poultry his common-law right to defend them against the attack of a dog in their own inclosure, to the extent of killing the dog if necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 375-379; Dec. Dig. ⇐96.]

2. ANIMALS ⇐1 — NATURE OF PROPERTY — DOGS.

At common law, dogs, if not the subject of larceny, were property for many other purposes; and while modern law has recognized greater property rights in dogs it still treats them with less regard than more useful and less dangerous animals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-4; Dec. Dig. ⇐1.]

3. ANIMALS ⇐96 — KILLING TRESPASSING ANIMALS—RELATIVE VALUE.

The fact that a dog which was worrying chickens in their own inclosure was pedigreed and worth more than the chickens does not make the owner of the chickens liable for the killing of the dog, especially where it was not shown how many chickens there were in the inclosure that the dog might attack nor that the owner of the chickens knew that the dog was pedigreed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Irene Sabin against S. M. Smith. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Schwartz & Powell, of Oakland, for appellant. Rogers, Bloomingdale & Free, of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The plaintiff was the owner of a Russian wolfhound which was killed by the defendant. This action was brought to recover the sum of $350, the alleged value of the hound, and for the further sum of $1,000 as exemplary damages.

It is the claim of the plaintiff that the killing was wrongful, unlawful, and malicious. Defendant, answering, denies that his act was malicious, and alleged that the hound in question was one of a pack of savage and ferocious dogs which was a common and a public nuisance, and at the time of the killing the said pack had trespassed upon the defendant's premises, entered an inclosure set apart for his poultry, and chased and worried such poultry; that the said dogs were driven away, but shortly thereafter the dog mentioned in the complaint and another member of the pack returned, and renewed their attack upon the defendant's poultry, pulling the feathers therefrom and mutilating one of the chickens so that it had to be killed; that thereupon the defendant, in order to protect his poultry, shot at said dogs to drive them away and prevent further depredations upon his flock, and in so doing killed one of the dogs.

The evidence without conflict supports the defendant's contention, and the trial court found that under these circumstances the defendant was justified in killing said dog, and accordingly gave judgment in his favor.

Plaintiff does not deny the truth of the evidence presented by the defendant, but insists that such facts do not constitute a defense to her action, and assigns the rulings of the trial court in the admission of this testimony as error requiring a reversal of the judgment. It is her contention that section 3341 of the Civil Code is in itself conclusive upon the subject; and that the obvious intention of the Legislature, as revealed by the language of the act, was to omit poultry in the enumeration of animals for the worrying, wounding, or killing of which a dog might be killed, and to confine the owner of such poultry to the more tardy action for damages at law.

[1] The section invoked by the plaintiff reads as follows:

"The owner, possessor, or harbinger of any dog or other animal, that shall kill, worry, or wound any sheep, angora goat, or cashmere goat, or poultry, shall be liable to the owner of the same for the damages and costs of suit, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction:

"1. In the prosecution of actions under the provisions of this chapter, it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to show that the owner, possessor, or harbinger of such dog or other animal, had knowledge of the fact that such dog or other animal would kill, wound or worry sheep, goats, or poultry.

"2. Any person on finding any dog or dogs, or other animal, not on the premises of the owner or possessor of such dog or dogs, or other animal, worrying, wounding, or killing any sheep, angora or cashmere goats, may, at the time of finding such dog or dogs, or other animal, kill the same, and the owner or owners thereof shall sustain no action for damages against any person so killing such dog or dogs, or other animal."

In support of her contention, it is the claim of the plaintiff that the Legislature, by specifying in the second subdivision of the section the words "sheep, angora and cashmere goats," intended to and did thereby exclude poultry from the enumeration of animals for the worrying or killing of which a dog might be destroyed.

This contention cannot be maintained. The first subdivision of the section providing for the prosecution of actions simply dispenses with the proof of knowledge on the part of the owner of the vicious habits of his animal, a burden that was imposed in a certain character of actions against such owners at the common law. The second subdivision authorizes any person to destroy as a public nuisance any dog found in any place outside the premises of the owner, worrying or killing sheep or goats, whether such sheep or goats belonged to the person killing the dog or not—a right that did not exist at the common law. The natural right has always existed in one to defend his fowls upon his own premises from the attack of trespassing dogs. 2 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 702. There is nothing contained in either of the subdivisions of the statute which in any way limits or takes away this right. The section was not intended to, nor does it, abridge the common-law right of a person to defend his domestic animals against the attacks of dogs, or to kill such dogs when the circumstances warrant the belief that his property is in peril. At the common law the justification for the killing was complete when it appeared that the dog was engaged in worrying and terrifying domestic animals in their own lawful inclosure, and where the necessity of the killing in order to protect the property was apparent.

[2] The argument of counsel that dogs were not property at the common law and were afforded small consideration, and that the legislation here invoked was enacted for their further protection, is without merit. While the status of the dog before the law is sui generis, and in the early common law the property in them was of an imperfect and peculiar character, still they were considered property for many purposes. True they were not the subject of larceny; but this was for the reason that such crime was punishable by death, and it was not considered proper that a man should die for the larceny of a dog. Except in the case of larceny a dog was property at the common law, and the owner had his remedy by civil action for an injury to or loss or destruction of the same. See the exhaustive note on property in dogs in Hamby v. Samson, 67 Am. St. Rep. 285.

In some states attempts have been made to recognize a full and complete property in dogs; but in those jurisdictions the reasons given for such recognition are more or less sentimental. From earliest childhood we have listened to the tales of the faithfulness of dogs as portrayed in fable and song, and their fidelity has ever made them the constant companions of men. Nor are we wanting in champions for their defense among our brother judges, for we see them referred to as being responsible for the changing of modern history, and the preservers of exhausted travelers caught in the storms which sweep over the crests and sides of the Alps. Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365. Again we find Wilkes, J., in Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, 100 Tenn. 318, 45 S. W. 790, 40 L. R. A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754, describing them as "the negro's associate, and often his only property, the poor man's friend and the rich man's companion, the protection of women and children, hearthstones, and hen-roosts."

While not attempting to detract nor in any manner minimize the loyal traits possessed by this favorite animal, it remains the fact that although under our modern law the owner of a dog has a property in it not recognized by the common law, still by the American courts the dog is held to less legal regard and protection than more harmless and useful domestic animals, and is subject to a more strict control and regulation as to the mode of its keeping and use. Persons engaged in the raising of sheep or goats are especially subject to loss from the predatory and wolfish instincts of dogs; and for this reason statutes for their special protection similar to our own have been enacted in most of the states regulating this nuisance under the exercise of the police power. Most of these states have seen proper to place all sheep-killing dogs in the category of public nuisances, which the owner of sheep may abate summarily. Those statutes however are not intended to abridge the common law, but rather to extend the right to destroy an animal for the protection of property. The Code section above referred to does not confer upon the owner of sheep or fowls any power to kill a dog that such owner did not possess at common law, nor does it in any manner abridge his right. On the contrary, the section expressly provides cumulative remedies that did not ordinarily generally exist. By providing for such cumulative remedies with reference to sheep, the statute cannot be said to deprive the owner of fowls of the right to destroy a dog that is engaged in worrying and killing them while in their own lawful inclosure, and where the necessity for the killing is apparent, in order to protect such fowls.

[3] The claim that the dog killed was possessed of a pedigree and had a greater relative value than the fowls injured, and that therefore the killing was unwarranted, is without merit. The right to kill a dog found trespassing and endangering property is not affected by the relative value of the dog and the property being injured. Simmonds v. Holmes, 61 Conn. 1, 23 Atl. 702, 15 L. R. A. 253. Besides, it does not appear from the record that the defendant knew that the hound was possessed of a pedigree, nor does it show the number of chickens owned by defendant and subjected to the dog's ferocity. It can hardly be contended that the defendant was bound to stand by and mentally calculate the value of the chickens destroyed, and await action until such value approximately equaled that of the dog.

For the reasons indicated the judgment and order are affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 159 — OFFICERS—RECALL—PETITION—NUMBER OF SIGNATURES — "LAST PRECEDING MUNICIPAL ELECTION."

Under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128, providing that a petition for the recall of municipal officers shall be signed by voters equal in number to one-fourth of the votes cast for all candidates for the office which the incumbent sought to be removed occupies at the "last preceding municipal election" at which such officer was voted for, the election to be considered in determining the number of petitioners for recall of certain trustees is the last regular municipal election at which the officers sought to be recalled were voted for, not a subsequent election at which other trustees were voted for.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 159 — OFFICERS—RECALL—PETITION—NUMBER OF SIGNATURES.

The percentage of voters to determine whether such petition has the required number of signatures is to be computed on the total number of ballots cast at the election, not on the basis of the total number of votes cast for all candidates for trustees, where there were three trustees to be elected, and the voters could vote for three, two, or one of such candidates.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Phil S. Robinson against W. A. Anderson, City Clerk and ex officio Clerk of the Board of Trustees of the City of Redondo Beach. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank L. Perry, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Oscar L. Horn and W. A. Alderson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant, who is the city clerk of the city of Redondo Beach, a municipal corporation, appeals from a judgment directing mandate to issue against him to compel him to certify that certain petitions filed in his office invoking the right of recall against three of the trustees of said city were sufficient.

The matter is presented on the judgment roll; judgment having gone against the appellant after a demurrer interposed by him to the petition had been overruled and he had declined to make further answer. From the statement of facts shown in the petition it appears that on the 19th day of June, 1914, three separate recall petitions were filed with appellant, asking that a recall election be held for the purpose of recalling the three trustees, named, respectively, Elmer T. Thompson, Oliver N. Tomlinson, and William J. Hess. The form of the petitions was attached as an exhibit, and from that form it appears that the petitions were regular and of sufficient substance in their general statement of facts and verification thereof. It further appears that appellant examined said petitions, and certified that they were insufficient. It reasonably appears also that the decision of appellant as to the insufficiency of the petitions was based upon an alleged lack of sufficient signatures of qualified voters attached thereto. The trustees whose recall was sought to be accomplished were elected on the 13th of April, 1912, at a regular municipal election. Subsequently, on April 13, 1914, another regular municipal election was held at which other trustees were elected. The certificate of appellant as attached to the petitions shows the total number of votes cast at both of these elections. In support of the position of appellant it is claimed: First, that the law requires at least enough signatures of qualified electors to appear on the recall petitions to equal one-fourth of the total vote cast for the office of city trustees at the last preceding regular municipal election; and, secondly, that the law requires that the percentage should be based upon the total vote cast for the office of city trustee, and that, where there is more than one office to be filled and more than two candidates for such office, the total vote cast for each separate candidate should be added together, and the percentage computed upon that total sum.

[1] The statute under which the electors instituting the recall proceedings were attempting to act is found in the Extra Session Statutes of 1911, at page 128. In fixing the number of signatures required to be secured to recall petitions against municipal officers, it is there provided that:

"The petition shall be signed by qualified voters equal in number to at least twenty-five per cent. of the entire vote cast within such city or town for all candidates for the office which the incumbent sought to be removed occupies, at the last preceding regular municipal election at which such officer was voted for."

We construe this provision to mean that the election referred to is the regular municipal election preceding the date of the attempted recall at which the officers sought to be recalled were voted for. While the language used is not entirely clear, it would seem to be within the reason and intent of the statute that the proportion of signatures required which would set in motion the recall should be based upon the vote cast at the regular election at which the officer was elected, rather than a subsequent election for other trustee offices, not including that which the officer in question occupies. The statute must be given effect rather than have applied to it a construction which will nullify the apparent intent of the Legislature, if such can be done.

[2] Because of the fact that more than one officer of the same kind was elected at the same election (the electors voting for a candidate for one or all of such offices, as they might see fit), the only reasonable rule to apply to the requirement that the percentage of signatures should be based upon a total of the entire vote cast for all candidates for the office is to declare that that percentage should be computed, taking the total number of ballots cast at the election, that, assuming he received the votes of all persons voting at the election, being the largest number that possibly could have been cast "for the office which the incumbent sought to be removed occupies." By this construction the statute may be made operative and its purposes accomplished. As the recall petitions filed were sufficient under the measure of requirement which we have here outlined, it follows that the judgment of the superior court in ordering mandate to issue was properly made.

The judgment is affirmed.

HIGHLAND SCHOOL DIST. OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1640.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — §86 — BUILDING CONTRACTS—LIABILITY.

Irregularities of notices calling a meeting of electors of a school district to vote on the question of erecting a school building arising from the failure to post the notices for the time prescribed by Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 20, and irregularities of notice of bids for the building because not sufficiently published may not be relied on by the district receiving and appropriating the benefit of the labor and materials supplied by the contractor to erect the building, to defeat an action for the reasonable value thereof not exceeding the contract price.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Charles R. McCormick Lumber Company against the Highland School District of the County of San Diego and others, as trustees of the Highland School District of the County of San Diego. From an order granting a motion of plaintiff* for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James E. O'Keefe and C. H. Van Winkle, both of San Diego, for appellants. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the motion of plaintiff for a new trial. The action was brought to recover the sum of $1,201.20, and plaintiff set out ten separate causes of action in its complaint. The appellant Highland school district is a small district in the county of San Diego, and, desiring to build a schoolhouse, a meeting of the electors was called by the posting of notices, and afterwards held, and the trustees were instructed to proceed to acquire a site for the building and to build the schoolhouse. The notices calling the meeting of the electors were not posted for the requisite length of time (as prescribed by subdivision 20 of section 1617, Political Code), nor was there sufficient publication of notice calling for bids, as another subdivision of the same section provides for. However, the board of trustees did proceed to make a contract for the erection of the school building, and the building was completed, and thereafter used for the purposes for which it was erected by the district for a long period of time. Installment warrants were issued to the contractor in payment of the total sum agreed to be paid under the terms of the contract made with him. Payment being refused on the warrants, an assignment was made thereof to the plaintiff herein.

[1] At the trial, after the plaintiff had introduced its evidence, a motion for judgment of nonsuit was made which the court granted as to all of the causes of action set out in the complaint, except those causes of action based upon three of the warrants issued by the trustees, and amounting to the sum of $172.99. These warrants covered matters not included in the contract for the construction of the building. After judgment in plaintiff's favor for the latter amount, a motion for a new trial was made.

It appears that the motion for judgment of nonsuit was granted by the trial judge on the ground of the irregularities occurring in the matter of the notices calling the meeting of the electors and asking for the submission of bids. On the motion for a new trial the grounds specified again brought the same matter before the court, and the motion was granted awarding to the plaintiff a new trial. The question presented is as to whether, admitting the informalities of notice in the calling of the meeting and advertising for bids for the construction of the building, the school district, having received and appropriated the benefit of the labor and materials supplied by the contractor, is estopped from maintaining a defense based upon the irregularities noted. We think, under the circumstances of this case, the contractor, or his assignee, was entitled to recover.

[2] Substantially, the authorities indicate no different rule in applying the doctrine of estoppel to the acts of individuals or private corporations than is proper to be applied to the acts of municipal corporations. There is, however, a distinction suggested, and it is this: That where the contract or agreement upon which recovery is sought is one wholly without the scope of the power of the municipality to make—in other words, is ultra vires—then there can be no estoppel; but, where the authority exists to make the contract, but the proceedings precedent thereto have been informally taken only, then the rule of estoppel may be made to operate against a municipality as completely as it would against an individual under the same circumstances. Abbott on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 259. Approval of the general rule as applicable to municipal corporations is given by the decisions in Argenti v. City of San Francisco, 16 Cal. 255; Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 Pac. 189; Escondido Lumber, H. & G. Co. v. H. J. Baldwin, 2 Cal. App. 606, 84 Pac. 284. This rule of estoppel warranted the respondent in insisting upon recovery of the reasonable value of the material furnished and services rendered by its assignor, not exceeding, we think, however, the total amount agreed upon to be paid.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. (Cr. 360.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 25, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1915.)

1. HOMICIDE — 234 — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Circumstantial evidence in a murder case held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡938—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Refusal of new trial in a homicide case is not error, there being no conclusive showing that with reasonable diligence the evidence could not have been produced at the trial, and it being cumulative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2306-2315, 2317; Dec. Dig. ⚡938.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡719—ARGUMENT—MISSTATEMENT.

Misstatement of evidence by the district attorney is not alone error; it being for the jury to rely on their own recollection of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1669; Dec. Dig. ⚡719.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡730—ARGUMENT—MISSTATEMENT—ACTION BY COURT.

That the court, being asked to instruct the jury to disregard a misstatement of the evidence by the district attorney, replied that the general instructions would cover the matter was enough; such instructions telling them that neither the opinions of counsel nor any statement of fact by them or the court was to be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. ⚡730.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡703—OPENING STATEMENT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

That the district attorney in his opening statement recited, as things that he expected to prove, matters which he failed to support by evidence is not reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1659; Dec. Dig. ⚡703.]

6. WITNESSES ⚡277—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Cross-examination of defendant by the district attorney, bringing out no matter which was not in direct response to his examination in chief, is proper.

7. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡720—ARGUMENT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY — JUSTIFICATION IN EVIDENCE.

The district attorney was justified in arguing that defendant offered to settle for $200 his policy on deceased's life, it being in evidence that an attorney, with whom defendant went to the insurance company, in his presence, said to the agent that all defendant wanted was practically $200, the amount deceased owed him.

8. HOMICIDE ⚡174—EVIDENCE—REMOTENESS.

That deceased's nephew, consulting with an attorney as to his estate, left out of a list of his heirs, sons and daughters, is too remote a circumstance to be evidence that, as claimed by defendant, the nephew committed the murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Wilson E. Davis was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Walton J. Wood, Public Defender, David R. Faries, Asst. Public Defender, and Charles J. Kelly, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison for the remainder of his natural life. An appeal has been taken from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The person alleged to have been the subject of the homicide was one William G. Wheeler.

The proof against appellant was wholly that adduced from circumstantial evidence. Deceased was a man between the ages of 45 and 50 years, and was engaged with the appellant, who is an old man over the age of 73 years, in conducting, in a small way, a photograph business at the town of Sawtelle in Los Angeles county. It appeared in the evidence that appellant first met the deceased at Long Beach, and there the two became very friendly, with the result that they arranged to go to Sawtelle and engage in the business mentioned together. They took up their residence at the latter place some time in November, 1913. So far as the evidence shows, the men continued together amicably up to the time of the death of Wheeler. On the morning of January 1, 1914, at about the hour of 5 o'clock, the small frame building in which the two men lived was discovered to be on fire. At the time the fire was first noticed it had made great progress and the interior of the building was already well burned. The fire was not checked, and it shortly reduced the house to ashes, and in the embers thereof was found the charred and burned body of the deceased. The body was then badly mutilated by the fire, both arms and both legs having been burned away. Appellant was not in the building at the time of the fire, but was discovered at the scene about the hour of 10 o'clock. His demeanor was described by some witnesses as being "nervous," and it was discovered that his mustache and eyebrows had been singed as though by fire. When accosted, and when an inquiry was made of him as to how it happened that his mustache and eyebrows had been burned, he stated that on the day before, while he and the deceased were preparing their meal, a defective gasoline stove flared up and caused the singeing which had been noticed. He further stated, so the testimony runs, that he had been at Garvanza the night before, and had not returned to Sawtelle until after the building had been burned.

Testimony was introduced showing that in December, immediately preceding the death of Wheeler, appellant had appeared at the office of a life and accident insurance company and had there requested information as to different kinds of policies which might be issued, and had finally taken away with him an application blank, which he later returned. He had stated to the insurance agent that he wished to take out the policy on the life of Wheeler, and asked whether he could be made the beneficiary in the policy. The agent replied to him, so the former testified, stating that no one but close relatives were allowed to become beneficiaries in accident policies, but that it might be made in favor of the insured's estate. Appellant, about the 25th of December of the year mentioned, returned the application blank, a portion of which he had filled in, that portion furnishing details as to the name, age, weight, etc., of Wheeler. The agent completed the application and later issued a policy on the life of Wheeler for the amount of $3,500, which was forwarded to appellant at Sawtelle. Appellant had stated to this agent that he desired to act as broker in the matter and to receive a commission, which privilege was accorded him. Early in the same month appellant took out a policy of fire insurance on the contents of the building occupied by himself and Wheeler. About 10 days after the fire occurred, appellant appeared at the office of the accident insurance company with an attorney for the purpose of endeavoring to collect money on the policy which had been taken out on the life of Wheeler. The agent testified that appellant stated that he had come to collect on the policy; that Wheeler had been burned up in the house at Sawtelle, the policy burning with him; that Davis then said that Wheeler owed him $200, but when it was called to his attention that he had stated when the application was made that Wheeler owed him about $3,000, he changed his statement and said, "Yes; that's right." There was testimony furnished by the operatives of an electric car which left Los Angeles some time between 4 and 5 o'clock on the morning of January 1st, to the effect that a man answering the description of appellant rode from Los Angeles to Sawtelle on that morning, and that the car arrived at the latter place at about 10 minutes before 5 o'clock. It was shown with reasonable certainty that the fire was in progress at 5 o'clock, and it was also shown that the operatives of the car were probably mistaken as to the time they arrived at Sawtelle that morning, and that in fact the car referred to did not arrive at the place mentioned until a time considerably after the hour of 5 o'clock. It was proved without contradiction that defendant had registered at a hotel in Los Angeles on the night of December 31st at about 7 or 8 o'clock. No person other than himself gave any testimony as to when appellant left that hotel. He himself testified that he remained there all night, and that when he returned on the car to Sawtelle the next morning the house he had occupied had been entirely destroyed by the fire. He testified that a woman remained with him in the hotel that night, but he could neither give her name nor tell where she lived, and did not produce her to corroborate his statements. The jury evidently concluded, either that the defendant had killed Wheeler before he left Sawtelle on the afternoon of December 31st, or that he had returned some time during the night and murdered the man and arranged for the fire to burn down the house. It was shown that appellant had purchased five gallons of coal oil shortly before the fire and a like quantity some days prior to that time. This circumstance was but a small one, as it was shown that the men had used both gasoline and oil stoves in their building.

To give some point to one of the theories of the prosecution that Wheeler had been struck on the head, a physician, who made an examination of the skull of the deceased about two weeks or more after the tragedy had occurred, testified that he found in the posterior portion of the skull about an ounce of colored liquid which he was of the opinion was blood, and which he believed had been deposited there through a hemorrhage of one of the blood vessels of the brain. He said, however, that he could not say that the skull had been fractured, but testified that the skull had been so badly burned, especially in the frontal portion thereof, that it crumbled in his hands when he attempted to remove it in the usual way of surgeons. He was asked whether it were not possible that this blood had oozed from the brain during the time it had had an opportunity to decompose, and he stated that that condition was not indicated, because if such had been the case, the blood would not have appeared in one spot only.

At the time of his arrest there was found in the possession of appellant two promissory notes; one payable to appellant, and apparently signed by the deceased Wheeler for the sum of $988, and another for the sum of $2,000 to which no signature was attached. There was testimony of a witness, who appeared as a handwriting expert, to the effect that, in his opinion, the signature of Wheeler on the promissory note for $988 was in the handwriting of Davis. This, in brief, was the evidence upon which the conviction of appellant was secured. There was some other testimony, as to statements made by appellant after the fire, which had some pertinency to the charge under investigation, which statements were, in the main, given in the way of explanation or refutation of hints made to appellant as to the opinion of different persons regarding the cause of the fire, or in answer to interrogatories put by such persons. None of these statements, however, so made by appellant, amounted to an admission of his connection with the alleged murder. Both men had been seen on the afternoon of December 31st at Sawtelle, and, so far as appears, both acted in the ordinary and usual way. On the part of the defense, appellant testified that the promissory notes had been drawn in good faith; that Wheeler signed the $988 note which covered an amount owing to appellant by Wheeler; that the $2,000 represented the price of some mining claims which Wheeler had agreed to purchase from appellant. In explaining why the last note was unsigned, appellant testified that he had drawn both notes; that Wheeler had signed the $988 note and had printed his name in red ink on the $2,000 note. The printing and the red ink being unsatisfactory to appellant, he had torn the note up and had asked Wheeler why he did not write his name, as there was plenty of ink. Appellant said that he later wrote another $2,000 note, which it was his purpose to have Wheeler sign.

The jury in the case had the right to consider all of the testimony, introduced on behalf of the prosecution in proof of circumstances, to be true, and to draw all natural and logical inferences and deductions that might be drawn therefrom. So considering the evidence, they had the right to conclude that appellant, intending to profit by the death of Wheeler and the burning of the house, had taken out the insurance upon the life of Wheeler and upon the contents of the building; that he had murdered Wheeler either before he (appellant) left Sawtelle for Los Angeles on the evening of December 31st, or that he had returned to Sawtelle after having visited Los Angeles, and committed the murder. Appellant produced no testimony in corroboration of his statement as to when he left the hotel where he registered on the evening of December 31st. He appeared at the scene of the fire at about 10 o'clock. The testimony of the prosecution tending to show that he went to Sawtelle on the paper train between 4 and 5 o'clock on the morning of January 1st could not reasonably have had influence with the jury as indicating that the murder was committed after appellant's arrival at Sawtelle, for the fact seems to have been quite definitely established that the fire was in progress at the time that the car arrived at the town where deceased and appellant lived. As it appeared that Wheeler on the day preceding the tragedy was in his customary health, so far as could be observed, the jury had the right, considering all of the circumstances, to conclude that he must have been killed before the house was fired. The public defender, who presented the case for appellant to the jury in a very capable manner, has here filed a brief in which he has summarized the points on which he relies for reversal and supported them with able argument.

[1] At the outset and before considering the various contentions advanced, it may be admitted that had the jury brought in a different verdict and one more favorable to the appellant, it could not reasonably have been said that such verdict was unjustified or unsupported. Neither can it be said, on the other hand, that viewing the chain of circumstances, all of which tended to show defendant's connection with the crime committed, the jury's verdict in fixing the responsibility for the tragedy upon this appellant was not warranted by the evidence.

[2] The motion for a new trial was based in part upon a claim of newly discovered evidence. A number of affidavits presented the testimony which it was claimed could be produced upon a new trial. Examining each of these affidavits, it cannot be said, in the first place, that the showing was such as to compel the conclusion of the trial judge that all of the testimony could not have, with reasonable diligence, been procured at the trial. Further than this, such testimony, then alleged to be available, was in its nature cumulative to the testimony given on behalf of appellant at the trial, and designed to be used in contradiction of the assertions of witnesses who had testified. Such being the character of the proposed testimony, the refusal of the court to grant a new trial on account of it was not error. People v. Chrisman, 135 Cal. 282, 67 Pac. 136; People v. Holmes, 126 Cal. 462, 58 Pac. 917.

[3, 4] Alleged misconduct of the district attorney constitutes one of the grounds for error as claimed by appellant. The district attorney in one instance did misquote testimony. He stated that a witness had testified that the defendant had said that his mustache and eyebrows had been burned before the fire while he and Wheeler were getting dinner, and that a third person named Brashear was there. The district attorney in his argument inquired why the defense had not produced Brashear. It was true that the witness referred to had not testified that the defendant had said that Brashear was there. However, the jury had heard the testimony, and their duty was not to take the statement of either counsel as to what the evidence was or what testimony had been given, but to rely upon their own recollection as to that matter. When counsel objected to this erroneous statement and asked the court to instruct the jury to disregard it, the trial judge replied that the general instructions would cover the matter. In these instructions the court did tell the jury that the opinions of counsel were not to be considered, nor any statements of fact made by them nor by the judge of the court. In other words, they were told in sufficiently plain language that they should take the testimony as given by the witnesses and form their conclusions therefrom as to the facts. This erroneous statement of the district attorney is not like the one referred to by appellant as having been sufficient to justify a reversal in the case of People v. Smith, 121 Cal. 355, 53 Pac. 802. In that case the court confirmed the statement of the district attorney by agreeing that the latter had expressed the facts of the subject then being discussed. In this case the court gave no approval of the erroneous statement of the district attorney; on the contrary, he lent the weight of his instructions to the appellant's side by cautioning the jury regarding their duty in considering the evidence.

[5] The contention that the district attorney in his opening statement promised to prove things which he failed to support by the evidence does not amount to reversible error. Such preliminary statements, as was this one, are always qualified with the announcement that counsel are "expecting to prove" the things which they enumerate. The instructions to the jury were that they should only consider matters in evidence before them. As to any of the charges of misconduct, where it may appear that the prosecuting officer overstated or misstated any of the matters complained of, his action in so doing bears not the color of willfulness nor a purpose to deceive or mislead the jury.

[6, 7] It is further claimed that the district attorney improperly questioned the appellant in an endeavor to prove that the latter had previously been convicted of a felony. We have examined carefully the testimony on this branch of the case, and we find no matter brought out therein on the cross-questioning of appellant which was not in direct response to his examination as made by appellant's own counsel. The district attorney was justified in arguing to the jury that defendant had offered to settle his claim on the accident policy for the sum of $200. It was shown in evidence that appellant visited the insurance agency after the fire, and that appellant's attorney (not either of counsel in this case), in defendant's presence, made the remark to the agent that "all that the defendant wanted was practically $200, which was the amount which his partner was indebted to him." Other items as to alleged misconduct in the argument of the district attorney do not require specific mention as, in the view we take of them, they did not constitute such misconduct as would create prejudicial error.

[8] One of the efforts of appellant in making out his defense was to attempt to establish that one Cook, an alleged nephew of deceased Wheeler, had acted in a suspicious manner at the time of and after the fire. This was in the endeavor to show to the jury a likelihood that Cook had committed the crime with which appellant was charged. It having appeared that an attorney named Ritchey had been consulted by Cook after the death of Wheeler with regard to Wheeler's estate, on cross-examination Ritchey was asked whether Cook had not given the witness a list of the heirs of Wheeler, and left out the names of sons and daughters of Wheeler. This question was objected to by the people, and the objection was sustained. As the Attorney General argues, the objection was properly sustained on the ground that it was not cross-examination; and the ruling of the court, refusing to allow the witness to be recalled for direct examination on behalf of appellant, was not error, as the circumstance sought to be elicited was so remote, as constituting any evidence that Cook had committed the crime with which appellant was charged, as to be inadmissible.

Exceedingly close scrutiny has been given to the voluminous record presented upon this appeal, not only because of the fact that appellant was convicted of the most serious crime of murder, but because of the further fact that his conviction rested upon proof only of circumstances which his counsel has so earnestly contended were not sufficient to justify the verdict. The case presented, in brief, is one where we must conclude that if the jury believed the testimony introduced by the prosecution, they were warranted in finding appellant guilty as charged. That they did so believe that testimony, notwithstanding the fact that there was contradictory evidence, must be implied from the verdict which they returned in the case.

No reversible error appearing, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HAMLIN v. BARNHART. (Civ. 1542.)

1. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY ⇐3—EXECUTORY CONTRACT — CONSIDERATION — CONDITIONAL PROMISE.

Where a contract for the exchange of property contained an agreement by plaintiff to make the exchange in case he could borrow a certain amount on the property he was to receive, that promise was not sufficient consideration for the promise of defendant, since plaintiff, by imposing impossible conditions as to maturity or interest, could prevent the securing of a loan, and there was therefore no mutuality in the promises.

Action by Ralph Hamlin against Jessie R. Barnhart. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for appellant. F. W. Shelley, of Pasadena, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The trial judge, viewing an alleged contract made between the parties to this action, which contemplated an exchange of real properties and the payment by respondent of a large sum of money, concluded that there was no sufficient consideration rendered, or agreed to be rendered, by appellant, and that therefore respondent was not bound. This was the controlling issue then submitted, and its determination will direct the decision to be rendered on this appeal, which is taken from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] We agree with the conclusion reached by the superior court. The alleged contract for the breach of which damages were sought to be recovered, after reciting conditions respecting the properties of the parties and the terms imposed, contains the following clauses:

"The party of the first part agrees to this exchange in case he can borrow four thousand five hundred (4500) dollars on property at 357 So. Mentor avenue, Pasadena, California. The party of the first part has ten days in which to secure the above loan."

Respondent, three days after signing the agreement mentioned, orally notified the agent who was acting in the matter that she would not carry out the proposed exchange. On the same day, and after the agent had received this notification of respondent, but before this notification had been communicated to appellant, the latter notified the same agent that he was willing to proceed with the exchange of properties.

The right of respondent to withdraw from the agreement seems clear. There was no mutuality of consideration provided for. On the one hand, it was proposed to bind respondent in absolute terms to perform on her part, while appellant's performance was made conditional. He was to perform only in case he could borrow $4,500 on respondent's property, and impliedly the agreement was that this loan should be upon whatever conditions he might choose to impose as to duration of loan term, rate of interest, etc. In the event of his default, respondent had no remedy as against his caprice. The agreement of the parties imported no obligation on appellant's part which respondent could enforce. "If a promise does not offer any enforceable legal right or forbearance it is not a consideration. This principle is sometimes expressed in the rule that promises, in order to be a valid consideration each for the other, must be mutual. * * * Where the parties assume to make a contract in which a promise is the consideration for a promise, and analysis shows that one of the promises does not impose any legal duty upon the party making it, such promise is not a consideration for the other promise." 1 Page on Contracts, §§ 302-304. It will be of no service to multiply citations to this fundamental rule governing the making of contracts. Having construed the contract as imposing no definite obligation on appellant to perform (a construction which his own words expressly declare to have been the one intended), there is no room left for further argument to the point that the alleged contract lacked mutuality of obligation or of consideration, which means the same thing.

[2] Treated as a mere offer to exchange, the proposal was revocable by respondent at any time before accepted by appellant. Respondent did notify the agent of appellant, before there was any offer to accept made by appellant, that she would not proceed under the alleged agreement.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order of the court should be sustained.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

TAYLOR v. NELSON. (Civ. 1441.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 1, 1915.)

1. PARTNERSHIP ⇐22—RELATION—EVIDENCE.

An agreement under which plaintiff was to and did pay $1,000 down on account of the price of certain land, and was to pay the further sum of $2,500, and the defendant the sum of $3,500, whereupon defendant would secure a loan upon the property of $8,000, making the whole purchase price $15,000, which defendant refused to carry out, was not a consummated partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 7, 8; Dec. Dig. ⇐22.]

2. PARTNERSHIP ⇐105—BREACH OF AGREEMENT—ACTION—FORM.

In such case it was not necessary to sue in equity for a dissolution and accounting, but the plaintiff had an action for breach of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. ⇐105.]

3. BROKERS ⇐102—FRAUD ON PRINCIPAL—PURCHASE BY BROKER.

Where defendant was authorized by his principal to sell real property for $15,000 on a certain commission, his contract with plaintiff, whereby they were to purchase the property at that price, was not in fraud of the principal so as to invalidate the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Frank J. Taylor against J. M. Nelson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Coolidge, J. B. Peckham, and R. C. McComish, all of San Jose, for appellant. E. M. Rosenthal, of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint alleges that the defendant and the plaintiff entered into an agreement, by the terms of which the plaintiff was to pay, and did pay, $1,000 down on account of the purchase price of a certain piece of real estate in Santa Clara county; that later plaintiff was to pay the sum of $2,500, and the defendant the sum of $3,500, whereupon the said defendant would secure a loan on the property of $8,000, making the whole purchase price, to wit, $15,000; that on and prior to May 1, 1912, the date fixed in the agreement of purchase and sale for the payment of the balance of the purchase price, plaintiff requested the defendant to carry out his part of the contract, but the defendant refused to do so, and repudiated the whole transaction. This suit is for damages to recover the sum of $1,000 for breach of the contract, plus a small item not questioned if the plaintiff is found to be entitled to recover a judgment in this action.

[1, 2] The transaction here involved is not, as asserted by defendant, a partnership transaction requiring, for the adjustment of the difficulties between the parties a suit in equity for dissolution and accounting. It is true, according to the allegation of the complaint and the findings of the court, that the parties contemplated a partnership. While, in view of the arrangements between the parties, it may be said that a partnership was initiated by the plaintiff's payment of $1,000, it certainly cannot be said, the defendant having failed to carry out his part of the contract, and having repudiated the same, that the partnership was ever launched, created, or consummated. Hence it follows that the present action for breach of the contract will lie. Powell v. Maguire, 43 Cal. 11; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689; 30 Cyc. 358-465; 15 Cyclopaedia of Pleading and Practice, 1045; Hyer v. Richmond Traction Co., 168 U. S. 471, 18 Sup. Ct. 114, 42 L. Ed. 547.

[3] We also think that the next point made by the defendant cannot be maintained. If the plaintiff, when he entered into the contract with the defendant, knew that the interests of the defendant and his principal, the owner of the land, were antagonistic, and that the owner did not know that the defendant was interested in the purchase of the land, then the contract perhaps would be void not only as between the defendant and the owner (Rauer's Law & Collection Co. v. Bradbury, 3 Cal. App. 256, 84 Pac. 1007), but also as to the plaintiff; for then it might be said that the plaintiff was a party to a transaction which was a fraud upon the owner, in which event, of course, the plaintiff could not recover. But in this case, according to the evidence accepted by the trial court, the $15,000 was to be the full price demanded by the owner for the property. In other words, the defendant was not vested with the exercise of any discretion in the matter, nor was he to get as much as he could for the property; he was simply authorized to sell it on a certain commission for a specified amount. Under these circumstances it certainly cannot be held that the plaintiff was guilty of any deceit or fraud. Furthermore, it is plain, according to the version of the case adopted by the trial court, that the plaintiff was innocent of any contemplated wrong towards the owner of the property; and this was the view of the owner of the property, for, when she heard from the parties here what had occurred, she said, referring to herself and the plaintiff, "We have both been imposed upon by Mr. Nelson" (the defendant), and, not caring "to see Mr. Taylor (plaintiff) lose his money," agreed that if he would return the abstract of the property which had been furnished him, and if he would pay $57.50, the amount of a bill which had been incurred by her at the instance of the purchasers of the property, she would waive any right she might have "to compel him to go on with the deal, and leave him to fight out the matter of the $1,000 with Nelson."

Incidentally, perhaps, it ought to be said that the defendant claimed the $1,000 on the theory that he produced a purchaser who was willing and able to purchase the property, and that a contract for the purchase was entered into between them. The trial court sustained an objection to a question put to the plaintiff on cross-examination which perhaps ought to have been allowed; but from all the circumstances of the case it is plain, assuming the ruling was error, that it was entirely harmless.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

169 Cal. 544

Ex parte LAPIQUE. (Cr. 1923.) (Supreme Court of California. March 5, 1915.) In Bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus by John Lapique against the sheriff of Los Angeles county for his discharge under a judgment finding him guilty of contempt. Denied. See, also, 146 Pac. 690. John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is in the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county under a commitment based upon a judgment finding him guilty of contempt of court, imposing a fine of $500 therefor, and providing that in default of payment of said fine he be imprisoned in the county jail of Los Angeles for a period in the proportion of one day for each $2 of such fine, or until such fine be otherwise satisfied. He has heretofore applied to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District for discharge on habeas corpus, and was by said court remanded to custody. In so remanding him the said district court of appeal filed a written opinion, which is reported in 146 Pac. 690. A consideration of the matters set forth in his petition addressed to this court has satisfied us that the opinion of said District Court of Appeal sufficiently disposes of the claims made by him for discharge. In view of our decisions referred to in the said opinion of the District Court of Appeal, no sufficient cause appears entitling petitioner to be discharged from custody. The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

Ex parte WHITE. (Cr. 302.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1915.) In the matter of the application of James White for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied. A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner is imprisoned by the sheriff of San Joaquin county by virtue of an information, filed in the superior court of said county, charging him with the commission of the crime of grand larceny. Petitioner claims that he was committed by the magistrate without probable cause, and has sent with his petition a certified copy of the evidence taken before the committing magistrate. We have given the evidence careful examination, and are satisfied that it is sufficient to justify the magistrate in issuing the commitment. The writ is denied.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 730 v. HERSHEY et al. (Sac. 2141.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1915.
Rehearing Denied May 4, 1915.)1. DRAINS ⚡73—RECLAMATION DISTRICT—
NEW WORK—PLAN AND REPORT.

The engineer's report under the designation of "Improvement of Old Levees and Construction of New Levees," concluding that a part of the work before recommended had been done at a cost of $21,248.24 in excess of the estimates contained in the original plan of reclamation, and that to complete the work would require the further sum of $44,725.76, not advising the trustees or any person as to the particular work for which the expense had been incurred, and in view of other parts of the report giving the location, elevation, and dimensions of the levee work, with the data from which the cubical contents of the completed work and the number of yards necessary to bring it up to standard, might be estimated, in the absence of any statute requiring the report and the adopted plan to specify by metes and bounds where the actual work of raising the levee has been performed, was not so defective as to invalidate the district's assessment upon defendant's land therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. ⚡73.]

2. DRAINS ⚡78—RECLAMATION DISTRICT—
PLAN OF WORK—MODIFICATION—STATUTES.

Pol. Code, §§ 3455, 3459, do not require a statement of the work done or to be done under each of the modified plans of reclamation, but only a statement of the necessary cost, and if the original assessment is insufficient, and further assessments are required, exacts merely a statement of the work done or to be done and its estimated cost. Held, that the continuance of a general plan in its entirety, with necessary changes, and the construction of a new levee, the location and dimensions of which levee, with the acquisition of the necessary right of way, were given without separate estimates of the cost thereof, or of the levee itself, did not invalidate the district assessment, merely because the cost of the work was not segregated into its items.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 730 against Ella L. Hershey and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 162 Cal. 401, 122 Pac. 1074.

Hudson Grant, of Woodland, and G. Clark and Black & Clark, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was prosecuted by plaintiff to foreclose a lien upon the lands of defendants under a reclamation district assessment imposed upon those lands. Plaintiff was given judgment, and from that judgment, and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, defendants have appealed.

In 1909 the original plan of reclamation of this district was reported to the board of supervisors of Yolo county, was adopted, and an assessment levied in conformity therewith. This assessment was contested by these appellants, and in Reclamation District v. Hershey, 160 Cal. 692, 117 Pac. 904, their appeal from the adverse judgment of the trial court was considered and denied.

Plaintiff reclamation district is bounded on the north and east by the Sacramento river, on the south by an east and west line, and on the west by the right of way of a railroad company. In the northwesterly corner of the district is a part of the town of Knight's Landing; the town extending northwesterly. The waters against which the district was organized to protect itself were those of the Sacramento river proper and those of Cache creek, a tributary of the river, lying westerly of the district. The severe floods of 1909 showed the inadequacy of the protective works which had been constructed under the original plan of reclamation. Thus the southern levee, it was thought, would be a sufficient protection against flood waters in that locality, but proved not to be so. A ridge known as Knight's Landing ridge, it was thought, would be a natural protection to the district on the northwest. This Knight's Landing ridge is a natural ridge extending from the high land on the west to the westerly bank of the Sacramento river northwesterly from the town of Knight's Landing. It separates the lower portion of Colusa basin from the upper portion of Yolo basin, in the latter of which basins the reclamation district is situated. But flood waters flowed over this ridge, compelling the construction of a levee upon this high ground. By this unprecedented flood of 1909 the trustees of the district learned that it was the part of wisdom, if not of necessity, to modify and enlarge their scheme of reclamation to protect the lands of the district. Therefore the board of trustees of the district, on April 5, 1909, adopted a modification of the original plan by increasing the size and dimensions of the back or south levee which served to protect the lands of the district from the flood waters of Cache creek, and further, to guard against the unexpected flow of waters over Knight's Landing ridge, they adopted on April 19th another modification calling for the construction of a levee on that ridge. After the adoption of the modification of April 5th, work was done by the district to bring the south levee up to the standard of the modified plan. No work upon this was done until after the adoption of the modified plan. On the 13th day of November, 1909, the engineer of the district made his report, specifying the work necessary to be done, in addition to that called for by the original plan, to effect a thorough reclamation of the lands. In this report reference was made to the modification of the original plan adopted by the board of trustees on April 5th and 19th, and the report was framed in conformity with the modified plans adopted by the trustees of the district upon the dates mentioned. The engineer's report, under the designation of "Improvement of Old Levees and Construction of New Levees" discusses and describes with elaborate care the additions to be made to the levee system and gives detailed specifications of the proposed new levee on Knight's Landing ridge. Separate estimates of the cost of the different branches of the work are made and stated, and this is followed by a recapitulation in which the amount of work done and to be done is segregated and separately stated; the cost of the amount done being segregated from the cost of the amount to be done. All formal actions in the matter of the assessment here in question were regularly taken.

[1] The objections of appellants to the assessment are extremely technical. Thus, appellants say that the engineer's report under the designation of "Improvement of Old Levees and Construction of New Levees" concludes as follows:

"That a portion of said work hereinbefore recommended has been done at a cost of $24,248.24 in excess of the estimates contained in the original plans of reclamation; that to complete said work will require the further sum of $44,725.76."

And appellants insist:

"That this statement does not describe the work, the doing of which has cost the district $24,248.24."

It is said that the vital defect in the report is that it does not advise the board of trustees, or any other person, what particular work has been done for which this expense has been incurred, and Reclamation District v. Bonbini, 158 Cal. 197, 110 Pac. 577, is relied upon to support appellants' position. What the Bonbini Case declared and very particularly declared was:

"That the law contemplates the adoption by the trustees of a clear and definite plan of all new work not embraced in the original and other previous plans already filed, before any assessment is levied therefor, so that all concerned, including the landowners who pay the tax, may have means of ascertaining the specific purposes of the assessment, the real value of the proposed work, and the benefit that will be derived therefrom."

When the whole of the engineer's report is considered, and not the fragmentary portion of it quoted and relied on by appellants, it is seen that in that report the location, elevation, and dimensions of the levee work are carefully given, with the data from which the cubical contents of the completed levee may be estimated and the number of cubic yards in place and to be put in place to bring the levee up to standard. It is in this connection that the report states that a portion of this work (that is, the work of bringing the levee up to standard) has been done at a cost of $24,000 in excess of the estimate contained in the original plan of reclamation, and that the further sum of $44,000 is required to complete the work. The report of the engineer is full, elaborate, and understandable, and in the particular under consideration affords all the information which the law requires, and much more than was afforded in the Bonbini Case by a specification held to be sufficient; that specification being merely:

"To extend the head levee for about three-fourths of a mile and raise the present head levee on an average of two feet, the estimated cost of same is $5,500."

Here the one purpose is the raising of the levees. The expenses arising and to arise have been accurately and separately stated. In the Hershey Case, 160 Cal. 692, 117 Pac. 904, supra, in the petition for rehearing, this court was asked to condemn the original plan of this district upon the ground that there was no separate estimate of the cost of raising and strengthening of the existing levees, and by denial of the petition this court held the objection to be untenable. And finally upon this point it may be said that there is nothing in the law requiring the report and the adopted plan by metes and bounds to specify where the actual work of raising the levee has been performed. The location and dimensions of the original levee have been specified, as well as the dimensions and locations of the raised and strengthened levee, and inspection upon the ground will fully answer the purpose of showing where and to what extent the new and unpaid for work has been done. In the Bonbini Case the report stated:

"To cause drainage ditches to be dug throughout the district and pumping plants to be installed, the estimated costs of which are $25,000."

Here was an inclusion in the one estimate of the cost of digging ditches and establishing pumping plants, and nothing was stated from which knowledge could be obtained of the amounts to be expended for each of these separate purposes. But in the plan before us the maps show the location of the ditches by scale and dimensions. The plan refers to the drainage ditches, giving a specific estimate of cost of deepening, widening, and repairing them.

[2] Appellants would have us hold that each of the modifications of the original plan of reclamation constituted a wholly separate, distinct, and independent plan of reclamation. Such, however, is not the fact, as the foregoing statement shows. The general plan still continued in its entirety, with necessary changes principally in the nature of strengthening the original works and enlarging the drainage ditches, made advisable, if not necessary, by the experience of the flood of 1909. The statute does not require a statement of the work done or to be done under each of the modified plans of reclamation, but only a statement of the cost of the work necessary for the reclamation of the land in pursuance of any of the plans. If the original assessment is insufficient and further assessments are thus from time to time required, the law exacts merely a statement of the work done or to be done and its estimated cost. Pol. Code, §§ 3455, 3459. It would unduly and unnecessarily prolong this discussion to further consider in detail each of the technical objects here presented, and it must suffice to say that they are completely answered by the decisions of this court in Reclamation District v. Clark, 155 Cal. 345, 100 Pac. 1091, Reclamation District v. Hershey, supra, and Reclamation District v. Diepenbrock, 143 Pac. 763.

The original plan did not provide for the levee along Knight's Landing ridge; this being found necessary for the protection of the district after the experience of the flood of 1909. The modified plan calls for such levee. Its location, with the acquisition of the necessary right of way, are given, and its dimensions, with the statement that it is to be constructed seven feet above high water in the Colusa basin for the years 1908 and 1909. There is no separate estimate given of the cost of acquiring the right of way for this proposed new levee nor for the construction of the levee itself; the estimate in this respect being embraced in a lump sum for the acquisition of the rights of way of all levees, and another aggregate sum for the construction thereof. But the answer to this objection is that section 3455 of the Political Code does not require that such segregation should be made, and in not requiring it permits an aggregate estimate of the cost of separate phases of the work. Therefore this court would not overthrow such an assessment merely because the cost of work of the same character was not segregated into its items, but, if it ever overthrew an assessment for this reason, it would be in a case where such an estimate manifestly was injurious to the property owner, and that is not the case here presented.

In conclusion, and after a careful review of the record in this case, we deem it proper to say that there is established upon the part of the trustees of this district a painstaking, faithful, and successful effort to comply with the law. This not alone in the matter of the plans and of the assessments, but in the disposition of the moneys. Reports were filed with the board of supervisors showing in detail the financial condition of the district, the moneys disbursed, and the work done. In addition there was introduced in evidence an account book kept by the secretary showing the purpose for which the money represented by every warrant was expended. The result of this has been of great benefit. Practically no land within the district was farmed at the time that this reclamation work was undertaken. To-day the levees have been raised above the high-water mark, pumping plants installed, and the drainage system improved. This has been followed by a very great increase in cultivable and cultivated land and in a corresponding increase in their value. We are not unmindful of the fact that proceedings leading to such assessments are in their nature in invitum, and that the property owner is entitled to have the courts scrutinize these proceedings with proper care. But this does not mean that an individual property owner may defeat an assessment by showing some minor ministerial or administrative defect upon a doubtful proposition in no wise involving any substantial right, and thus by excessive litigious astuteness secure benefits for his land for which either his neighbors will be compelled to pay or for which he ultimately will himself be compelled to pay under a new assessment.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

1. TRIAL ⚡3—TRIAL BY COURT—SUBMISSION OF EQUITABLE ISSUES TO JURY.

Where the answer charging fraud in the procurement of a guaranty sued on was sufficient to entitle defendants to complete relief without the cross-complaint raising the same issues, it was not error to submit the whole case to the jury before disposing of the equitable issues raised by the cross-complaint.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡934—PRESUMPTIONS—JUDGMENT.

4. PLEADING ⚡93—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES.

Inconsistent defenses being allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 441, one sued on a guaranty may show that the contract was procured by fraud, and, as a separate defense, that, if valid, no liability had arisen under it by reason of the fact that no indebtedness had been incurred covered by its terms.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1071 — HARMLESS ERROR—FINDINGS.

The court having found that the guaranty sued on was procured by fraud, contradictoriness in findings as to whether the debt secured was an individual debt, or that of a corporation through which the debtor conducted his business, was not material.

Misrepresentations by bank president soliciting a guaranty as to the business of its debtor, the guarantor's son, and concealment of the son's debt to the bank from stock gambling losses equaling the amount of the guaranty, are sufficient to void the contract.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by the American National Bank of San Francisco against J. W. Donnellan and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab, R. P. Henshall, and Geo. W. Mordecai, all of San Francisco (Kleinsorge & McKisick, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Upon January 21, 1909, J. W. Donnellan and Marion J. Donnellan, his wife, executed to plaintiff their contract, jointly and severally guaranteeing to plaintiff "the payment of any and all sums of money * * * which is now or may hereafter become due or owing" by their son, Kenneth Donnellan, to plaintiff up to the amount of $30,000, with interest. Upon this contract of guaranty this action was brought, alleging an indebtedness upon the part of Kenneth Donnellan to the bank in the sum of $37,605.83. Defendants set up several defenses: That the guaranty was without consideration; that Kenneth Donnellan was not indebted to the plaintiff; that the note of Kenneth Donnellan in the complaint described was not given for an indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan, and was given without consideration; that plaintiff has security ample for all of the alleged indebtedness; that no advances were ever made to Kenneth Donnellan on the faith of the guaranty; that fraud, deceit, and misrepresentation were practiced upon the defendants in the securing of the guaranty. Defendants further pleaded by way of cross-complaint, charging that their guaranty was void for fraud practiced in its procurement, and asking that it be so decreed, and that the plaintiff bank be compelled to surrender it for cancellation. Plaintiff, in turn, besides answering the cross-complaint, amended its complaint, charging, in effect, that Kenneth Donnellan cloaked his personal transactions under the name of the Kenneth Donnellan Company, a corporation, which was owned and controlled by him; that prior to the $30,000 guaranty charged upon in the complaint the same defendants had executed a $10,000 guaranty to secure past and prospective debts of Kenneth Donnellan, and that upon the execution of the second guaranty plaintiff surrendered to defendants the first guaranty.

A jury was called in, special issues were submitted, and the jury made its findings thereon. The jury also returned a general verdict in favor of the defendants. Because of the equitable defense of fraud and the cross-complaint seeking affirmative relief for fraud, the court itself made its own findings, adopting as a part of them the findings on the special issues which had been submitted to the jury. These findings, summarized, are that there was no consideration for either of the guaranties of the defendants; that no consideration was ever advanced to Kenneth Donnellan by reason of the guaranty of $30,000; that the promissory note of Kenneth Donnellan for $37,605.83 set forth in the complaint evidenced the joint indebtedness of the Kenneth Donnellan Company, a corporation, and E. J. Broberg, assistant cashier of plaintiff, and, in addition, an indebtedness of $1,000 upon the joint promissory note of Kenneth Donnellan and Marion J. Donnellan, his mother; that there was no forbearance to sue on account of any asserted indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan as a consideration for the $30,000 guaranty; that the contract of guaranty was given by the defendants at the solicitation of plaintiff's president, under the following circumstances:

"That P. E. Bowles, the president of the plaintiff, did, prior to the execution of the contract of guaranty set out in plaintiff's complaint, and attached as an exhibit thereto, suggest, assert, and declare to J. W. Donnellan that the only business that Kenneth Donnellan had transacted with the plaintiff prior to the date of said guaranty was having said bank collect drafts with stock attached thereto; that said business was extensive, and it was advisable for the said bank to have a paper in the form of a guaranty so that the bank examiner would be satisfied in case any loss should occur, which loss would be small and the possibility remote; that said assertion, suggestion, and declaration of the said P. E. Bowles to said defendant J. W. Donnellan was false and untrue, in this, that prior to the 21st day of January, 1909, a speculation in mining stocks was being carried on with E. J. Broberg, who at said time was an officer of the said bank, with Kenneth Donnellan Company, a corporation; that at the time said declarations and assertions were made by the said P. E. Bowles, president of the said plaintiff bank, to the defendant J. W. Donnellan, he knew that said transactions had been carried on in the bank, and that great losses had been made; that the loss due at said time was at least the sum of $30,000.

"That for the purpose of deceiving and cheating the said defendant J. W. Donnellan and his codefendant Marion J. Donnellan, he (the said Bowles) did represent and declare to the said J. W. Donnellan, prior to the making of said guaranty, that no other business had been carried on by said Kenneth Donnellan with said bank except the collection of drafts with stock attached; that for the purpose of lulling said defendant into a sense of security and of preventing him from making any investigation or ascertaining the truth, he (the said P. E. Bowles) did, prior to the making of said guaranty, persuade and induce one Kenneth Donnellan, who knew all of said facts, not to communicate said facts to the said J. W. Donnellan; that the said Kenneth Donnellan is the son of said J. W. Donnellan.

"That P. E. Bowles, as president of said bank, by artifice, deceit, and fraud induced the said Kenneth Donnellan to abstain from seeing his father on the day that said defendant J. W. Donnellan came from Sacramento to San Francisco to meet the said P. E. Bowles, which said meeting resulted in the guaranty set out in plaintiff's complaint; that the said defendant J. W. Donnellan was induced to come to San Francisco by a telephone received from one E. J. Broberg some time in the month of January, 1909, prior to the making of the guaranty aforesaid.

"That, for the purpose of inducing the said Kenneth Donnellan not to inform his father of the truth or to inform him of the losses the bank had sustained as aforesaid, he (the said P. E. Bowles) promised the said Kenneth Donnellan that he would give to the said Kenneth Donnellan sufficient business, as a stockbroker, from said bank and from other institutions controlled by said P. E. Bowles that would be sufficient to pay off such indebtedness within one year from date, and he also promised the said Kenneth Donnellan that he would give him sufficient business to enable the whole of said indebtedness to be paid; that the said P. E. Bowles made said promises without the intention of performing them, or any of them, and made said promises for the purpose of inducing the said Kenneth Donnellan to refrain from informing his father of the truth and of informing him that said loss had already been occasioned;" that the guaranty of $30,000 thus secured on the 21st day of January, 1909, was preceded by a $10,000 guaranty secured in December, 1908; that the false representations and concealments in the securing of the $10,000 guaranty of 1908 were substantially the same as those employed in securing the guaranty of January, 1909, saying that they were made by Broberg, the assistant cashier of the bank, on behalf of the bank, instead of by its president; that Kenneth Donnellan did not own all of the stock of the Kenneth Donnellan Company; that Kenneth Donnellan was not engaged in business individually under the form, guise, or cloak of the Kenneth Donnellan Company; that the defendants did not know, nor did either of them know, that Kenneth Donnellan was engaged in business for himself under the name of Kenneth Donnellan Company, and that such was not the fact.

The court concluded that there was no consideration to the defendants, or either of them, for the guaranty; that the indebtedness described in the complaint was not the indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan, save and except the $1,000 not covered by the guaranty; that both guaranties were procured by fraud and deceit; that plaintiff should recover nothing; and that defendants were entitled to have the $30,000 guaranty delivered up to be canceled. Judgment was entered accordingly, and plaintiff appeals from that judgment, bringing up the evidence for review under a bill of exceptions.

[1] Appellant's first complaint is a general one; namely, that the court erred in submitting the whole case to the jury before disposing of the equitable issues raised by the cross-complaint. At the most, however, this complaint amounts to but a technical objection to the order of proof. Defendants might have rested their defense by charging the fraud in their answer, without a cross-complaint. Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 Pac. 692. Having been brought into court to respond to their guaranty, their answer that it had been procured by fraud, if successfully established, would have given them full and complete relief. It would have effectuated an avoidance and cancellation of the contract by judicial decree as completely as it would have been canceled under their prayer for affirmative relief in their cross-complaint. But, conceding the general rule that equitable defenses are first to be disposed of, and that the merits of an equitable cross-complaint should first have been determined before the submission to a jury of the issues raised in the action at law, yet this irregularity, at the most, was but an irregularity in no way affecting the substantial rights of appellant; for even upon these equitable issues of fraud it was quite proper for the court to have impaneled the jury, to have submitted the issues to that jury, and to have been advised by the determinations which the jury made upon those issues, adopting or rejecting them, as they appealed to the conscience of the chancellor. And this, in fact, was precisely what the court here did in adopting the findings of the jury, and in supplementing those findings with others which it made, addressed both to the legal and equitable considerations in the case.

[2, 3] Appellant next contends that certain findings must be disregarded because of their uncertainty; those findings in this respect being like the attempted findings condemned by this court in such cases as Ladd v. Durkin, 51 Cal. 277; Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; and Goodnow v. Griswold, 68 Cal. 599, 9 Pac. 837. And next the contention is made that the findings themselves are in very vital respects contradictory and self-destructive. To both of these contentions it may be answered, first, in general terms, that it is only when a judgment rests upon some particular finding for its validity and support that the lack of sufficient evidence to support such finding, or the contradictoriness between two findings, treating of the same essential matter, will necessitate a reversal of the case; or, in other words, however unsupported, however lame, however inconclusive, any number of the findings may be, if in any case there be one clear, sustained, and sufficient finding upon which the judgment may rest, every presumption being in favor of the judgment, it will be here concluded that the court did rest its judgment upon that finding, or those findings, and the others may and will be disregarded. Thayer v. Tyler, 147 Pac. 979. So here we need not follow counsel through his argument as to the ambiguity and uncertainty which attaches to such a finding as "that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, except as admitted by the answer or as found herein, are untrue"; for the findings of the court upon the question of the fraud in the procurement of the contract of guaranty are clear, full, and explicit, and are in and of themselves entirely sufficient to support the judgment. Such being indisputably the case, it matters not whether, in law or in fact, Kenneth Donnellan was or was not indebted to plaintiff. His indebtedness, under the finding that the guaranty was procured by fraud, was not protected nor secured by that guaranty, and the issue of his indebtedness is thus eliminated from this case and left for determination between the bank and Kenneth Donnellan himself. Appellant's argument on the question of indebtedness proceeds upon the proposition that the court has found, in effect, that Kenneth Donnellan was not indebted to the bank at all, and that, not being indebted to the bank, there was no liability under the contract of guaranty, conceding that contract of guaranty to be valid. Such, in truth, is one phase of the court's finding and judgment.

[4] But appellant argues that this is wholly inconsistent with the findings of the court that plaintiff's officers fraudulently concealed from defendants the fact that Kenneth Donnellan was heavily indebted to the bank, and that, if Kenneth Donnellan was heavily indebted to the bank, it could not be true, as by the other findings declared, that he owed nothing to the bank, and, conversely, if he did owe nothing to the bank, the officers of the bank were guilty of no fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment, even if they declared that he was not so indebted. But the answer to this is that these defendants were entitled to set forth by their answer as many defenses, even inconsistent defenses, as they had. Civ. Code Proc. 441. They were thus entitled to show, if they could, that the contract of guaranty was procured by fraud, and therefore void. They were entitled to show as a separate defense, if they could, that, conceding the validity of the contract of guaranty, no liability had arisen under it by reason of the fact that no indebtedness had been incurred by Kenneth Donnellan covered by its terms. It may be added that, of course, it is quite apparent that the differences between the litigants here arise over the proposition as to whether or not the indebtedness to the bank was the individual indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan, or was the indebtedness of the Kenneth Donnellan Company; the admitted fact being that the guaranty was to protect against the debts of Kenneth Donnellan, and the evidence showing that all of these transactions by which the indebtedness arose were transactions by and in the name of the Kenneth Donnellan Company.

[5] Plaintiff on the trial (appellant here) vigorously contends that, under the principle that equity will look through form to substance, it must be declared that the Donnellan Company, of which Kenneth Donnellan owned all the stock, was a mere instrumentality through which he conducted his business to avoid the claims of creditors. Respondents, however, insist that Kenneth Donnellan did not own all the stock of the corporation; that it was not, therefore, his mere instrumentality; that they did not even know that the Kenneth Donnellan Company was doing business; that they never undertook to guarantee the debts of the Kenneth Donnellan Company; that, as guarantors favored by the law, they are entitled to stand upon the strict letter of their contract, and that the principle of equity invoked, while applicable in cases where it is sought to charge the principal debtor hiding behind the veil of his own corporation, has no applicability whatsoever to a contract of guaranty such as this, which runs to the debts of an individual and to the transactions of that individual, and not to the debts of the corporation nor to transactions of that corporation. The fact that the court adopted defendants' view of this matter goes far to explain away the asserted contradictoriness of the findings. But this consideration need not further be pursued, since the contradictoriness which appellant asserts, even if it exists, has no materiality, we repeat, if the guaranty was secured by fraud. Or, if it has materiality at all, it is only in argument as to the weight of the evidence touching the concealment of plaintiff's officers as to the indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan to the bank, in view of the finding of the court that there was no such indebtedness. And upon this proposition we need only say that plaintiff contends that at the time the guaranty was given Kenneth Donnellan was personally indebted to the bank; that the contract of guaranty was fairly procured; and that it covered, and was meant to cover, this precise indebtedness. The duty of the guarantee, under the circumstances, does not depend upon the ultimate determination of the court as to whether or not a debt, or a debt in any given amount, existed. It depends upon his knowledge and belief and the obligation upon him to disclose, or the right resting with him not to disclose, to the intending guarantor what that knowledge and belief is.

[6] So, necessarily, we are brought to a consideration of the all-essential findings of the fraud practiced upon the defendants in the procurement of their contract. The findings in this regard have been quoted, since they set forth these matters with particularity. Are these findings sustained? Indubitably they are. Further, it is found, and the evidence sustains the findings, that in January, and shortly prior to the execution of the contract of guaranty, the plaintiff's president had discovered that the bank had sustained a serious loss, though the exact amount could not be determined; that this loss was not sustained through the legitimate brokerage business of Kenneth Donnellan or the Kenneth Donnellan Company, which it was represented to these defendants was the only business that Kenneth Donnellan had with the bank; that these losses were stock gambling losses; that the assistant cashier, Broberg, was a "partner" and coadjutor and co-operator with Kenneth Donnellan in these stock gambling transactions; that Broberg was to share in the profits and losses of these transactions, and advanced the bank's money for these speculations; that the transactions were all eo nomine those of the Kenneth Donnellan Company, and on the books of that company were kept accounts in the name of Broberg, showing his interest in these transactions, though subsequently and at the request of Broberg, and when an investigation was imminent, his name was erased, and a fictitious name entered in place thereof. As to the first guaranty of $10,000, which, it will be remembered, was surrendered and canceled when the later $30,000 guaranty was given about a month later, it is shown that Broberg, as an officer of the bank, went to J. W. Donnellan and solicited from him and his wife this guaranty on behalf of the bank. He knew at the time that Kenneth Donnellan or the Kenneth Donnellan Company was indebted to the bank in an amount exceeding the guaranty sought, and not only concealed this knowledge, but represented that Kenneth Donnellan was doing a safe and lucrative business. He described the business as a purely brokerage business; that stocks were bought by Kenneth Donnellan upon the order of customers; that Kenneth Donnellan, not having the money to pay for the stocks, secured the money from the bank, the stocks being returned to the bank; that a draft was drawn against the purchaser; the bank received the money when the purchaser paid for and took the stock, and, if he failed so to do, the only possible loss to the bank was the depreciation of the stock which might result between the time it was bought by Donnellan and the time when, after repudiation by the purchaser, it could be sold upon the market; that, in the nature of things, this prospective loss was negligible, but that there was a short interval of time during which the bank had put out this money and was without security to protect itself, and that the bank itself, or the bank commissioner, thought that some such security should be given, and the bank would accept this guaranty from the defendants, which they could give without risk. Such, in brief, was the evidence touching the giving of the first guaranty. The second guaranty was given under the active solicitation and procurement of the president of plaintiff, who had come to know the nature of these transactions and that the bank had sustained a heavy loss because of them. The president represented to J. W. Donnellan, the father of Kenneth, that he was very fond of his son and desired to continue business with him, describing the business which the son was doing, as had Broberg. He explained that the possibility of loss was extremely remote; that the son's business was increasing, and his transactions growing so large that a greater security than the $10,000 guaranty was desirable. J. W. Donnellan did not know that his son had been speculating; did not know that any loss on account of speculation had been incurred; and as to pre-existing indebtedness knew only of the minor amount hereinbefore mentioned, which was subsequently discharged by payment. After giving the guaranty, he sought information touching the condition of his son's account with the bank, and could obtain none. Kenneth Donnellan testifies that, after the president discovered the bank's loss, he was sent for by the president and informed that the loss figured up in excess of $31,000. He went repeatedly to the bank in the matter of his accounts, and the president suggested that he endeavor to secure a guaranty from his father to cover this indebtedness. He told the president that it would be useless for him to try to secure such a guaranty. The president then told him to refrain from speaking to his father about it, but to allow him (the president) to present the matter, because he thought he could do so in such a manner as not to alarm the father. The nature of Kenneth Donnellan's business having become known to the president of the bank, the bank's funds were no longer available to him, and after the date of the guaranty no money was ever advanced by the bank to him or the Kenneth Donnellan Company. Therefore the only indebtedness of Kenneth Donnellan or of the Kenneth Donnellan Company was that which had arisen, under the circumstances indicated, before the giving of the guaranty. Mrs. Donnellan executed the guaranty with her husband upon the representations made by him, which representations were as hereinbefore set forth. The president of the bank himself testified:

That, in requesting the $30,000 guaranty from Mr. Donnellan, he did not inform him of the speculative business done by his son or the Donnellan Company, nor that there was a loss, or that there might be a loss; that "my purpose was to get from Col. Donnellan and his wife the larger guaranty. If Col. Donnellan had wanted to get any information from me he could have asked for it, and I would have responded to any inquiry made or have given him any statement he asked for. I certainly was not going to frighten him by saying that there was a big loss in the bank here, and I wanted him to give me a guaranty. Q. If you had told him that it probably would have frightened him, and he probably would not have given the guaranty? A. He is human. Q. And, being human, if he knew what you knew, he would not have given the guaranty? A. I didn't say that. His affection for his son—he was responsible largely for the business being in the bank, and he might say, it is on me for any losses."

Touching numerous statements testified positively to by Mr. Donnellan as having been made by the president during the course of their conversation—statements going to the safe nature of the brokerage business done by his son and the remote possibility of loss—when asked if he had made them, the witness failed to remember. It has been necessary thus to state the evidence because of the underlying question of law which, as has been previously intimated, controls the creditor under such circumstances, and the applicability of which law is, therefore, most important in determining whether or not fraud was perpetrated upon the defendants. Or, phrased differently, what was the legal duty of disclosure incumbent upon the president in soliciting this guaranty under the circumstances indicated? If he did in this matter all that the law requires; if he disclosed, so far as disclosure was incumbent upon him; if there was no suppression of which the defendants could with justice complain—then no fraud was committed in the procurement of the contract; and to this final underlying consideration we are thus brought.

[7] Two distinct elements enter into the fraud charged and found against the plaintiff: The first that of positive misrepresentation; the second that of concealment of facts and circumstances affecting the situation of the parties important for the intending guarantors to know, known to the plaintiff's president soliciting the guaranty and concealed by him. The first of these are the representations testified to by the defendant J. W. Donnellan to the effect that the plaintiff's president informed him that his son was doing a large and prosperous brokerage business, and conveying by implication, and by silence upon other matters, that this was all of the business which he was doing. The concealments were of the admitted facts that plaintiff's president did not disclose to him that the loss had already been incurred; that it had been incurred through stock gambling, in which an officer of the bank was jointly interested with his son; and that the loss was so large that it probably exceeded the amount of the guaranty requested. Can it be debated whether or not these misrepresentations and this concealment, so found by the court, are sufficient to avoid the contract? The principles of equity and the adjudicated cases applying them return but one answer. The case, it is to be borne in mind, is not that where the surety or guarantor comes forward at the request of the debtor and simply offers to give the creditor a certain guaranty. In such cases the general holding is that no duty of disclosure is incumbent upon the creditor; since, without breach of any faith, he may assume that the debtor himself has informed the intending surety of all that the latter desires to know. His duty therefore is performed if he fully and fairly answers the questions put to him, and conceals nothing which he himself believes might influence the surety's conduct. Such was the case relied on by appellant of Hamilton v. Watson, 12 Clark & Finnelly, 107, where the House of Lords decided that:

"A surety is not of necessity entitled to receive, without inquiry from the party to whom he is about to bind himself, a full disclosure of all the circumstances of the dealings between the principal and that party. If he requires to know any particular matter of which the party about to receive the security is informed, he must make it the subject of a distinct inquiry." (The quotation is from the syllabus.)

But the general principle of English jurisprudence, as well as American, is that laid down by the same House of Lords in Railton v. Mathews, 10 Clark & Finnelly, 934. The facts were that one had become a surety in a bond for the fidelity of a commission agent to his employers. After some time the employers discovered irregularities in the agent's accounts, and sued on the guaranty. The surety instituted his suit to avoid the bond on the ground of concealment by the employers of material circumstances affecting the agent's credit prior to the date of the bond; these circumstances being that the agent's accounts had been irregular, and that he had taken money of his employers. These circumstances, it was contended, if communicated to the surety, would have prevented him from undertaking his obligation. The judge directed the jury that:

"The concealment, to be undue, must be willful and intentional, with a view to the advantages the employers were thereby to gain."

The House of Lords held this instruction to be erroneous in point of law, and declared:

"Mere noncommunication of circumstances affecting the situation of the parties, material for the surety to be acquainted with, and within the knowledge of the person obtaining a surety bond, is undue concealment, though not willful or intentional, or with a view to any advantage to himself."

(The quotations are again from the syllabus.)

That this is the governing principle in the American as well as in the English courts is abundantly established.

"The contract of surety imparts entire good faith and confidence between the parties in regard to the whole transaction. Any concealment of material facts, or any express or implied misrepresentation of such facts, or any undue advantage taken of the surety by the creditor, either by surprise or by withholding proper information, will undoubtedly furnish a sufficient ground to invalidate the contract." Story, Eq. Jur. § 324.

"If the creditor conceal any fact unknown to the proposed surety which, had he known it, would have deterred him from becoming surety, * * * it is a fraud upon him, and relieves him from obligation. Especially is this so where the obligation is entered into at the request of the person to whom the security is given." Schoonover v. Osborne, 108 Iowa, 453, 79 N. W. 263.

And without further quotations reference may be made to De Colyar on Guaranties, 369, 370; Daniel, Negotiable Instruments, § 1309; Brand, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 126; Jungk v. Holbrook, 15 Utah, 198, 49 Pac. 305, 62 Am. St. Rep. 921; Hall v. Clopton, 56 Miss. 555; Gist v. Feitz, 43 Neb. 238, 61 N. W. 621; Doughty v. Savage, 28 Conn. 146; Wilmington, Columbia & Augusta R. R. Co. v. Ling, 18 S. C. 116; Springfield v. Park, 3 Ind. App. 173, 29 N. E. 444; Dinsmore, Trustee, v. Tidball, 34 Ohio St. 411; First Nat. Bank, etc., v. Terry (C. C.) 135 Fed. 621; Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Van Slyke, 49 Hun, 7, 1 N. Y. Supp. 508; Franklin Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 180; Harrison v. Lumbermon, etc., Ins. Co., 8 Mo. App. 37; Benton Co. Sav. Bank v. Boddicker, 105 Iowa, 548, 75 N. W. 632, 45 L. R. A. 321, 67 Am. St. Rep. 310; State v. Sooy, 39 N. J. Law, 135.

To sum up, then, defendants were solicited to give the guaranty by plaintiff's president. The latter knew that the amount of the guaranty was equaled by a pre-existing debt due to the bank from the stock gambling transactions of Kenneth Donnellan and their assistant cashier. He knew that J. W. Donnellan and his wife did not know this, and it was a material circumstance affecting the contract. The contract, in contemplation of the defendants, was one under which they would incur little or no risk out of the transactions of a legitimate brokerage business conducted by their son with plaintiff. The contract into which they were induced to enter was one whereby they agreed to pay $30,000 already lost to the bank by the gambling operations of their son. Plaintiff's president did not inform them of this, for the avowed reason that he did not propose to tell J. W. Donnellan anything which might cause him not to sign the guaranty. The duty of disclosure rested with plaintiff's president, and he did not make it.

The finding is therefore supported, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FEDERATION OF LOS ANGELES
v. WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 3999.)

WILLS — 489 — EVIDENCE TO AID CONSTRUCTION—IDENTITY OF DEVISEE—STATUTE.

Where testator bequeathed a certain part of his estate to a body or society designated as "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles," at which time there was an existing corporation known as "the Los Angeles Woman's Christian Temperance Union," and another known as "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California," and another subsequently federated and incorporated as "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Federation of Los Angeles," there was an ambiguity within Civ. Code, § 1340, providing that, where there is an imperfect description in a will or no person exactly answers the description, the mistake may be corrected by extrinsic evidence, and the testimony of the one who drew the will that testator informed him that he wanted to give a bequest to an organization owning and conducting the Temperance Temple on the hill at Broadway and Temple streets, and that witness, after inquiry as to its name, wrote the designation in the will, and that the society conducting the temple was "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California," was admissible, and showed the testator's intent to bequeath the property to that corporation.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rivers, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Samuel W. Little. Contest between the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Federation of Los Angeles and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California and others. Judgment for contestee Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California, and contestant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Blanchard and Will D. Gould, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Elizabeth L. Kenney and Steward & Steward, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Samuel W. Little in May, 1902, made his will bequeathing a certain part of his estate to a body or society which he designated in his will as "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles." At that time, according to the evidence in the case, there was a corporation in existence having the corporate name of "the Los Angeles Woman's Christian Temperance Union." There was also another corporation in existence whose corporate name was "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California," and an association or federation of societies which was known at that time by the name of the Union of Unions, but which subsequently became incorporated under the name of "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Federation of Los Angeles."

Each of these three bodies, upon the distribution of the estate, applied for the legacy or bequest given to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles. Each claimed to be the body designated by that description.

It is a mistake to say that the order of words in a corporate name is not important or may not be necessary in order to designate the body corporate intended. Very many illustrations might be given of that fact. For example, there is or has been a corporation known as the Southern California Railway Company and also a corporation known as the California Southern Railway Company, two distinct corporations distinguished only by the fact that the word "California" comes first in one and second in the other. It appears on the face of this record from the applications of the claimants alone, in connection with the will, that the designation "the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles" does not describe exactly either one of the corporations appearing to claim the legacy. The words "Los Angeles" come at the end of the designation, and thus distinguish it from the first-named corporation, and from the others as well. This of itself created an ambiguity. There were three corporations with names none of which correspond exactly to the designation given in the will, and the inquiry at once arose which one of these three came within the intention of the testator.

It comes exactly within the case provided for by section 1340 of the Civil Code; that is, a case where no person or property exactly answers the description. In that case the section provides that the omissions and mistakes must be corrected if the error appears either from the face of the will or from extrinsic evidence. In this case extrinsic evidence was introduced consisting of the testimony of Mr. Avery, who drew the will. He testified that Mr. Little informed him that he wanted to give a bequest to an organization which owned and conducted the Temperance Temple on the hill at Broadway and Temple streets; that he did not know the name himself; and that he then telephoned to the Temple, was answered by some one, inquired as to the correct name of the society that was conducting the Temple, and was informed that it was the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles. Thereupon he wrote in the will the words which made the legacy payable to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles. Evidence was given in addition to the effect that the society for which he inquired, and which owned and conducted the Temperance Temple on Temple and Broadway, was not the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles, but that its correct name is the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California.

From this evidence the court decided that the testator intended to give this legacy to the corporation described as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California, but which is designated by the above name in the will—a mistake which could be corrected under section 1340.

There is some suggestion that evidence of this character is not admissible. The case of Estate of Dominici, 151 Cal. 181, 90 Pac. 448, is direct authority for the proposition that in case of an ambiguity of this kind the instructions of the testator given to the persons who drew the will at the time it is drawn and the occurrences that took place at that time may be proven to ascertain the person to whom the legacy is to be given and for the purpose of ascertaining the true intent of the will. In Estate of Donnellan, 164 Cal. 16, 127 Pac. 166, similar authority may be found. There are other cases to the same effect. It is the opinion of the court that under these decisions and under section 1340 the evidence was properly introduced, and that it is amply sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the true intent was to give this bequest to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Southern California.

The order of distribution is affirmed, and it is ordered that the remittitur issue forthwith.

GHRIEST v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (L. A. 3713.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1915.)

1. ELECTRICITY — 10½ — REGULATION — RAILROAD COMMISSION — ORDER — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

The action of the Railroad Commission, in ordering a certain light and power company to construct an electrical transmission line from one city served by it to another served only by petitioner for review, violated no constitutional right of such petitioner for review, although such power company would compete with him and injuriously affect his business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. — 10½.]

2. ELECTRICITY — 10½ — REGULATION — RAILROAD COMMISSION — HEARING — NOTICE.

Where petitioner for review received insufficient notice of the hearing before the Railroad Commission, at which it was determined by such Commission to order a certain power company to construct a transmission line to the city, which the plaintiff alone had supplied, but was yet present at such hearing, he waived the insufficiency of the notice, in the absence of action in excess of jurisdiction on the part of the Commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. — 10½.]

3. ELECTRICITY — 10½ — REGULATION — RAILROAD COMMISSION — FAILURE TO OBSERVE RULES — STATUTE.

The mere failure by the Railroad Commission, in exercising its legitimate powers, by way of ordering a power company to extend its lines to a municipality formerly served solely by petitioner's company, to observe the rules adopted by it relative to practice and procedure does not render its order in excess of jurisdiction, or one reached not regularly, pursuant to authority under Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 48) § 53, providing that no informality in any proceeding shall invalidate any order or decision of the Commission.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by L. Ghriest against the Railroad Commission of the State of California. Denied.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of review wherein petitioner seeks to have reviewed and set aside an order made by the Railroad Commission, determining that public convenience and necessity require the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Pacific Light & Power corporation of an electrical transmission line from Dominguez in Los Angeles county to the city of Newport Beach, and the construction, operation, and maintenance of an electrical distributing system in the city of Newport Beach. The petitioner is, and for a long time has been, operating in said city an electrical generating plant and an electric distributing system, and the effect of the order of the Commission will be that the Pacific Light & Power corporation will enter into competition with him, and he will be injuriously affected by such competition.

The order complained of was one made under the provisions of section 50 of the Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 43), which prohibit such a public utility as the Pacific Light & Power corporation from extending its service into a city, etc., theretofore served by a public utility of like character, without having first obtained from the Railroad Commission a determination that the present or future convenience and necessity requires or will require such extension.

[1-3] The scope of our inquiry regarding orders of the Railroad Commission was exhaustively discussed in the opinions in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company v. Eshleman et al., 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652. Under the views there expressed, it is clear that the petition here affords no warrant for the issuance of a writ. If it be conceded that we may, in such a proceeding, inquire whether any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States is violated by the action of the Commission, notwithstanding there was no excess of jurisdiction on the part of the Commission, it is clear that no such violation is shown by the allegations of the petition. Even if we assume that petitioner was entitled to notice of the hearing and an opportunity to be heard, he was present at the hearing in response to what he now says was an insufficient notice, and, so far as appears, was not denied the opportunity to be heard. It is not stated that he requested any postponement of the hearing. Nor can we see that any excess of jurisdiction on the part of the Commission is shown. The claim is that the application and procedure thereon did not conform in certain respects to the rules adopted by the Commission relative to such application and the hearings thereon. It is clear that it must be held that the mere failure of the Commission to observe rules adopted by it relative to practice and procedure does not render its order one in excess of its jurisdiction, or warrant us in holding that the Commission has not "regularly pursued its authority." Indeed, it is expressly provided in the Public Utilities Act that "no informality in any proceeding * * * shall invalidate" any order or decision, made by the Commission. Section 53.

The application for a writ is denied.

Ex parte STEPHAN. (Cr. 1900.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1915.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — 205 — STATUTES — 72 — UNIFORM OPERATION — PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES — CLASSIFICATION — "PERSONAL PROPERTY BROKER."

St. 1909, p. 969, amended by St. 1911, p. 978, which by section 1 declares that one engaged in loaning or advancing money on the security of chattel mortgages, or personal property, or on security of a lien or assignment of, or power of attorney relating to, wages, shall be deemed a "personal property broker," sections 2 and 3 of which allow such brokers to charge and receive 2 per cent. a month, and section 5 of which requires such brokers, on making any loan or advancement, to give the borrower a memorandum showing the name of the lender, the nature of the security, etc., and which declares the failure to give such memorandum to be a misdemeanor, is not in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 11, declaring that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, nor with section 21, forbidding the granting of special privileges and immunities to any class of citizens, which on the same terms are not given to all, since such business is peculiar and well known and capable of classification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 591-624; Dec. Dig. — 205; Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. — 72.]

2. STATUTES — 84 — GENERAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—REGULATION OF INTEREST.

Such act is not within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 23, forbidding special laws "regulating the rate of interest on money."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. — 84.]

In Bank. Application by A. H. Stephan, for a writ of habeas corpus, directed against D. A. White, Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded to custody.

Olin L. Berry, of San Francisco, for petitioner. C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and A. R. Cotton, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The petitioner was imprisoned on a charge of having violated the provisions of the act entitled "An act to define personal property brokers and regulate their charges and business," enacted April 16, 1909, and amended April 21, 1911. Stats. 1909, p. 969; Stats. 1911, p. 978. He asks a release from custody on the claim that the law is unconstitutional.

Section 1 of the law provides that every person "engaged in the business of loaning or advancing money" on the security of chattel mortgages or other contracts by which personal property is hypothecated as security for such loan and the use and possession thereof is not to be in the lender, or on the security of a lien upon, or assignment of, or power of attorney relating to "wages, salary, earnings, income or commissions," shall be deemed a "personal property broker." Sections 2 and 3 allow such brokers to charge and receive 2 per cent. per month as interest on the money loaned on such security, and provide that they shall not charge or receive more, either directly or under any pretext, as for costs, expenses, and the like. Section 5 requires such personal property broker, on making such loan or advancement, to give to the borrower a memorandum showing the name of the lender, the nature of the instruments taken as security, and certain other particulars of the transaction. It is further provided that contracts for such loans or advancements are void if a greater rate of interest or benefit than the statute allows is accepted therefor or provided for or agreed upon therein, and that a failure of the broker to give the memorandum required by section 5 is a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

[1] The petitioner was charged with being engaged in the business aforesaid and with having made such a loan upon the security of a chattel mortgage, without giving to the borrower the memorandum aforesaid.

Section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution declares that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Section 21 of the article forbids the granting of special privileges or immunities to any citizen or class of citizens, which, upon the same terms, shall not be given to all. Under the rules now well established in this state, we think it is clear that this statute does not controvert these provisions. It is not a violation thereof for the Legislature to enact laws applying to persons throughout the state, but only to those of a specified class, provided the distinctions which mark the class are those which reasonably arise out of the nature of the things composing it and distinguish them from others not embraced within it in such a manner that the peculiar legislation is not arbitrary or unreasonable. The legislative judgment as to what is a sufficient distinction cannot be overthrown by the courts, unless it is, beyond rational doubt, erroneous. No authority need be cited in support of these propositions. It follows also, as a corollary, that a decision holding such legislative judgment wrong in this respect with regard to one statute, upon the conditions relating to it, is not necessarily authority for a similar decision upon another statute, unless the facts and conditions are essentially the same in the one case as in the other. The decision in this particular is like any other decision on a question of fact—not a precedent, except for cases where the facts are the same.

The present case is not essentially different from Ex parte Lichtenstein, 67 Cal. 359, 7 Pac. 728, 56 Am. Rep. 713. In that case a penal law applying only to pawnbrokers was declared valid and constitutional on the ground that pawnbrokers constituted a class doing a peculiar business which the Legislature might justly consider required peculiar regulations. The business of pawnbroking is ancient, and its characteristics are, of course, well known. This is not true of personal property brokers. But we think it must now be conceded that, in the course of the development of modern civilization, the business of loaning money on chattel mortgages, or like instruments, and that of loaning or advancing money on assignments or other transfers of wages, earnings, and the like, as well, have become so well known and so capable of classification and recognition that the Legislature is entirely justified in describing them as a peculiar class and giving them the name of personal property brokers. Their business is as distinct in many respects from other classes of business as is that of a pawnbroker. Nor can it be denied that abuses have grown up in connection therewith which the Legislature might well deem to call for the regulations imposed by this law. This being the case, the limitation of the legislation to these classes alone does not destroy the uniformity of the law nor confer unlawful special privileges upon those persons not engaged in the business regulated.

[2] It is not a special law, within the meaning of subdivision 23, § 25, art. 4, of the Constitution, forbidding special laws "regulating the rate of interest on money." This proposition is settled by the decision in Ex parte Lichtenstein, supra, where the point was expressly decided with respect to the pawnbrokers act. No substantial difference can be seen between that act and the personal property brokers act, so far as the application of this constitutional provision is concerned.

We do not consider the decision in Ex parte Sohneke, 148 Cal. 262, 82 Pac. 956, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, 113 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 475, as in substantial conflict with these views. The classification there condemned was far more arbitrary and fanciful than that made by this act. There the same kind of an act was punishable in different ways by one of the statutes declared invalid, according to the person who committed it. The other act declared invalid permitted loans upon mortgages of certain kinds of chattels without limitation as to the rate of interest, while forbidding loans upon such mortgages upon other chattels, except at a limited rate. This is apparently a distinction without a legal difference. There may be expressions in the opinion that are inconsistent with the views here given, but they are not essential to the decision, and should be disregarded.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner is remanded to the custody of the respondent.

In an action for injuries from a collision between an automobile and a motor car backing over a crossing, evidence held to show negligence on the part of defendant, and not to show any contributory negligence of plaintiff.

3. STREET RAILROADS ⇨117 — FAILURE TO LOOK AND LISTEN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries from a collision at a crossing with a motor car of a suburban railroad while running on a city street, the failure of plaintiff to look and listen before driving on the track was not, as a matter of law, negligence, since under such circumstances the railroad was a street railroad and the motor car a street car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-257; Dec. Dig. ⇨117.]

4. NEGLIGENCE ⇨122—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

6. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 296 — INSTRUCTIONS — CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for injuries from a collision between an automobile and a motor car, that neither defendant nor plaintiff had the exclusive right to use the street at a crossing, and each was obliged to take precautions to avoid collision, is not error when taken in connection with another instruction, stating that a motor car would have the preference in crossing.

The driver of an automobile and a motor car both have the lawful right to pass over a crossing, and reasonable care and precaution must be used by both to avoid a collision.

8. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 267 — INSTRUCTIONS — MODIFICATION.

An instruction that plaintiff would be guilty of contributory negligence proximately causing the accident if he failed to look for a car at a crossing is properly modified by leaving it to the jury to decide whether such negligence would be the proximate cause of the accident, where under the doctrine of last clear chance, such negligence might not have been the proximate cause.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Chester Bidwell against the Los Angeles & San Diego Beach Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leovy & Leovy, Geo. J. Leovy, and Thomas M. Leovy, all of San Diego, for appellant. James E. Wadham, Wadham & Cosgrove, and A. H. Sweet, all of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeals of the defendant are from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The action was to recover damages alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by the negligence of the defendant. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was driving his automobile along India street in San Diego, at the intersection of that street with C street; that the defendant was operating a railroad upon a track laid along C street and crossing said intersection; that while plaintiff was crossing the said car line in his automobile, the defendant ran a motor car backward on said car line without lights thereon or therein, and so carelessly and negligently managed said car that it struck plaintiff's automobile, greatly damaged the same and causing serious bodily injuries to plaintiff. The complaint is in two counts, one for the recovery of damages for the bodily injuries, the other for the damage to the automobile. The defendant pleaded contributory negligence of the plaintiff as an affirmative defense. The answer also denied the allegations of the complaint relating to the negligence of the defendant.

The defendant claims that the evidence is insufficient to prove that the defendant was negligent as alleged. The plaintiff testified, in effect, that as he was driving his automobile over the said crossing, along India street, crossing the said car track at right angles, the defendant's car struck the automobile and caused the injuries complained of; that it was a dark night, and that he did not see the car until it was within five feet of him; that the car had no headlight or rear light and was not lighted on the inside or at all; that the night was so dark that he could not see the car; that no gong or bell was sounded, or other warning given, by the persons in charge of the car or by any other person; that the lights on the automobile were lighted at the time; that the car, after striking the automobile, ran about 50 feet further along the track, pushing the automobile with it, before it came to a stop. It also appeared that its rear truck had then left the track, and that the car was backing along the track when the collision occurred. Two other persons who were riding in the automobile with Bidwell at the time of the accident, and a person who saw the accident while standing near the intersection, also testified, corroborating the plaintiff in all material particulars.

[1, 2] This evidence is sufficient to support the allegation that the defendant's negligence was the cause of the accident. There was evidence of witnesses produced by the defendant which flatly contradicted the direct testimony of plaintiff's witnesses concerning the absence of lights and the failure to sound the gong or bell. The finding of the jury upon this conflicting evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal. We must therefore hold that the evidence of the defendant's negligence was sufficient to support the verdict.

[3] It is also claimed that the evidence showed that the negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the injury. It is said on this point that it was the plaintiff's duty to look and listen before attempting to cross the defendant's car track, and that there is no evidence that he did either. The failure of a person to look or listen for an approaching car before crossing a street car track in a city is not always and under all circumstances an act of negligence. Hamlin v. Pacific, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 779, 89 Pac. 1109; Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 677; Lawyer v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 56, 118 Pac. 237; Roberts v. Spokane, etc., Co., 23 Wash. 335, 63 Pac.

506, 54 L. R. A. 184; Traver v. Spokane, etc., Co., 25 Wash. 237, 65 Pac. 284; 36 Cyc. 1554. The defendant was operating a railroad line carrying passengers between San Diego and La Jolla, one of its suburban resorts. The car in question was a so-called "motor car" propelled by a gasoline engine located at one end of the car in front of the space occupied by passengers. The defendant did not have the exclusive right to use C street in that part of its course. It was used in common by the defendant and other vehicles. In the manner in which the road was operated on that street, the railroad was a "street railroad," and the car was a "street car," as those terms are defined by the authorities, so far as the duties and obligations of its operators and persons about to cross the track, respectively, to use ordinary care was concerned. 36 Cyc. 1545. According to the authorities above cited, the failure of plaintiff to look and listen, if it is assumed that he did fail, was therefore not, as matter of law, negligence on his part, but at most a question to be determined by the jury. But aside from this question, the point is without merit.

[4] The defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative one, and the burden of proving it rests upon the defendant. The defendant cannot rely on the failure of the plaintiff to prove that he was not guilty of negligence, but must produce or show evidence to prove it. Zibbell v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 241, 116 Pac. 513. The plaintiff, it is true, did not testify that he did look and listen to ascertain if a car was approaching before starting to cross the track, although his testimony is that he would have seen the car if it had been lighted, but on the other hand he did not testify that he did not look or listen, and the evidence does not show that he failed to do so. As the burden was on the defendant to prove such failure, it cannot be said that contributory negligence was established, or that the verdict was contrary to the evidence with respect to that subject.

[5] The testimony of the plaintiff that the two glasses of beer and the glass of wine which he had drunk during the afternoon and before the accident did not have any perceptible intoxicating effect on him, and the testimony of his two companions and of other persons who saw him at the time of the accident, stating that he was not intoxicated, was properly admitted. People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 8, 14 Pac. 373; People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 511, 48 Pac. 495; People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 51, 55 Pac. 692.

[6] Instruction 5, to the effect that neither the defendant nor the plaintiff had the exclusive right to use the said streets at said intersection; that neither had a superior right to the other thereon, and that each would be obliged "to take reasonable precaution to avoid collision each with the other," when taken in connection with that part of instruction 7 which states that a motor car would have the preference in crossing first at said intersection, was not erroneous. Lawyer v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., supra; Hamlin v. Pacific, etc., Co., supra; Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., supra.

[7] The part of instruction 7 declaring, in substance, that both the plaintiff and defendant had lawful right to pass over the intersection, and to "require reasonable care and caution of those traveling on the other road to avoid collision," is in harmony with the law given in the cases last above cited. It does not, as appellant seems to claim, declare that the plaintiff had the right to be negligent himself and charge the defendant with the consequences.

[8] The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"29a. Plaintiff has testified that at the time and prior to the accident, he knew of the crossing where the accident of this defendant occurred, and that the motor car of defendant ran thereon, and such evidence is uncontradicted. Under these circumstances it was his duty to look and listen before going upon the track of defendant, and if you find from the evidence that an ordinarily careful and prudent man in possession of all his faculties, had he looked and listened, would have become aware of the approach of said motor car and the danger of collision in time to have avoided said accident by the use of ordinary care and prudence, and that plaintiff failed to look or listen and went upon said crossing when it was too late for defendant's employé operating said motor car, by the use of ordinary care, to have avoided said accident (then plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence proximately causing the accident and cannot recover)."

The court modified this instruction by striking out the portion included in parentheses, and inserting the following:

"Then plaintiff, was guilty of contributory negligence, and if you find that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, the plaintiff cannot recover"

—and as so modified the instruction was given and numbered 29. We think this modification was properly made. The plaintiff may have been guilty of contributory negligence, and yet, under the doctrine of the "last clear chance," such negligence might not have been the proximate cause of the accident. Green v. Los Angeles T. Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 41, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68. That question was properly left for the jury to determine.

[9] Certain instructions, asked by the defendant and refused by the court, to the effect that if the plaintiff knew of the existence of the track crossing the street at that point, he should look and listen for a car approaching thereon, in so far as they correctly state the law, are fully covered by the instruction 29a above quoted.

We do not find any other point mentioned in the briefs that we consider worthy of notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Joseph Fearon against Antonio Fodera and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart, Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, T. C. Van Ness, Jr., and Ira S. Lillick, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A hearing of the above-entitled cause was ordered before this court. After due consideration, we are satisfied with the opinion and decision of the Court of Appeal for the First District, by Presiding Justice Lennon, which is hereby adopted and made the decision of this court. It is as follows:

In this action the plaintiff sought and recovered a judgment quieting his title to certain lands in the county of Fresno, and awarding him damages as well against certain of the defendants for what in law is known as "slander of title." The complaint, in effect, charged that the defendants Antonio Fodera, Rose Fodera, J. J. Rauer, T. C. Tognazzini, and W. D. Shawhan had conspired to unlawfully incumber and cloud the plaintiff's title to the lands in question. In this behalf the complaint alleged substantially that the defendants Antonio Fodera and Rose Fodera, with the knowledge and connivance of all of the defendants mentioned, falsely represented that they had some claim upon the lands of plaintiff; that thereupon the defendants Antonio Fodera, Rose Fodera, and J. J. Rauer prepared what purported to be a deed, signed by the Fodera defendants, as grantors, describing and conveying to the defendants Tognazzini and Shawhan the lands of the plaintiff; that the defendant Rauer thereupon signed and acknowledged the deed mentioned as a witness to the execution thereof; that thereafter the Fodera defendants caused said deed to be recorded in the county of Fresno; and that the same has ever since constituted a cloud upon plaintiff's title to the land described therein. In substance and effect, the complaint further alleged that the purpose of the Fodera defendants in making said deed was to create a lien upon the common interests which the defendants De Long and the M. K. & T. Oil Company might have had in the lands described in the deed, when, in truth and in fact, the Fodera defendants well knew and had notice that the lands described in the deed were the property of the plaintiff, and not of the defendants De Long and the M. K. & T. Oil Company; that by reason of said conspiracy the plaintiff was embarrassed in the free use and disposition of his lands, and had been damaged thereby in the sum of $1,000. The complaint also alleged that the defendant Swiss-American Bank, by reason of the deed referred to, claimed some interest in the plaintiff's lands, but that said claim was without any right whatever.

The defendant Rauer defaulted. The remaining defendants, save and except De Long and the M. K. & T. Oil Company, joined issue upon the allegations of the complaint. In addition to denying all of the allegations of the complaint, the defendants Tognazzini and the Swiss-American Bank eventually disclaimed any interest in the plaintiff's lands. The answer of these defendants further averred that at the time of the execution of the deed in question the Fodera defendants were indebted to the bank in the sum of $12,946; that the Fodera defendants represented to Tognazzini, who was at that time the vice president of the bank, that he (Fodera) was the owner of the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint, and that the defendants De Long and the M. K. & T. Oil Company merely held said property in trust; that the Fodera defendants transferred and conveyed said property to the defendants Tognazzini and W. D. Shawhan as additional security for the payment of the Fodera indebtedness to the bank; that Tognazzini, Shawhan, or the bank did not make any search of the records of Fresno county to ascertain the true status of the title to the property in question, but relied solely upon the representations made to them by the defendant Antonio Fodera. The answer of the defendants Tognazzini and the bank concluded with the prayer that, if it was found that the Fodera defendants had any interest in the property in question, it be decreed that such interest was subject to a lien by way of first mortgage to the bank.

After the trial commenced the defendants Tognazzini and Swiss-American Bank filed a supplemental answer, unequivocally disclaiming any interest in the plaintiff's lands, and alleging that subsequent to the institution of the action the defendant Tognazzini had executed a quitclaim deed to the Fodera defendants because they had paid their indebtedness to the bank. The defendants M. K. & T. Company and De Long by their answer also absolutely and unequivocally disclaimed any interest in the plaintiff's lands.

Upon a trial of the issues thus framed, the lower court made its findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff, and, among other things, found that the Fodera defendants, Rauer, Tognazzini, Shawhan, and the Swiss-American Bank never had any reason or right to claim that the Fodera defendants, De Long, or the M. K. & T. Oil Company had or ever had any right, title, or claim in or to any part of the lands described in the plaintiff's complaint. It was further found that the defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company never had or claimed any interest in such lands. Thereupon judgment was rendered and entered against the defendants Fodera, Rauer, Shawhan, Tognazzini, and the Swiss-American Bank, wherein it was decreed that the plaintiff have and recover from each of the defendants named the sum of $435, as damages for the alleged slander of plaintiff's title. The judgment declared further that the deed from the defendants Fodera to the defendants Tognazzini and Shawhan was null and void, and that each of the several defendants above named be perpetually enjoined from asserting any claim to the land in controversy adversely to the plaintiff.

The defendants Tognazzini and Swiss-American Bank took an appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying them a new trial. Notice of appeal from the judgment was served upon all of the defendants in the action, save and except De Long and the M. K. & T. Oil Company. Notice of intention to move for a new trial and notice of appeal from the order denying a new trial were served upon the plaintiff, but not upon any of the codefendants. The plaintiff now moves that the appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial be dismissed.

[1] The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is grounded primarily upon the contention that the defaulting defendant Rauer and the disclaiming defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company were adverse parties, whose interests would necessarily be injuriously affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment rendered and entered against the remaining defendants, and that therefore notice of appeal should have been served upon them in order to confer upon this court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

This contention cannot be sustained. Conceding, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that before this court can take cognizance of an appeal prosecuted and perfected under the old method of appeal notice thereof must be given to all parties to the action, including the nonappealing defendants whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal may be injuriously affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment or order appealed from, this rule cannot be successfully invoked in aid of the motion to dismiss in the present case. It is apparent from the record before us that the interests of the particular defendants who were not served with the notice of appeal cannot in any wise be affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment rendered against the appealing defendants. The defendant Rauer has not appealed from the judgment taken and rendered against him by default; and a reversal or modification of the judgment as against the appealing defendants cannot adversely affect the existing rights or interests of Rauer, because in any event the judgment against him will stand as originally entered. In short, a reversal of the judgment appealed from would not nullify the default of the defendant Rauer nor dissolve the judgment rendered against him. Therefore, with respect to the defendant Rauer, it is manifest that he is not an adverse party on whom service of the notice of appeal was required to be given. Randall v. Hunter, 69 Cal. 80, 10 Pac. 180; McKeany v. Black, 46 Pac. 381; Kenney v. Parks, 120 Cal. 22, 52 Pac. 40.

[2] We are unable to perceive how a reversal or modification of the judgment rendered and entered against the appealing defendants can possibly affect the interests or alter the situation of the disclaiming defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company. The judgment appealed from is absolutely silent as to these disclaiming defendants, and therefore, in so far as they are concerned, cannot be considered a judgment at all. Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178.

In brief, it does not appear from the record before us that there has been any determination of the plaintiff's claim against the defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company, and consequently a reversal or modification of the judgment appealed from would not materially alter the situation in which they were left at the conclusion of the trial of the case. French v. McCarthy, 110 Cal. 12, 42 Pac. 302.

We do not see that the result would be different even if it be conceded, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that a reversal of the judgment appealed from would leave the defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company liable to a future judgment which might be rendered in the case in the event of a new trial being granted. By their answers the defendants last referred to disclaimed unequivocally any interest in the land in controversy; and consequently, as against them, any future judgment which might be rendered in the action could give to the plaintiff only that which, in effect, already had been granted by disclaimer. Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 613, 23 Pac. 1109.

This being so, it seems clear to us that in any event the defendants De Long and M. K. & T. Oil Company have no interest in the subject-matter of the action or the judgment appealed from which could possibly be affected, adversely or otherwise, by the result of this appeal; and therefore it was not essential that notice of appeal should have been served upon them. Deiter v. Kiser, 162 Cal. 315, 122 Pac. 469.

[3] It is the contention of the plaintiff that the appeal from the order denying a new trial should be dismissed, because neither the notice of intention to move for a new trial nor the notice of appeal from the order denying a new trial was served upon any of the codefendants in the action against whom judgment was entered. This contention cannot be sustained. It is based upon the erroneous assumption that a new trial must be granted to all of the defendants against whom judgment was entered if it should be found that the appealing defendants are entitled to a new trial. It will be remembered that the appealing defendants ultimately unequivocally disclaimed any interest in the lands in controversy. Consequently they are interested in, and complain solely of, that phase of the judgment which calls for money damages against them as joint tort-feasors. It was the common-law rule that the reversal of a judgment against several joint tort-feasors, and the granting of a new trial for error committed to the prejudice of one defendant, necessitated a reversal of the judgment and the granting of a new trial as to all of the defendants. This rule, however, has been materially modified, if not entirely superseded, by the statutory rule in force in this jurisdiction. It is now the statutory rule in this state that, if a judgment be given against several defendants who have been sued as joint tort-feasors, the judgment, if found to be erroneous as to any one of the defendants, may be vacated as to that one only, and be continued in full force and effect as to the remaining defendants who have not appealed. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 578, 579; Nichols v. Dunphy, 58 Cal. 605; Cole v. Roebing Construction Co., 156 Cal. 443, 105 Pac. 255; Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178; Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513.

[4] Incidentally the point is made upon the motion to dismiss that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was ineffectual, because the intention, as stated, was "to move the above-entitled court to vacate the judgment entered in the above-entitled matter, and to grant a new trial in said cause." It is the plaintiff's contention that, inasmuch as the proceedings leading up to a new trial are initiated only by a motion to set aside the decision (Code Civ. Proc. § 657), the notice of intention should have been "to vacate and set aside the decision." This point is without merit. The language of the notice of intention in the present case is identical with the language employed in the notice of intention given in the case of Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21, 30 Pac. 957. There the court, in effect, held that, although the notice of intention did not in terms refer to the decision sought to be vacated, nevertheless the language employed effectively notified the prevailing party of the intention to move for a new trial, which, if granted, necessarily would vacate the decision. This was held to be sufficient; and upon the authority of the case cited it must be held that the notice of intention in the present case was in all respects legally sufficient. See, also, Hoover v. Wolfe, 167 Cal. 337, 139 Pac. 794.

It follows from what has been said that the motion to dismiss must be denied.

[5] The judgment appealed from is assailed upon the ground that the evidence does not support some of the findings of fact made by the trial court, and also upon the ground that, in so far as the remaining findings are supported by evidence, such findings do not in turn support and warrant the judgment rendered and entered against the defendants Tognazzini and Swiss-American Bank.

We are satisfied that this contention must be sustained. The gist of plaintiff's cause of action, in so far as it controls the judgment for damages, was, in effect, that the defendants Antonio and Rose Fodera, Rauer, Tognazzini, and Shawhan had unlawfully and wrongfully conspired to slander plaintiff's title to the property described in the complaint, and that, in pursuance of such conspiracy, each of said defendants, with the knowledge and consent of one another, falsely represented and pretended, by the means and methods hereinbefore narrated, that they had some claim upon the plaintiff's lands. It will be noted in passing that plaintiff's complaint did not expressly charge the defendant Swiss-American Bank with knowledge of or participation in the conspiracy complained of. The defendants Tognazzini and the bank having disclaimed any right, title, or interest in the lands in controversy, the only issue as against them remaining to be determined was that of the alleged slander of plain-tiff's title. Walden v. Peters, 2 Rob. (La.) 331, 38 Am. Dec. 213; Hewitt v. Seaton, 14 La. 159.

Upon the issue of slander of title there was offered in evidence upon behalf of the plaintiff the deposition of the defendant Tognazzini, which, in effect, was as follows: At the time the deed in controversy was executed the defendant Antonio Fodera was indebted to the Swiss-American Bank, of which institution the defendant Tognazzini was manager, in the sum of approximately $14,000. This indebtedness was variously, but insufficiently, secured. Prior to the execution of the deed Fodera had been pressed for payment and threatened with foreclosure proceedings by the bank. Fodera was unable to meet the demand of the bank, and thereupon, in consideration of the making of the deed in controversy an extension of time was granted him in which to pay his indebtedness. Tognazzini, upon behalf of and as trustee for the bank, accepted the deed as additional security, solely upon the representation of Fodera that he had an interest in the property conveyed. Subsequent to the institution of this action Fodera paid his indebtedness to the defendant bank, whereupon Tognazzini executed to Fodera a quitclaim deed to the land in question, and thereupon filed in the action an absolute and unequivocal disclaimer of any right, title, or interest in the lands of plaintiff.

Aside from the mere fact of the execution and acceptance of the deed referred to, the plaintiff apparently relied on the testimony of Tognazzini to support the claim that the bank and Tognazzini had conspired with the remaining defendants to slander plaintiff's title. At any rate, the record before us is barren of any other evidence which tends even remotely to connect Tognazzini and the bank with the conception and consummation of the conspiracy alleged and established against the other defendants. The testimony of Tognazzini as detailed in his deposition was not disputed, and in keeping therewith the trial court found: "That the defendant Antonio Fodera * * * represented to said defendants W. D. Shawhan and T. C. Tognazzini that he (said Fodera) was interested in the property, * * * and that the same was held in trust by the said M. K. & T. Oil Co. and D. M. De Long for him, the said Antonio Fodera; that thereupon said Antonio Fodera and wife * * * executed the deed as additional security for the payment of the indebtedness then due and owing from said Antonio Fodera and Rose Fodera, his wife, to said Swiss-American Bank; * * * that said T. C. Tognazzini * * * relied solely on the uncertain and vague representations of Antonio Fodera without making any investigation as to the truth of the statements of said Antonio Fodera; that at the time of taking said deed said T. C. Tognazzini and the Swiss-American Bank had no actual knowledge that plaintiff was the owner of said real property."

Standing alone, this finding will not support the judgment for damages for slander of title rendered against defendants Tognazzini and Swiss-American Bank. The finding of the trial court undoubtedly was sufficient to convict the designated defendants of carelessness in consummating a business transaction involving the title to real property; but neither the finding referred to nor the evidence upon which it was based justifies the conclusion that the deed in controversy was knowingly accepted in furtherance of a conspiracy to slander plaintiff's title to the property described in the deed. "Slander of title," as recognized by the law, may be defined to be defamation of title to property, real or personal, by one who falsely and maliciously disparages the title thereto, and thereby causes the owner thereof some special pecuniary loss or damage. Newhall on Slander of Title, p. 203; Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151. Admittedly, under this definition, slander of title may be committed by maliciously clouding the title to real property and causing damage to the owner thereof by the execution, willful acceptance, and malicious recordation of a deed which falsely declares the title of the property involved to be in a person other than the true owner. In short, an action for slander of title may be based upon defamatory words contained and published in an executed deed. It is essential, however, to the maintenance of such an action that the party claiming to be aggrieved by an alleged slanderous disparagement of his title should show, among other things, not only that the statements complained of were false, but that they were maliciously made with the intent to defame, and thereby disparage, the title involved. In other words, malice, express or implied, in the making of slanderous statements, is an essential ingredient of a cause of action for damages for slander of title, without proof of which such action must fail. Chesebro v. Powers, 78 Mich. 472, 44 N. W. 290; Harrison v. Howe, 109 Mich. 476, 67 N. W. 527; Walkley v. Bostwick, 49 Mich. 374, 13 N. W. 780; May v. Anderson, 14 Ind. App. 251, 42 N. E. 946; Cardon v. McConnell, 120 N. C. 461, 27 S. E. 109; Hopkins v. Drowne, 21 R. I. 20, 41 Atl. 567; Hines v. Lumpkin, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 556, 47 S. W. 818; Malachy v. Soper, 3 Bing. N. C. [Eng.] 371; Walden v. Peters, supra; Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151; Newell on Defamation, 206, 207, 322; Towns. Lib. & S. 138; Odgers, Lib. & S. (5th Ed.) pp. 80, 84; Folkard on Slander & Libel (7th Ed.) p. 55.

In the present case the plaintiff undoubtedly established his claim of clear title to the lands in controversy; but, aside from this, the showing made by him, and the finding of fact above referred to, meet the requirements of the law of the case, in so far as the issue of damages for slander of title was determined against the appealing defendants, in the particulars only that the slanderous statements uttered and published in the deed relied upon as a cause of action for damages were false and proximately provocative of damage to the plaintiff. It was neither shown in evidence nor found in the finding referred to that the designated defendants were actuated by malicious motives when they accepted and published the deed from the Foderas. It was, as has been shown, essential to the plaintiff's cause of action for damages that such malice be proved and found; and the burden of proving malice, express or implied, rested upon the plaintiff. True, malice may be fairly implied in any given case from proof of the falsity of an uttered or published defamation when the attendant circumstances convincingly point to the inference that the party charged with the slander of title was not in good faith endeavoring to uphold or assert a supposedly valid claim of title in himself. Such, however, is not the case here. The particular finding of fact referred to is utterly silent as to whether or not the acceptance and recordation of the deed in controversy were prompted by malice, express or implied; and this is so in all likelihood because the undisputed evidence upon the whole case not only fails to show, either expressly or by fair implication, that malice was the motive which induced the defamation complained of, but, to the contrary, compels the conclusion that the appealing defendants were actuated solely by an honest, but mistaken, belief that the lands described in the deed in question had been legitimately conveyed to them. This being so, there is no escape from the conclusion that the facts found by the trial court in the finding referred to fall short of constituting a wrong which, in contemplation of law, will support the judgment rendered against the appealing defendants upon the theory that they had committed an actionable slander of plaintiff's title. Odgers, Libel & Slander (5th Ed.) pp. 80-84; Butts v. Long, 106 Mo. App. 313, 80 S. W. 312; Walkley v. Bostwick, 49 Mich. 374, 13 N. W. 780.

Other findings of fact were to the effect: (1) That the defendants Tognazzini and Swiss-American Bank had conspired with Fodera to incumber plaintiff's title, and, in pursuance of such conspiracy, accepted the deed in controversy and placed the same on record; (2) that said defendants and each of them never had any reason to claim that Fodera had any interest in the plaintiff's lands; (3) that said defendants did not act in good faith in taking the deed from Fodera.

These findings are absolutely unsupported by any direct evidence; and, as we have already indicated, it cannot be fairly said that the circumstances of the transaction as revealed by the evidence upon the whole case show, or tend to show, that the deed in controversy was accepted and recorded by the defendant Tognazzini for any purpose save the one testified to by him. In short, the only direct evidence upon this phase of the case was contained in the deposition of Tognazzini, and that evidence, standing as it does uncontradicted and unimpeached by the admitted facts and circumstances of the transaction, compels, we think, the conclusion that, although not entirely free from fault, the appealing defendants nevertheless, in good faith and without malice, asserted what they honestly believed to be a valid claim of title to plaintiff's property.

"The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The judgment, in so far as it purports to assess damages against the defendants, Tognazzini and the Swiss-American Bank, is reversed. The order denying the motion of said defendants for a new trial is affirmed as to all issues relative to the title to the land described in the complaint, and in all other respects is reversed."

SINNIGE v. OSWALD et al. (L. A. 4049.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1915.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇐211 — ACCEPTANCE OF LOWER RENT—EFFECT ON LEASE.

The acceptance by a landlord of a lower rent than that specified in the lease is not sufficient to establish a change in the lease so as to affect the amount of rent due in the future, although working a settlement of rent accruing during the period for which the lower amount was accepted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 840-845; Dec. Dig. ⇐211.]

2. GUARANTY ⇐87—ADMISSIONS — EXECUTION OF GUARANTY BY CORPORATION—AUTHORITY OF OFFICER—PROOF.

In an action against a furniture corporation which had guaranteed payment of rent of an apartment house to the amount of $1,000, where the attorney for the defendant admitted the signature of the guaranty was that of the president of the corporation, while the answer admitted that it guaranteed the payment of rent up to the amount of $1,000, objection, to the admission of the guaranty in evidence, on the ground that no authority of the president to execute such a contract had been shown, was properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. ⇐87.]

3. GUARANTY ⇐42—GUARANTY OF RENT — CONSTRUCTION.

In an action against defendant furniture corporation on its guaranty of the rent of an apartment house up to $1,000, where the lease covered a term of 10 years calling for monthly payments during that period, the total aggregating over $40,000, the expression of the guaranty "up to the amount of $1,000" was designed to fix a limit to the guarantor's total liability, meaning that it did not bind itself beyond such sum, but did not mean that its liability under such guaranty was to cease as soon as rent amounting to $1,000 had been paid under the lease by the lessee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. ¶42.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶195 — SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT—WAIVER OF DEFECT—OBJECTION.

In an action for rent, where a supplemental complaint was filed by leave of court, seeking rent accruing since suit brought, and defendants answered such complaint on the merits, going to trial without objection to the presentation of evidence to sustain its allegations, they waived, and could not raise after judgment the objection that the subject-matter of such supplemental complaint was not properly brought into the case.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Harry H. Sinnige against Helen Agatha Oswald and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Boone and John J. Brennan, both of San Diego, for appellants. Hoff & Chatterson, of San Diego, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This cause comes here on an order for a rehearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District. That court filed an opinion which states the essential facts, and makes satisfactory disposition of most of the legal questions presented. From that opinion we quote:

"The plaintiff brought this action to recover judgment for several installments of rent claimed to be due from the defendant Helen Agatha Oswald as lessee of an apartment house. Plaintiff owns the property as grantee from the lessors and is also assignee of the lessors' right under the lease. Judgment was obtained against Mrs. Oswald for the full amount of rent claimed, and against defendant Frevert-Bledsoe Furniture Company for $1,000, claimed under a written guaranty of the payment of the rent to the extent of $1,000. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

"The lease was for 10 years and was made in March, 1912, while the house was in course of construction, and the rent began on May 1, 1912, at the specified rate of $347 per month. Rent in excess of $1,000 was paid before the time when the installments became due that are involved in this action. Rent for May, June, and July, 1912, was paid at the $347 rate. Thereafter rent was paid to the lessors and subsequently to the plaintiff at the rate of $317 per month, to and including April, 1913. Defendants claim that the lease was changed, by reduction of the rent, for the entire term, bringing it down to $317 per month. There was not at any time a written modification of the terms, but the smaller amount was accepted from time to time and receipts in full were given for the installments then paid.

"The complaint herein was filed on June 11, 1913, for the sum of $347, as rent of May, 1913, and for the further sum of $347 as rent of June, 1913. On October 10, 1913, a so-called supplemental complaint was filed demanding the same sum of $347 as July rent. The only demurrers were to the original complaint and were overruled. The action was tried upon the first complaint and the supplemental complaint and the answers of the defendants.

[1] "The finding that there was no change in the terms of the lease in the alleged particular of reducing the rent is sustained by the evidence. Concessions of the kind that were shown by the defendants, when supported by a consideration, are valid to the extent that a lower rent has been tendered and accepted as satisfaction in full of the installments thus paid. They are not sufficient to establish a change in the written contract so as to affect the amount of future installments of rent where no such change of terms has been made in writing. Estate of McDougald, 146 Cal. 196, 199, 79 Pac. 875.

[2] "The contract of guaranty attached to the lease reads as follows:

"In consideration of, and as an inducement to, said lessors' leasing the property described in the foregoing lease to said lessee, the Frevert-Bledsoe Furniture Company, a corporation, hereby agrees to and does assign and transfer to said lessors its interest in the furniture purchased or that may be hereafter purchased by said lessee from said corporation, for use in said building hereinbefore described, and which may be placed therein by said lessee, to the extent and amount of the payment or payments which have been or which shall hereafter be made thereon by her to said company; and the said corporation hereby agrees to and does guarantee to said lessors the payment of the rent in said lease specified at the times and in the manner therein stated up to the amount of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000), which said guarantee is to hold good and to be in full force and effect until said furniture is fully paid for and until said lessee executes and delivers to said lessors the chattel mortgage provided for in the foregoing lease, contemporaneously with and as a part of which lease this agreement is executed.

"Frevert-Bledsoe Furniture Co.,

"By W. L. Frevert, President."

"When this document was offered in evidence, counsel for the defendant furniture company admitted that the signature was that of W. L. Frevert, and that he at the time of signing was president of defendant corporation, but objected to the admission of the instrument in evidence upon the ground that no authority had been shown of the president of the company to execute a contract of guaranty, and particularly this contract of guaranty. The answer of this defendant denied that it guaranteed the payment of said rent at the time or in the manner stated in said lease, or at all, 'except that the lessors should be paid up to the amount of $1,000,' and further alleged 'that said agreement made by it was subsequent to the making of said lease and was made without consideration.' In view of these admissions, the court did not err in overruling the objection above stated."

We adopt the foregoing portions of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal as our opinion on the points thus discussed. Our views on the remaining questions are as follows:

[3] The defendant furniture company contends that its contract of guaranty did not extend beyond the sum of $1,000 agreed to be paid by the principal as rent under the lease; and that, since the evidence shows payment by the lessee of more than $1,000 of such rental, it follows that the guaranty is fully satisfied.

This contention cannot, we think, be sustained. The lease covered a term of 10 years, and contemplated monthly payments during that period. The purpose of the guaranty was to provide the lessor with security for these successive payments of rent. The total rental aggregated over $40,000, and the words "up to the amount of $1,000" were designed to fix a limit to the guarantor's total liability. The guarantor was not binding itself beyond $1,000, but up to that point it guaranteed "the payment of the rent in said lease specified." The rent guaranteed was the rent for the entire period, not merely for the first three months. This, we think, would be the fair construction of the instrument, if the words just quoted stood alone. The correctness of the interpretation is the more apparent upon a consideration of the further provision that the guaranty is to hold good until the furniture is fully paid for and a chattel mortgage thereof delivered to the lessor. It is perfectly plain from the record that the parties did not contemplate that the furniture would be fully paid for and the mortgage executed before the lapse of many months. Until this was done the lessor was to have the guaranty as security. It certainly was not intended that, if the tenant paid rent for the first three months, the lessor should be without any security, whether by way of mortgage or of guaranty, for the balance of the term. The fair meaning of the instrument, taken as a whole, is that the lessor is to have the security of the $1,000 guaranty, until it can be replaced by a chattel mortgage on the furniture.

[4] A supplemental complaint was filed by leave of court, asking recovery of rent for the third month (July), accrued after the commencement of the action. Perhaps the subject-matter was not properly brought into the case, but the defendants answered the supplemental complaint on the merits, and went to trial without making any objection to the presentation of evidence offered to sustain the allegations of the pleadings. They cannot be permitted to raise the objection for the first time after judgment. Groom v. Bangs, 153 Cal. 456, 96 Pac. 503.

The judgment includes rents for the entire month of July, 1913. It appears that the lessor demanded and the tenant surrendered possession of the premises about the middle of that month. The appellants contend that there should be a proportionate abatement of the July rent. The respondent has stipulated that such abatement may be allowed, and we need not therefore pass upon the correctness of the contention thus made. Pursuant to this stipulation the judgment against both the lessee, Mrs. Oswald, and Frevert-Bledsoe

Furniture Company, the guarantor, should be reduced to $867.50.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified as above indicated, and that as so modified it stand affirmed.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The appellants are not to recover costs.

In re MOORE'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3978.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1915.
Rehearing Denied May 13, 1915.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\S$ 184—ALLOWANCE TO SURVIVING WIFE—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1464, giving a widow a reasonable provision for her support until letters of administration are granted and the inventory of her husband's estate is returned, section 1466, declaring that if the property of the estate set apart, such as household furniture and homestead, is insufficient, the court may make a reasonable allowance out of the estate for the widow's maintenance during its settlement, and section 1467, declaring such allowance may, in the court's discretion, be effective from the death of decedent, a widow was entitled to an allowance during the entire period of widowhood, which might be retroactive and was not lost by her failure to apply for it; and, where there was no property to pay the allowance, she might resort to the statutory provision in order to obtain credit and necessities, and her remarriage before obtaining an order for an allowance did not deprive her of her right to apply for and secure the allowance.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Phillip K. Moore, deceased. From an order on settlement of the administrator's account allowing an item of credit for money paid to the widow for support during widowhood, certain parties appeal. Affirmed.

Waldo M. York and Harry M. Irwin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Charles Lantz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The decedent Moore died, according to the evidence, on February 4, 1910. His widow was appointed administratrix of his estate, and qualified and continued to act as administratrix until February 23, 1912, when she resigned. She remarried a Mr. Fraser on October 9, 1911, and after that marriage, but on the same day, she applied for the order in controversy here for the payment of an allowance out of the estate of Moore for her support during the period of her widowhood, that is, for the period elapsing from Moore's death in 1910 to the date of her remarriage in 1911. The court made an order granting her an allowance of $60 a month, payable out of the estate of the decedent, amounting to $1,210. Upon her resignation Mr. Lantz was appointed administrator of the estate. She filed an account of her administration, and that account was settled in March, 1912. It made no mention whatever of the order for a family allowance. It shows, however, that no funds were on hand at the time out of which any allowance could have been paid. Subsequently Mr. Lantz filed his account of his administration, claiming credit for $1,210 paid to the widow in satisfaction of the allowance. That item was objected to by the other parties interested in the estate. The court overruled the objection and settled the account, allowing the item. From that order this appeal is taken.

Section 1464 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that on the husband's death the widow is entitled to a reasonable provision for her support until letters of administration are granted and the inventory is returned. Section 1466 proceeds to declare that if the property of the estate set apart, meaning the household furniture and homestead, is insufficient for her support, the court must make a reasonable allowance out of the estate for her maintenance during the settlement of the estate. Section 1467 further declares that:

"Such allowance, whenever made, may, in the discretion of the court or judge, take effect from the death of the decedent."

It is clear from these provisions that the widow is entitled to an allowance, which may be retroactive, covering the period from the date of the death of the decedent. She does not lose her right to an allowance by failing to apply for it. Under any reasonable construction of these sections she is entitled to it during the entire period of widowhood. If she had made her application the day before her marriage and had obtained it, we do not presume it would be contended that she was not entitled to the money thereby allowed. The fact that she waited until after her marriage before making the application does not prevent her from receiving the allowance. The fact of her marriage did not deprive her of the right to apply for and secure the allowance. This right is not a vested right in the property of the decedent; it is a mere right to prefer a charge, and the allowance may or may not be granted. She may or may not enforce it. But if she gets the order before the estate is closed, she is not deprived of the right by a remarriage before obtaining the order.

The cases relating to homesteads are not applicable to this question. The homestead, as counsel for respondent has said, looks to the future enjoyment, and is made for the purpose of securing to the widow a place in which to live during the time she may require it. She loses that right when she marries some one else. Therefore, when she does not make application until after she marries, the right is gone. The same is not true in case of a family allowance. This case is an illustration of it. There was no property to pay a family allowance, yet under the policy of the law the estate was bound to support her so long as she remained the widow of the decedent and until the close of the administration. The necessity for her support existed all the time, and she would be entitled to resort to the statutory provision in order to obtain credit and secure necessities. The case of Bacon v. Perkins, 100 Mich. 183, 58 N. W. 835, is to the same effect. In that case the statute appears to be the same, in effect, as ours, and the case is authority for the conclusion here reached.

The order is affirmed.

TROPICO LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO. v. LAMBOURN. (L. A. 3320.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1915.
Rehearing Denied May 10, 1915.)

1. COVENANTS ⇨46, 104—BREACH OF WARRANTY—"COVENANT OF WARRANTY"—REMEDY.

A covenant of warranty, in a deed purporting to convey title, is an undertaking by the grantor that on the failure of the title which the deed purports to convey, either for the whole estate or for a part only, by the setting up of the superior title, he will compensate in money the grantee for a loss sustained, and the remedy for a breach of warranty is limited to an action for damages, and a suit for specific performance of the warranty is not maintainable.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨12 — ACTION MAINTAINABLE.

The court will not render a decree of specific performance where it is unable to compel performance of the decree.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇨224—ESTABLISHMENT OF CLAIMS—CONTINGENT CLAIMS.

A claim contingent on a breach of warranty by a grantor since deceased must be allowed and established as a contingent claim against the grantor's estate, and, unless properly presented, an action for breach of warranty is not maintainable under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500 prohibiting the holder of any claim against an estate to maintain any action thereon unless the claim is first presented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 768-788; Dec. Dig. ⇨224.]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇨225—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—TIME LIMIT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A claimant, to bring himself within the exception in Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, providing that all claims must be presented within the time limited in the notice and any claim not so presented is barred, provided that when it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant that he had no notice by reason of being out of the state, the claim may be presented before decree of distribution is entered, must show, by affidavit, that by reason of being out of the state he had no notice of the publication of notice to creditors, but the proviso as to the showing by affidavit relates only to the method by which a claimant must present a prima facie right to avail himself of the benefit of the proviso.

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚡221—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—TIME LIMIT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Where a claimant against a decedent's estate did not present his claim within the prescribed time, and the court refused to allow the filing of the claim on the ground that claimant was a nonresident and had no notice of the publication of notice to creditors, the claim was, in effect, denied, and the claimant, bringing an action thereon, must not only establish the claim, but also show that he was within the proviso in Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, providing that claims not presented within the time limited in the notice shall be barred, provided that, when it is made to appear by affidavit that claimant had no notice by reason of being out of the state, the claim may be presented at any time before decree of distribution.

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚡225—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—TIME FOR PRESENTATION—EXCEPTIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

A foreign corporation, organized to do business in the state and transacting all its business in the state and holding in the state meetings of its board of directors, and having officers residing in the state, is within the state, and not within the proviso in Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, requiring the presentation of claims within the time limited in the notice, provided that, when the claimant had no notice, by reason of being out of the state, the claim may be presented at any time before decree of distribution.

8. ACTION ⚡45—JOINDER OF ACTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

An action against an executor of a deceased grantor for breach of the grantor's warranty in a deed and an action against devisees of the land conveyed cannot be joined, within Code Civ. Proc. § 427, defining what actions may be joined.

9. ACTION ⚡50—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.

An action against an executor of a deceased grantor for breach of the grantor's warranty in a deed and an action against devisees of the land conveyed cannot be joined because of misjoinder of parties defendant, because of the absence of unity of interest in the parties.

Angellotti, C. J., and Sloss, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Tropico Land & Improvement Company against Lucie M. Lambourn, executrix of the last will and testament of Susan Glassell Mitchell, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tom C. Thornton, Tobias R. Archer, and Denis & Loewenthal, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Oscar C. Mueller and Horace S. Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal was originally before the District Court of Appeal for the Second appellate district and transferred here on account of the inability of the justices of the district court to concur in a judgment. The opinions of the several justices of that court accompany the transfer. The main opinion was written by Mr. Justice SIIAW, and states the facts and points involved on the appeal. His conclusion on one of these points with which his Associates appear to have agreed, while entertaining a different view on another, is as follows:

"The facts appearing without dispute so far as pertinent to a consideration of the case, as shown by the first count of the complaint, which contains two counts, are as follows: Plaintiff is a corporation created under the laws of Arizona, and defendant is the executrix of the last will and testament of Susan Glassell Mitchell, who died December 31, 1907. On August 30, 1880, Andrew Glassell, who was the owner in fee thereof, executed a deed whereby he conveyed to his daughter, Susan Glassell Mitchell, the real estate in said deed described, 'for and during her natural life remainder to the issue of her body living at the time of her decease, forever, failing such issue of her body remainder to said E. H. Mitchell [her husband] for and during his natural life and remainder equally to the heirs of the party of the first part [the grantor] forever, and to the heirs of said H. M. Mitchell.' The grantee, Susan Glassell Mitchell, entered upon and continued in possession of the land so conveyed until October 28, 1905, when, in consideration of $52,500 paid her by J. B. Treadwell, she conveyed the same to him, and he and plaintiff corporation, to which he conveyed 106 acres of the land, entered upon and continued in possession thereof down to the bringing of this action. This deed so executed by Mrs. Mitchell to Treadwell contained a covenant of warranty made by the grantor, as follows: 'To have and to hold the same to the said J. B. Treadwell, his heirs and assigns forever; and the said first party [Susan Glassell Mitchell] does hereby covenant with the said J. B. Treadwell and his legal representatives that the said real estate is free from all incumbrances, and that she will and her heirs, executors and administrators shall warrant and defend the same to the said J. B. Treadwell, his heirs and assigns forever, against the just and lawful claims and demands of all persons whomsoever.' At the time Glassell conveyed the land to Mrs. Mitchell she had living two daughters, Lucie M. Lambourn and Eileen G. Bedford, and no other children. These two daughters, by deed duly executed, conveyed to their mother, Susan Glassell Mitchell, such interest and title as they had acquired in the land under and by virtue of the deed from Andrew Glassell to their mother, thus vesting in Treadwell the title and interest in the land, not only of Susan Glassell

Mitchell, but also that of her two children. Prior to the death of decedent, her daughter Eileen died, leaving surviving her a minor daughter, Lucile Richmond Bedford, who was born prior to the execution of the deed by Susan Glassell Mitchell to Treadwell. Lucie M. Lambourn as such executrix, in pursuance of an order of court, caused a notice to creditors of said decedent to be duly published, requiring all persons having claims against said deceased to present them, with vouchers, to the executrix for allowance within 10 months after the first publication of said notice, which was made on January 25, 1909, and thereafter duly published as required by law. On April 9, 1910, Lucile Richmond Bedford, then a minor, by her guardian commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against plaintiff and others, whereby she sought to have entered a decree adjudging her to be the owner of an undivided one-half of said premises so conveyed by Susan Glassell Mitchell to Treadwell. On April 14, 1910, plaintiff filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county a petition entitled In the Matter of the Estate of said Susan Glassell Mitchell, Deceased, wherein it asked for an order requiring the specific performance by Lucie M. Lambourn, as executrix, of the covenant of warranty so made by said decedent as contained in her said deed to J. B. Treadwell, claiming it was entitled to a conveyance from said executrix of all right, title, and interest of said Lucile Richmond Bedford in and to the property so conveyed to it by Treadwell, and wherein it alleged that said Lucile Richmond Bedford was willing to sell and convey her interest to said executrix at a fair valuation thereof, and alleging that said Lucile Richmond Bedford was ready, willing, and anxious to sell said property to said executrix at its reasonable market value, and that said executrix could, by paying the reasonable market value thereof, obtain a conveyance of such interest as Lucile Richmond Bedford had therein, which petition was, in August, 1910, by the court dismissed without prejudice to the rights of petitioner; that Lucile Richmond Bedford is willing and anxious to sell and convey her interest in the land to said executrix, or to any person whom she may nominate, for its reasonable market value, and said executrix can, by paying the reasonable value thereof, have the same conveyed to plaintiff. The value of the property of the estate of said Susan Glassell Mitchell, in excess of an amount sufficient to pay the claims against said estate other than under said covenant of warranty, was $300,000, all of which, under the terms of the will of said Susan Glassell Mitchell, was to be distributed to Lucie M. Lambourn. The prayer of the complaint, based upon this count, was for a decree requiring the executrix to purchase and procure from Lucile Richmond Bedford all her right, title, and interest in and to the property conveyed by Treadwell to plaintiff at a fair valuation thereof and convey the same to plaintiff. A demurrer interposed to this count of the complaint was sustained upon the ground that it did not appear therefrom that such or any claim had been presented for allowance to the executrix, as required by statute, and also for want of facts alleged sufficient to entitle plaintiff to specific performance of the contract of warranty made by deceased.

[1] "The alleged cause of action for specific performance is based upon a breach of the warranty contained in the deed of Susan Glassell Mitchell. By no rule of interpretation can this covenant of warranty be construed as a contract whereby she agreed to acquire and convey, or cause the owner thereof to convey, an outstanding paramount title to plaintiff. Her deed purported to convey the title, and the covenant was an assurance of title in fee to the land so conveyed to the grantee, was an agreement on her part to defend the same against the lawful claims of all persons asserting ownership thereof. 'The covenant of warranty in a deed conveying land, or any interest in land, is an undertaking by the warrantor that on the failure of the title which the deed purports to convey, either for the whole estate or for a part only, by setting up a superior title, he will make compensation in money, for the loss sustained by such failure of title.' King v. Kerr's Adm'rs, 5 Ohio, 155, 22 Am. Dec. 777. And in McGary v. Hastings, 39 Cal. 360, 2 Am. Rep. 456, it is said: 'It is well settled that the rule of damages where there has been an actual loss of the premises, is the purchase money and interest.' This rule, 'that the measure of damages is the consideration paid and interest to the date of the judgment of eviction,' says the author of Pingrey on Real Property (section 1461), prevails in nearly all the states of the Union. The land, by reason of its enhanced value due to accidental causes, might be worth several times the purchase price paid therefor, and a decree adjudging that defendant should acquire the outstanding title of Lucile Richmond Bedford, assuming she was willing to sell it at its present market value and convey the same to plaintiff, would be wholly unwarranted by the facts stated. The covenant of warranty is not a contract upon which such right can be predicated but merely a promise to make compensation in money for loss due to an eviction. The remedy in such case is to enforce the obligation assumed by the covenantor in an action at law for the damages sustained by reason of the breach of the covenant.

[2] "Moreover the decree asked for, if granted, is one which the court could not enforce. True, it is alleged that Lucile Richmond Bedford is willing to sell her interest at its market value; nevertheless, being under no obligation so to do, she might refuse to sell, in which case the court would be powerless to enforce its decree. The first count of the complaint is wholly wanting in stating facts upon which the court could decree specific performance as prayed for, and hence the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer thereto."

We are satisfied that the conclusion reached in the part of the opinion just quoted is correct, and adopt it as properly disposing of the point on this appeal there determined.

By the second count of the complaint, plaintiff adopted all the allegations of the first count and, in addition thereto, alleged that in April, 1910, after the expiration of 10 months from the first publication of notice to creditors, and after the commencement of said action by Lucile Richmond Bedford, and before the distribution of the estate, it presented to the executrix a verified claim in due form, shown to be a contingent claim, based upon said covenant of warranty, and presented therewith affidavits made by the president and secretary of plaintiff, which affidavits in substance are as follows: That plaintiff prior to October 14, 1905, was a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the territory of Arizona, having its office and principal place of business in the city of Phoenix, Ariz., of which territory it was a resident, and at all times prior to April 11, 1910, it had been out of the state of California; that it had no notice or knowledge, actual or otherwise, of the probating of the will of Susan Glassell Mitchell, or of the publication of any notice to creditors in the matter of said estate, or the appointment of an executrix thereof, until April 8, 1910; that by reason of the fact that said corporation is, and at all of the times mentioned has been, out of the state of California and a resident of the territory of Arizona and a nonresident of California, it had no knowledge or notice of the publication of the notice to file claims against the said estate, and for that reason its claim was not presented to the executrix of said estate for allowance as required by the statute. These affidavits, it was stated therein, were made for the purpose of obtaining permission to present said claim to the executrix of said estate. It was further alleged that on August 2, 1910, the superior court after due proceedings to that end, rejected said claim. Upon this count of the complaint plaintiff prayed for judgment establishing said claim as a good and valid claim against the estate of said Susan Glassell Mitchell, deceased. Section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever; provided, however, that when it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant, to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof, that the claimant had no notice as provided in this chapter, by reason of being out of the state, it may be presented at any time before a decree of distribution is entered."

In presenting its claim for allowance in the probate proceeding it was the purpose of appellant to bring itself within the exception provided by the above quoted section. Upon the trial the court found that plaintiff did, by petition, on April 13, 1910, apply to the superior court for permission to present its said contingent claim to the executrix for allowance, which application was supported by the affidavits set forth in the complaint, and the same was by the court denied; that the averments contained in the affidavits, to the effect that plaintiff at all the times therein mentioned was out of the state of California and had no knowledge or notice of the publication of notice to creditors of said estate, were untrue; that plaintiff's claim was never at any time presented for allowance to the executrix of the estate; and "that the second cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint is barred by the provisions of section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California"—and as a conclusion of law from the foregoing finding, found that the cause of action was barred by said section of the Code, and by reason whereof plaintiff was not entitled to have its claim established against the estate of said decedent. It was with reference to the correctness of this finding and the conclusion of the court thereon that the judges of the District Court of Appeal disagreed.

[3] The claim which the appellant presented originally for allowance by the court in the matter of the estate of the deceased being based upon the covenant of warranty referred to therein was contingent on a breach of the covenant, an event which might never occur, and the only way in which appellant could perpetuate its right to recover damages from the estate of the covenantor in case the breach should occur was by having it allowed and established as a contingent claim against the estate. Verdier v. Roache, 96 Cal. 467, 59 Pac. 480; Maddock v. Russell, 109 Cal. 417, 42 Pac. 139; Barto v. Stewart, 21 Wash. 605, 31 Pac. 554. Unless so presented no action could be maintained thereon. Section 1500, Code Civ. Proc.; Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 462, 93 Pac. 21.

[4, 5] The claim of the appellant, not having been presented within the time limit provided in the notice to creditors for the presentation of claims against the estate, was barred unless the appellant was entitled to the benefit of the exception contained in section 1493. In order to bring itself within that exception, it was necessary for appellant, in the proceeding in the matter of such estate, to make it appear by its affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge thereof that by reason of being out of the state it had no notice of the publication of notice to creditors. This appellant undertook to do by presenting its affidavit as heretofore stated, but this right to present its claim was denied by the court. Properly treating this as a rejection of its claim, appellant brought this action to have such claim established against the estate. In its answer the respondent denied that the appellant was, as stated in its affidavit presented in the probate proceeding, out of the state during the time limit provided in the notice to creditors, but that on the contrary, appellant was at all such time in this state. On the theory that an issue of fact as to whether appellant was or was not out of the state was thus presented and to be treated as any other issue of fact, general evidence in support of the position of respondent was received by the court, and its finding that appellant was not out of the state, and its conclusion therefrom that the right of the appellant to present its claim was barred by the provisions of section 1493, was based upon such evidence. The contention of appellant is that the trial of the case on the theory that any such issue was involved, or that general evidence might be received by the court upon it, was erroneous; that the only question involved in the case, as far as the right of appellant to have its claim established against the estate in this action, was whether the affidavit filed in the probate court proceeding, and presented to the court there, sufficiently showed to the satisfaction of the court that appellant was within the benefit of the exception as being out of the state during the time limit for presenting claims, and that the sole and only evidence which should have been received and considered on that question was the affidavit itself of the claimant presented in the probate proceeding; that no other evidence was proper or admissible. We cannot agree with this position of appellant. We do not think that any different rule applies in the matter of claims, permission to present which against an estate is applied for to the court or judge thereof under the exception, than applies to claims generally presented directly to the executor or administrator for allowance. While the law by virtue of the exception in section 1493 extends an advantage to claimants out of the state, it was not intended thereby to give them any superior advantage over other claimants, or to limit the power of the court as to its action with respect to such claims. All claims presented against an estate, whether inside or outside of the time limit, are required to be supported by affidavit setting forth certain facts. In the case of claims presented within the time limit neither the court nor judge nor the executor nor administrator of the estate is required, under any statement of facts in the affidavit, to allow the claim. It may be rejected, notwithstanding it may appear upon its face with its accompanying affidavit to be a valid claim. Certainly as to claims presented within the time limit and rejected, it would not be pretended in a suit subsequently brought to establish the claim, that the affidavit of facts stated therein would be any evidence in the matter. If the claim is rejected and a suit brought to establish it, the executor or administrator would be entitled to contest any fact set forth or relied on in the affidavit. The whole matter would be at large. There is no reason why any different rule should be applied to an application for leave to present a claim as coming within the exception to the statute which is denied, and a suit subsequently brought thereon. It is true that section 1493 provides that a claimant shall be entitled to the benefit of the exception where it is made to appear by his affidavit, to the satisfaction of the court or judge thereof, that he was out of the state during the time limit of the notice of publication. But we do not understand that the court or the judge in the probate proceeding is bound solely to a consideration of the affidavit.

This requirement as to the showing by affidavit of the claimant relates only to the method by which a claimant must present a prima facie right to avail himself of the benefit of the exception. It does not preclude the court from taking other evidence to satisfy itself whether the claimant, in fact, comes within the benefit of that exception. In our judgment the whole purpose of the section, as far as the exception in favor of absent claimants is concerned, is to give them simply an additional time beyond ordinary claimants to permit the presentation of claims which otherwise would be barred if the court, in the probate proceeding in which application for permission to do so is made, is satisfied it should be granted. Such claimants were not intended to be given any other or greater rights than ordinary claimants, and should stand upon no different footing as to actions brought to establish claims, the right to present which as coming within the exception, is denied, than should such ordinary claimants. If permission to present the claim is given, and it is thereafter allowed by the executor or administrator and approved by the court in probate, it stands, as other allowed claims, a legal charge against the estate. If permission to present it against the estate is denied, that is equivalent to a rejection of the claim, and it then is in the same position as any other rejected claim, and must be established by an action at law in which the claimant must affirmatively establish all matters which it was essential for him to make proof of in the first instance to the judge or court to whom application was made to be permitted to present it against the estate. It is true that under the exception to section 1493 all that it relates to is the right to present a claim. The claim, if permission is granted to present it, is still to be presented to the executor or administrator and to the judge for allowance and approval. But we do not see that this affects the principle. If the permission is refused, this is the equivalent to a rejection of the claim. There is no provision in the law for any review of the action of the court respecting it, except in an action brought on it as a rejected claim. In such action we think, as we have stated, that in the matter of supporting or defeating its validity, it is subject to the same rules as apply to other rejected claims.

[6] Within this view the fact of whether the appellant was absent from the state when the publication of notice to creditors was made was properly a matter at issue in this action to establish the claim. All evidence which bore on that issue was relevant for consideration, and was not to be confined to a consideration solely of the affidavit of the claimant presented when it applied for permission to present its claim against the estate. The judgment was based, as we have said, upon a finding that the right of the appellant to present its claim was barred by section 1493; that is, that the appellant did not bring itself within the exception contained in that section because the evidence showed that it was not out of the state at the time of the publication of notice to creditors. There can be no question but that the evidence sustains this finding. The appellant sought to bring itself within the exception of the section because it was organized as an Arizona corporation with its principal place of business within that state. While this statement is true, it further appears, however, that long prior to and during the entire time that the notice to creditors was being published all the property of the corporation was within this state, all of its officers and agents were here, all of its business, and really the only business it transacted, was transacted in this state, and all the meetings of the board of directors were held in this state. It is quite apparent, too, from the evidence, though the articles of incorporation were not introduced in evidence, that while the corporation was organized in Arizona it was so organized for the purpose of carrying on business in the state of California, which it did. While the residence of a corporation is within the state of its creation, it must, of course, be conceded that where comity of the laws of another state will permit of its doing so, it may operate entirely in such other state and there exercise all its franchise and functions. This is what this corporation was permitted to do under the laws of this state, and which it actually did and was doing when the publication of notice to creditors was running. All its officers and managing agents were residents of the state, and its active operations as a corporation were conducted exclusively in this state. In fact, as to this appellant corporation it is the only place where it had any active existence. When such foreign corporation accepts the privilege tendered it under our laws of doing business in this state and prosecutes that business here through its resident managing agent, it submits itself to the laws of this state, the jurisdiction of its courts, and is subject to the control and effect of its process. This is true as to process issued in suits instituted against such corporation in this state (section 411, Code Civ. Proc.), and it is equally true as to process generally. The publication of notice to creditors is statutory process, and when it has been given in compliance with the statute, as the proceeding under which it is given is one in rem, it is binding upon all the world except as to those who may be entitled to the benefit of the exception under section 1493. MacGowan v. Jones, 142 Cal. 593, 76 Pac. 503. This benefit is, however, only available to one who is out of the state during the time limit fixed in the notice to creditors. But a foreign corporation, operating here under the circumstances disclosed as to the operation of this appellant, is not out of the state, but within it while such time limit for the presentation of claims is running. Hence the benefit of the exception was not available to it, and its claim was barred by failure to present it within the time limit prescribed. In support of our conclusion that the appellant, though a foreign corporation, was, by reason of the facts recited, within the state and as embracing a more extended consideration of the subject, we cite Lawrence v. Bailou, 50 Cal. 258; Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 58 Pac. 180, 61 Pac. 99; Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 281, 110 Pac. 942, 139 Am. St. Rep. 120; Pinney v. Nelson, 183 U. S. 144, 22 Sup. Ct. 52, 46 L. Ed. 125; Turcotte v. Yazoo R. R. Co., 101 Tenn. 102, 45 S. W. 1067, 40 L. R. A. 768, 70 Am. St. Rep. 661.

[7] Appellant challenges two other findings of the court made in disposing of this second cause of action, and further claims that certain other issues were not found upon by the court. While it appears that the only material issue in said second cause of action was with reference to the claim filed by appellant against the estate, still in drafting its pleadings respecting it appellant incorporated by reference thereto certain allegations contained in the first cause of action, upon some of which the court made findings; as to others, it claimed it did not. We do not think the points made respecting the findings or want of findings have any merit. The controlling issue in the second cause of action was, as we have said, respecting the claim of appellant; the right to have it established as a claim against the estate. The finding of the court that the right of appellant to do so was barred by the statute disposed entirely of this second cause of action, and rendered it immaterial to find upon any other issues presented by the pleadings. Buell v. Brown, 131 Cal. 158, 63 Pac. 167; Fogg v. Perris Irr. Dist., 154 Cal. 219, 97 Pac. 316. This rule would have applied to the issues upon which the court did make the findings complained of if it had failed to do so, as they were immaterial in view of the finding that the right to present its claim was barred. But as the court did make them and appellant challenges their sufficiency under the evidence, we have examined them, and are satisfied that the objections of appellant are groundless.

[8, 9] When the case was called for trial, plaintiff applied to the court for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint, making Lucie M. Lambourn individually a party defendant therein, and showing that the entire assets of the estate, except $5, amounting to upwards of $225,000, were under the terms of the will of deceased distributed to her. The application was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. Section 1115, Civil Code, provides:

"Lineal and collateral warranties, with all their incidents, are abolished; but the heirs and devisees of every person who has made any covenant or agreement in reference to the title of, in, or to any real property, are answerable upon such covenant or agreement to the extent of the land descended or devised to them, in the cases and in the manner prescribed by law."

Conceding, as claimed by appellant, that under this section Mrs. Lambourn as devisee took the land devised to her subject to the payment of any loss suffered by plaintiff as a result of a breach of the covenant made by her deceased mother, nevertheless, the joinder of a cause of action based thereon with that set forth in the complaint is not authorized by section 427, Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, there would be a misjoinder of parties defendant by reason of the absence of unity of interest in the parties. The executrix as such could have no interest in the result of the suit.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and also in the opinion of Mr. Justice LORIGAN, except those portions thereof relating to the claim of appellant under section 1493, Code of Civil Procedure. As to these portions of the opinion, I concur in the views expressed by Presiding Justice Conrey of the appellate court, when this case was in that court, that the affidavits accompanying the claim of appellant against the estate of the deceased were not such as to require the judge in probate to permit the presentation of the claim after the expiration of the period fixed by law for the presentation of claims, and also in what he says as follows:

"Under section 1493, Code of Civil Procedure, a claim should not be presented after the expiration of the time otherwise fixed by statute, unless the fact that the claimant had no notice by reason of being out of the state 'is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant to the satisfaction of the court or a judge thereof.' The mere declaration of the officers of a non-resident corporation that the corporation has been organized and exists by virtue of the laws of another state or territory, where it has its office and principal place of business, is not alone sufficient to exempt it from the ordinary rule applying to the published notice to creditors. Notwithstanding the foreign creation and foreign residence of the corporation, it may be that it is transacting business in California and has in this state the offices, officers, and agents sufficient to cause it to be bound by an ordinary notice to creditors. The further declaration by those officers in their affidavits that the corporation had no notice or knowledge of the publication of notice to creditors, and that by reason of the fact of the corporation's absence from the state and residence in Arizona, it had no knowledge or notice of the publication of notice to file claims against the estate, amounts to nothing more as a statement of facts than a statement that the corporation and its officers did not actually know that such notice had been published. All the rest of the statement is mere assertion that, by reason of its nonresidence, etc., the corporation was without notice. This is mere conclusion that the corporation was without notice, a conclusion unwarranted in law, if in fact the corporation was transacting business in this state and had officers here capable of receiving service of process upon the corporation."

It follows that the judge in probate might reasonably hold that the matters stated in section 1493, Code of Civil Procedure, were not shown to "his satisfaction" by the affidavits, and refuse to allow the claim to be presented after the expiration of the period fixed by the statute. This being so, it is unnecessary to express any opinion on the questions whether the refusal of the judge to allow a claim to be presented after the time limited may be reviewed on appeal, or whether such refusal may properly be regarded as a rejection of the claim.

APPEAL AND ERROR 1002—REVIEW—VERDICTS.

A verdict on conflicting evidence or evidence from which different inferences may be drawn cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Leathery Anderson, a minor, by Nels Anderson, her guardian ad litem, against the Los Angeles Transfer Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morton, Hollzer & Morton, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is a suit for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff was standing in the street awaiting the approach of a street car, when she was struck by defendant's automobile. The evidence is conflicting in some respects, but there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff, a girl of 14, was standing at a place where she had a right to be; that the defendant's automobile, running at a speed of 20 miles an hour, came toward her in the same direction as the street car for which she was waiting; that the plaintiff saw the automobile approaching, but did not succeed in getting out of the way in time to avoid being struck by it. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The only point raised on the appeals is that the evidence shows that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the defendant was not guilty of negligence.

The rules of law governing this class of cases are thoroughly well settled, and it is unnecessary to cite authorities. The question of negligence is one of fact for the jury, and the finding of the jury cannot be overturned by the court where the evidence is conflicting, or where, although the evidence is without conflict, different inferences may reasonably be drawn from it. We are satisfied that the facts shown in the record were sufficient to justify the inference that the driver of defendant's car was guilty of negligence in running at the rate of speed at which he was going, without turning either to the right or the left to avoid the plaintiff, whom he saw standing on the street. On the other hand, the evidence equally justifies the inference that the plaintiff acted reasonably in assuming that the defendant's car would not continue in its course until a point of time when it would be too late for her to get out of the way, and that, when that time came, she attempted, with due care, but unsuccessfully, to escape. In short, it is a case where conflicting inferences may be drawn, and this court must sustain the findings of the jury.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte RICHARDSON. (Cr. 1910.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1915.)

1. LICENSES ⇨9 — ORDINANCES — LICENSE TAXES FOR REVENUE.

A city ordinance, which imposes a license tax on every person owning or controlling any slot machine at places specified in the application for license, but which contains no regulatory provisions, imposes taxes for revenue purposes only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Dec. Dig. ⇨9.]

2. LICENSES ⇨7 — ORDINANCES — LICENSE TAXES FOR REVENUE.

A city ordinance, imposing a license tax on persons owning or controlling slot machines, as a license tax for revenue only, and solely on the method of doing business and not on the business, is not authorized by the charter, declaring that no license tax can be imposed on any person who at any fixed place of business in the city sells merchandise, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners for the doing of the business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15, 19; Dec. Dig. ⇨7.]

3. LICENSES ⇨7 — ORDINANCES — LICENSE TAXES FOR REVENUE.

License taxes for revenue purposes must operate equally, and with uniformity, and any classification providing different charges for those engaged in the same business must be founded on some natural and reasonable distinction, pertinent to the matter; and an ordinance, imposing a license fee on persons owning or controlling slot machines at $2 per annum for each machine, except machines used to deliver raisins, which shall pay a license of $1 per annum, and except that single action slot machines, attached to chairs of theaters, delivering but one package without refilling, shall pay $8 per annum per 100 machines, or eight cents per annum for each machine, is invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15, 19; Dec. Dig. ⇨7.]

In Bank. Application for habeas corpus by Ralph M. Richardson, for his discharge from custody for conviction for violation of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco. Petitioner discharged.

B. B. Blake and Willard J. Smith, both of San Francisco, and Fred J. Goble, of Oakland, for petitioner. A. L. O'Grady and Jno. Floyd, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of a violation of the provisions of section 2 of Ordinance No.

765, as amended by Ordinance Nos. 1471 and 1537 (N. S.) of said city and county, and adjudged to pay a fine of $5, and in default of payment of such fine to be imprisoned for one day. Having refused to pay such fine he was taken into custody, and on his petition a writ of habeas corpus was issued to determine the question of the legality of his imprisonment.

The charge against petitioner was that he operated, owned, and controlled a certain machine, to wit, a match machine, with a nickel-in-the-slot attachment, at No. 230 Market street, without first having procured a license therefor from the tax collector of the city and county, as required by said ordinance. The complaint sufficiently states an offense under the provisions of section 2 of the ordinance, and the only question presented by this proceeding is as to the validity of said section.

The ordinance is one entitled "Imposing a license on nickel-in-the-slot machines." By section 1 a license fee or tax of $2 per annum is required of every person, etc., owning or having control of any machine, in or on which, on deposit of a piece of money, within said machine, any service is rendered by means of such machine, such, for example, as the playing of music, the registering of one's weight, etc., for each machine so used. Sections 2 and 3 of said ordinance are as follows:

"Sec. 2. Every person, firm or corporation owning or having control of any candy machine, chocolate machine, postage stamp machine, or any other machine or apparatus of any kind, character or description from which, on deposit of a five cent piece, or any other piece of money, or any article representing money, within said machine, candy, chocolate, postage stamps or other articles of merchandise (except raisins) are ejected or delivered, shall pay a license of $2.00 per annum for each machine so used; provided that machines delivering raisins shall pay a license of $1.00 per annum, except that for single action slot machines when attached to chairs or railings of theaters or other places of amusement, delivering but one package without refilling, every such person, firm or corporation shall pay at the rate of $8.00 per annum per one hundred machines so used, or eight cents per annum for each machine so used. Amended by Ordinance No. 227 (N. S.) approved June 11, 1907.

"Sec. 3. Every license hereunder shall be issued only to the licensee for said machine or apparatus at a particular place of business or location, and shall not be valid at any other place of business or location except by transfer there-to upon the written authorization of the tax collector. Every machine or apparatus so licensed must have conspicuously attached to it a metallic tag, to be furnished by the tax collector, numbered consecutively from the date of issue and showing the time for which issued."

Section 4 exempts such machines used in connection with any telephonic instrument operated by a telephone company, and section 5 provides that a violation of any provision of the ordinance shall be a misdemeanor, punishable in a prescribed way.

[1] The ordinance is utterly devoid of anything indicating that it was enacted in the attempted exercise of the police power of regulation, except in so far as the mere imposition of a license tax may indicate such a purpose. It simply provides that a specified license tax for each machine shall be paid, that the license shall be valid only for the use of the machine at a particular place of business or location, except when transferred upon written authorization of the tax collector, and that every machine so licensed must have conspicuously attached to it a metallic tag, showing the number and time for which issued. The provision as to the metallic tag is obviously simply for the purpose of requiring proof, apparent to any one who may care to observe, or whose duty it is to observe, that the required tax on any machine in use has in fact been paid. No duty is imposed on any person operating such a machine except to pay the tax. No power or duty is imposed on any officer other than to collect the tax and to furnish the metallic tag, except that a license issued for a particular place may be transferred for use at another place on authorization of the tax collector. No officer has a right to refuse to issue a license for any place designated by the applicant. The applicant designates the place or places, as he sees fit, and pays the tax, and the tax collector must then issue the tag or tags. There is no limitation as to the place of operation or on the number of machines. It has been held that the mere imposition of a license tax may indicate an exercise of the police power of regulation, but no such intent may fairly be implied from that fact here, when we consider the nature of the business involved. The business covered by section 2 is simply the sale and delivery in small quantities of any article of merchandise, upon payment of the stipulated purchase price therefor, by means of a mechanical contrivance operated automatically, which itself delivers the article purchased upon the deposit of the money required, without the necessity of the interposition of a salesman. It is this mode of making the sale and delivery that is the only attempted basis of the imposition of the tax, and there is no such difference between this mode, and the ordinary mode of sale and delivery of small articles of merchandise by means of a salesman as to furnish conceivable ground for supposing, in the absence of other regulatory provisions, that the charge was imposed either for the purpose of limiting the number of the machines in use, or for the purpose of reimbursing the city for the expense likely to be imposed on it in consequence of their use. See County of Plumas v. Wheeler, 149 Cal. 764, 87 Pac. 909. That this was not intended as a regulatory tax is further indicated by the attempted discrimination made in favor of such machines when used in delivering raisins. Of course it is apparent that there is no such distinction between raisins and all other kinds of merchandise as would warrant the lesser regulatory charge of $1 per annum for machines used in the delivery of raisins, as against $2 per annum for machines used in the delivery of any other article. It is to be observed that by its terms the ordinance applies alike to the tradesman, personally conducting his business at a fixed place of business, who installs in such place one or more of such machines, for the sale of certain articles of merchandise, and the owner and operator of such a machine who, by arrangement with such a tradesman, installs and operates it in his place of business. As to the tradesman so operating such a machine in his own place of business, it is obvious that there would be nothing but a mere change in his manner of selling—simply the adoption of a labor-saving device, dispensing with the necessity of a clerk or salesman in consummating a very small transaction. It may be that some regulatory provisions as to the use of such machines could be sustained as a valid exercise of the police power. However, we have no such question here, for none such is contained in this ordinance. Taking into consideration the language of the ordinance, the absence of regulatory provision, and the nature of the subject of taxation, we would be shutting our eyes to the obvious facts, were we to hold that the license tax here attempted to be imposed was imposed other than solely for the purpose of raising revenue. It is an attempted license tax for revenue purposes only on the prescribed method or manner of making sales of merchandise, a prescribed amount for each machine.

We are thus brought to the question whether the section of the ordinance involved can be sustained as a valid exercise of the power to impose a license tax for revenue purposes.

[2, 3] As the foregoing discussion has made apparent, the tax imposed by section 2 of the ordinance is imposed solely on such vendors of small articles of merchandise as use such a machine in making their sales and deliveries as is described therein. The vendor who sells and delivers the same articles through the medium of a clerk, salesman, or other human agency is not required to pay any license tax. Indeed, in view of the provisions of the San Francisco charter, no license tax can be imposed upon any person who "at any fixed place of business in the city and county, sells * * * goods, wares, or merchandise," except such as require, by express charter provision, permits from the board of police commissioners for the doing of their business (article 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15; Rapp v. Kiel, 159 Cal. 702, 115 Pac. 651), and such permits are required only as to a few classes of merchants, such as retail liquor dealers, pawnbrokers, peddlers, junk shop dealers, and dealers in secondhand goods. It is urged that all these machines are operated at fixed places of business in the city and county, within the meaning of the language of this provision, section 3 of the ordinance specially providing that the license must designate the particular place of business or location where the machine is to be used, and that those using them are therefore exempted from license tax by the charter. There is some force in this contention. But whether it be well based or not, we are unable to perceive any warrant for the discrimination against the vendor who uses such a machine in making sales and deliveries. The license tax attempted is one solely on his mode of making his sales and deliveries, without any reference whatever to the amount of business done. If he uses such a machine, or machines, for that purpose, he must pay a license tax of $2 per annum for each machine so used. If he sells and delivers the very same merchandise in any other manner, he is not required to pay any license tax at all. It is elementary that there must be equality and uniformity in the imposition of license taxes for revenue purposes, and that any classification, providing different charges for those engaged in the same business, a charge for some and exemption for the others, must be one founded upon some natural and reasonable distinction pertinent to the matter. So, different charges may be imposed on those engaged in the same business, proportioned to the amount of business done, estimated in many different ways (see Ex parte Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L. R. A. 946; Bramman v. City of Alameda, 162 Cal. 648, 124 Pac. 243), and this is the usual basis of any difference in the amount of charge on those engaged in the same business. But, and we are now speaking solely of revenue taxes, we know of no principle that warrants the imposition of a tax on some of those engaged in a certain business, solely because of the method they use in making their sales and deliveries, and the exemption of all engaged in the very same business who do not use that method. We are speaking, of course, of methods not involving any occupancy or use of public property, such, for instance, as the use by wagons of a public highway. A tax thus imposed is really one solely on the method used by the merchant, and not on the business, a tax of the same nature as would be one imposed on a tradesman solely because of his use in making sales of such articles as a computing scale, a cash register, a cash carrier, or some other such modern device. A difference in such mere methods of making sales and deliveries does not furnish a proper basis for classification of vendors of merchandise. The case of Seattle v. Denchor, 58 Wash. 501, 108 Pac. 1086, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1076, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 446, is directly in point, and sustains our conclusion that there is no legal ground for any such distinction as that attempted to be made by the city and county of San Francisco in this matter. The same principle was applied by this court in Ex parte McKenna, 126 Cal. 429, 58 Pac. 916, where an ordinance discriminating against merchants using trading stamps in the conduct of their business was declared invalid.

We are of the opinion that section 2 of the ordinance in question cannot be upheld as a valid enactment.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇐114—REQUISITES.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell land, the adequacy of the consideration and the fairness of the bargain must appear from facts alleged and proved.

Under Civ. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge. Action by J. A. McRae against Albert T. Ross and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McCoy & Gans and H. P. Andrews, all of Red Bluff, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and F. F. Marshall, of Dixon, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint is in four counts. The first alleges the ownership by defendants of a ranch in Solano county, containing 521.65 acres; alleges that in 1910, said defendants offered to sell said ranch to plaintiff, or to any one designated by him, for $41,000, and agreed that, in case of a sale to another, plaintiff was to have all of the price above $41,000, that in December, 1910, plaintiff secured a purchaser, who agreed with defendants to purchase the ranch for $62,468.87, and that nothing has been paid plaintiff. The second cause of action alleges that defendants placed the ranch in plaintiff's hands for sale, and authorized him to sell it for $41,000, agreeing that he was to receive as commission the purchase price above $41,000; that a sale had been arranged through plaintiff for $62,468.87, and that no part of the excess over $41,000 had been paid. The third count is based on the theory that plaintiff himself purchased the ranch for $41,000, but that defendants, acting in bad faith, refused to sell to him. The value of the ranch is alleged to be $62,468.87, and the difference between that sum and $41,000 is claimed as damages. The fourth count attempts to set up a cause of action for specific performance of the contract to sell to plaintiff for $41,000. The answer denies most of the allegations of the complaint. The court found against the existence of the contract and authorization set up in the complaint, found that plaintiff did not produce a purchaser, or accept any offer of defendants to sell the property to him, and that defendants are not indebted to plaintiff in any sum. Judgment went in favor of defendants for their costs.

[1, 2] The findings above outlined are sufficient to sustain the judgment so far as the prayer for a money judgment is concerned. Whether or not the court failed, as appellant claims, to find on other issues, is therefore entirely immaterial. The fourth count demands no particular attention. It failed to state a cause of action, there being no averment of facts showing the fairness of the contract or the adequacy of the consideration. This pleading would not have supported a decree of specific performance. White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193, and cases cited.

No errors in rulings on evidence are assigned. The appellant claims merely that the evidence does not support the findings of the court.

[3-5] It is clear that the findings in favor of the defendants Raymond H. Ross, Mabel I. Ross, and Mrs. Henry are in accord with the undisputed evidence. A contract for the sale of real estate, or for the employment of a broker to sell real estate, must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 1624; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973. None of these three defendants ever made any written contract with plaintiff, or even had any written communication with him. Plaintiff attempted to show that each of them had referred him to a brother, their codefendant, Albert T. Ross, as the person in charge of the ranch. But the testimony was that Albert did not have any written authority to bind them, and this was necessary to empower him to make a contract, on their behalf, to sell real estate or employ an agent to sell it. Civ. Code, § 2309. Even if the making of the oral statements had been shown without contradiction—which is not the case—such statements would not have bound these defendants. There is no ground for the contention that the alleged declarations raised an estoppel against the three defendants. To so hold would destroy the statutory requirement that authority to sell real property must be in writing.

[6-8] The remaining question is whether the findings in favor of defendant Albert T. Ross are supported. The evidence in this behalf is quite voluminous, and we shall not undertake to recite it in detail. Read as a whole, it presents the very usual aspect of a substantial conflict, which puts the finding of the trial court beyond the power of appellate review. The testimony on behalf of defendants tended to show and justified the trial court in believing this to be the state of facts. In August, 1910, Albert T. Ross had written to plaintiff, telling him that the ranch was for sale for $41,000 and that, if he got a chance to sell it, he should charge a good price "so you can get a commission out of it, as my figures are net." Nothing came of this, and some months later McRae wrote to A. T. Ross, offering $36,000 for the land. This was, of course, a rejection of any offer contained in the August letter, and ended that offer. Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157, 73 Pac. 840. On November 1, 1910, Ross answered McRae's letter, saying:

"We all feel that the ranch is worth what we are asking. * * * I don't feel as if we can take $40,000, but will take $41,000, that is if it is sold before the alfalfa is up. * * * We thank you for your offer. Am willing to answer any question about the place any time you should wish to write."

This is the only writing which plaintiff can look to as supporting his cause of action. Following its receipt, McRae brought one or two people to see the property, but there was no result from these efforts except in the case of one Reed, who finally made a contract with the defendants to buy the ranch for $61,117.50. But this was a contract under which nothing was to be paid until October 1, 1911, about nine months after the making of the agreement. Assuming that the letter of November 1, 1910, authorized McRae to make a sale, it did not authorize a sale on the terms that were subsequently agreed upon between Reed and Ross. Reed testified that when he made his offer for the property, he was not in a position to pay for it. A broker who seeks a commission for a sale must show that he has produced a purchaser, ready, able, and willing to purchase on the terms authorized. Gunn v. Bank of Cal., 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105. This the plaintiff did not do. Furthermore, there was testimony to the effect that McRae, instead of facilitating a sale to Reed, endeavored to prevent an agreement between Reed and Ross.

[9] Of the contention that McRae himself purchased the property, it is enough to say that the court found, with respect to the third count, that defendants did not act in bad faith in violating the alleged contract, and that plaintiff suffered no damage. These findings are sufficient to support the judgment in favor of defendants on this count. Assuming that there was a contract, and that it was broken, the measure of damages, in the absence of bad faith, is "the price paid, and expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers." Civ. Code, § 3306. No price had been paid by plaintiff, nor did he show the incurring of any expenses. The finding of a want of bad faith was fully justified, and it follows that the alleged breach caused no damage. Aside from all other considerations, the plaintiff was properly denied relief on this count.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SPRING STREET CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

HAMBURGER REALTY & TRUST CO. v. SAME et al.

(L. A. Nos. 3322, 3325.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨473—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS.

Special assessments for public improvements are based on the theory that the improvement benefits the owner; hence, where land is condemned for an improvement, a special assessment of benefits against the remaining property to the value of the property taken, to which was added the cost of making the improvement, is void, because plainly confiscatory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1121; Dec. Dig. ⇨473.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨493—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS.

Where a special assessment for public improvements was plainly confiscatory and unlawful, it cannot be justified on the theory that the property owners had their day in court before the city council and that its action in confirming the assessment was conclusive.

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Separate actions by the Spring Street Company, the Pacific States Corporation substituted, and the Hamburger Realty & Trust Company and others, against the City of Los Angeles and others. From judgments for defendants and orders denying new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and causes remanded.

Lloyd, Hunt, Cheney & Geibel and Lloyd, Cheney & Geibel, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Spring Street Company. Denis & Loewenthal and E. E. Mellette, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Hamburger Realty & Trust Co. Albert Lee Stephens and C. D. Pillsbury, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. These actions, separately brought, were both for the purpose of having declared void the same special assessment based on benefits received by the land under the widening of Eighth street in the city of Los Angeles, and so to enjoin the collection of the sums charged by the assessment against the properties of plaintiffs. The two cases, involving, as they do, the same considerations of law, may be determined together. The appeals in both cases are from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for new trial.

The authorities of the city of Los Angeles decreed the widening of Eighth street in that city for a distance of six blocks between Figueroa street upon the west and Broadway upon the east to the easterly line of the former and the westerly line of the latter. The street was to be widened five feet upon each side, necessitating the taking of a five-foot strip from all of the property owners upon the northerly and upon the southerly side of this street between Figueroa and Broadway. An assessment district was declared, which assessment district embraced (approximately) all of the lands between Figueroa street and Broadway to a distance of about 110 feet north and 110 feet south of Eighth street. On Eighth street in this district were lots of differing values, interior lots having a frontage on Eighth street alone, other lots having a frontage upon Eighth street and upon one or another of the intersecting streets, thus being corner lots of greater value.

A suit to condemn these five-foot strips was instituted, and the decree fixed the amount to be paid to the owners for their lands to be taken. These judgments aggregated $226,682.50. The Hamburger Realty & Trust Company (which alone may be considered as representing all of the other plaintiffs) was awarded damages in the sum of $20,000. The Hamburger Realty & Trust Company's property is situated at the southeast corner of Eighth and Broadway, having a frontage of 120 feet on Broadway within the assessment district, and extending on Eighth street 166.75 feet. It is unquestioned, and appears from the judgments given, that properties fronting on Eighth street alone are of very much less value than properties fronting on Broadway and its adjoining street—Hill street—which are important commercial and business streets of the city. The taking of the five-foot strip from the plaintiff was therefore a taking from all of its real estate within the district of 166.75 feet x 5. But what was perhaps of equal consequence, it was a cutting down of the Broadway frontage by five feet. To cover the cost of the proposed improvement, the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles, under the charter acting in lieu of a street superintendent, prepared and filed an assessment, charging against the lands in the district certain sums based on the benefits which it was estimated they would receive by reason of the street widening, and in the case of the Hamburger Realty & Trust Company charged their lands in the assessment with $12,794.10.

Upon notice given of the filing of this assessment, protests were entered against it by certain disaffected property owners. A hearing of these protests was had before the "Streets and Boulevards Committee of the Council," which reported a recommendation that the protests be sustained, "and that the assessment be referred back to the board of public works with the recommendation that the same be modified as follows, to wit: That the assessments on lots fronting on the cross streets be as they are at present; that the lots fronting on Eighth street be assessed the same amount as allowed for land taken and that the balance of the amount to be raised be assessed equally per front foot on the land fronting on Eighth street." Upon this report coming before the council, it ordered:

"That the board of public works be instructed to make and file a new assessment, and that the report of the streets and boulevards committee be referred to the board of public works for consideration in making the said new assessment."

Under these recommendations or directions the board of public works reported to the city council as follows:

"Gentlemen: Pursuant to a motion made and adopted by the city council at its meeting on April 6, 1910, the assessment for the widening of 8th street from Broadway to Figueroa street was returned to this board with instruction to make a new assessment, and referring with said instruction the following recommendation of the committee of streets and boulevards for the consideration of this board: 'That the assessments on the lots fronting on the cross streets be as they are at present; that the lots fronting on Eighth street be assessed the same amount as allowed for land taken, and that the balance of the amount to be raised be assessed equally per foot on the land fronting on Eighth street.' This board has followed that recommendation, and has shown the amounts assessed in red ink alongside of the amounts assessed in the original assessment. We are, however, still of the opinion, that the original assessment as made by this board is proper and correct, and beg leave to invite the attention of the honorable council to the several assessments on lots situated in the middle of blocks, and which have been assessed a comparatively small amount in this new assessment, because the amount allowed for land taken was small, whereas these inside lots are benefited more in proportion to the lots on the corners, as they only have the Eighth street frontage."

Protests were filed to this so-called new assessment, urging that it was arbitrary, unjust, excessive, and illegal; but, after hearing, the council confirmed it in toto.

The effect of the assessment so made is not and may not be questioned. It canceled every dollar of the $226,000 awarded by the court in the condemnation proceedings for the taking of this private property for a public use, under an implied omnibus finding that the property of every person whose lands fronted on Eighth street was benefited at least to the amount of his award in the condemnation proceedings for the taking of his property, and was also benefited just a little more, that little being the property owner's proportionate share of the expense of the city in the matter of its condemnation proceeding, which additional amount is contemplated by the suggestion contained in the report of the streets and boulevards committee "that the balance of the amount to be raised be assessed equally per front foot on the land fronting on Eighth street." Specifically, upon the property of the Hamburger Realty & Trust Company is imposed an assessment of $20,000, in cancellation of the judgment of the court of the value of its property taken for this public use, and $115.20 being its proportionate share of the expense to which the city was put in the doing of this thing. Thus, in practical effect, while real property of the plaintiff to the value of $20,000, as found by the court, is taken away from it for public use, and while the Constitution of the United States and of this state declares that this cannot be done without compensation to the owner, this plaintiff not only receives no compensation, but in addition to the loss of its property is compelled to pay $115.20 because the city has seen fit to take it. Thus plaintiff would have saved $115.20 if, upon the first intimation that the city designed to condemn its property under the laws of the land, it had hastened to make the city a free gift of it. And the same is true in the case of every other property owner having the misfortune to own lands fronting upon Eighth street. When finally we are told that this result has been accomplished under the Constitution and laws of the land, it becomes a matter of most serious importance to determine whether or not this can be true.

[1] It will not be amiss here to consider briefly the nature of the power exercised by the Legislature, and, under its direct authority, by its mandatories, in the matter of these so-called special assessments based on benefits. We need not be at pains to trace the development of the use of the power, nor yet is it important to refer it to any particular branch of the power of sovereignty—whether it be called the taxing power, the police power, or the power of eminent domain. Bearing in mind that with us all the power that any sovereign state ever possessed resides in the people acting through their Legislature, saving as that power is controlled or restrained by the Constitution, and as this power of sovereignty, excepting under the constitutional restraint, would permit, as was done in autocracies, the despoiling of the private citizen and the confiscation of his property, it is quite sufficient to refer to this fact for the origin of the power. Like numberless other powers which have in the past been exercised selfishly, cruelly, and unjustly, it is still a part of sovereignty, saving as it is denied, or repressed, or controlled, by the Constitution. That in certain aspects it bears a likeness to taxation is unquestioned, in that it is a charge in terms of money based upon the real property of the owner, which the owner himself is compelled to pay, or in default risk the seizure and sale of his holdings. That in certain aspects it partakes of the nature of eminent domain is manifest from the fact that if a man may be compelled to expend $1,000 for the improvement of the street upon which his property happens to front, there is a certain taking of that $1,000 for the public use. And, finally, that in other aspects it partakes of the nature of the exercise of the police power is obvious when consideration is paid to the construction of public sewers, drainage districts, and like works making for the benefit of the public health. Yet in no one, nor yet in all of these sovereign prerogatives can this particular power be said to rest under our form of government, since, if it be said that a special assessment is in strictness a tax, it does violence to our constitutional provision touching the uniformity of taxation. If it be said that this power is referable to the sovereign prerogative of the right of eminent domain, the answer is that with us the state cannot exercise that power without compensation made to the owner of the property taken. And whatever might be said of the ability to refer an assessment for a drainage system to the police power, the argument would fail utterly when applied to the opening and widening of streets, to irrigation districts, desert land reclamation, and similar forms of public control over lands privately owned. Indeed, to avoid doing violence to these constitutional limitations upon the power of the Legislature, it must be held, as it has so often been held, that a special assessment is not, in the constitutional sense, a tax at all. It is "a compulsory charge placed by the state upon real property within a predetermined district, made under express legislative authority for defraying in whole or in part the expense of a permanent public improvement therein, enhancing the present value of such real estate, and laid by some reasonable rule of uniformity based upon, in the ratio of, and limited by, such enhanced value." Hamilton, Law of Special Assessments, § 56. The improvement must have a certain public character, and this we find conspicuously in street improvements, and less conspicuously in reclamation district assessments. Were it not for this recognized characteristic, it would be justifiable to order any owner of any vacant lot to build thereon and to build a prescribed structure, since under the theory of benefits it could successfully be urged that the enhanced value of the land covers the cost of the structure compulsorily imposed upon it. It may be said that the interest of the public would demand that a building lot in the heart of a business district of a city should not be left vacant, its improvement tending to increase business and to enhance the values of surrounding property in which the public is interested. But so far such a public interest has not been considered adequate in support of such an exaction. That the return to the property owner by way of benefit is, under our system of government, the basic foundation upon which this right rests, becomes apparent from the consideration that, if we are not able to say that the owner for the specific charge imposed is compensated by the increased value of the property, then most manifestly we have a special tax upon a minority of the property owners, which tax is for the benefit of the public and which tax is special, unequal and ununiform. Therefore the compensating benefit to the property owner is the warrant, and the sole warrant, for the Legislature itself to impose the burdens of these special assessments. It has been a matter of profound regret to this court, and indeed to every court which has been called upon to consider the question, that in the application of this principle, theoretically equitable, practical operations have shown grave wrong and injustice to be done. With ceaseless reiteration the courts have deplored these unjust exactions and extortions. With tiresome repetition have they advised the lawmakers of methods for the exercise of the power more in consonance with equity and fair dealing. Reclamation District v. Birks, 159 Cal. 233, 241, 113 Pac. 170. But the result here and elsewhere has been that these suggestions, instead of being received as guides, directing a more equitable exercise of the power, have been treated as though they were invitations to an excessive use of the power, in an effort to see just how far the legislative agents and mandatories might go in their taking of private property without compensation, until told by the court that they had passed the outermost bound of law and reason.

That bound has been reached and passed by the assessment in this case. It bears upon the face of the record, as here presented, convincing and conclusive evidence that no effort at all was made by the council to assess in proportion to benefits. It is impossible that under the exercise of any discretion in the matter it could be found that in every case the damage awarded by the court for the taking of the property was exactly or more than covered by the benefit which would accrue to the remaining property by the widening of the street. And it is also impossible that those separate pieces of property were, in addition, each one of them, benefited to the exact added amount which it cost the city to take the condemned land. It is to strain credulity beyond the breaking point to ask that any such belief be for a moment entertained. Applicable to this assessment is the language of the Supreme Court of Vermont, speaking through the learned Mr. Justice Redfield, when it says:

"We have no doubt that a local assessment may so transcend the limits of equality and reason that its exaction would cease to be a tax, or contribution to a common burden, and become extortion and confiscation. In that case it would be the duty of the court to protect the citizen from robbery under color of a better name." Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174.

We believe the assessment here in question to be so manifestly and so grossly unjust upon the face of this record as to call for no extended argument for its condemnation. It was not even the quasi judicial act of the board intrusted with the duty of making the assessment, the board of public works. That board apparently entered upon the performance of its duty with a due sense of responsibility justly pertaining to its judicial character. If the communication of the city council to them was a command, they felt compelled to obey it in the matter of the new assessment and did so under formal protest. If it was not a command, but merely a suggestion, then it was a suggestion of which their judgment did not approve, and their disapproval of which they formally expressed. But we need not be at pains to linger over this obvious proposition, for it is not sought by respondents to defend this assessment upon its merits.

[2] The defense is merely that the property owners had their day in court before the city council, their petitions and protests were denied, and the action of the council, in the absence of fraud, will be held conclusive. But to this we answer that the action of the council in the particulars to which this assessment is here subjected to attack is not conclusive, under the principle declared in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, and reaffirmed in Schaffer v. Smith, 147 Pac. 976 (L. A. No. 3833) decided April 1, 1915, and that the assessment here in question does not come within the principle of Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 70 Pac. 777. But still further we hold that the record here presented furnishes such convincing evidence that the assessment was ordered prepared without the slightest exercise of judicial discretion, and so unwarrantedly, arbitrarily, and unjustly, as to work a confiscation of the property and to be, therefore, in no legal sense an assessment at all. If this court should say:

"Whenever it is proposed to take private property for purposes of street-widening, public parks, or any other recognized public use, the authorities will submit without protest to any judgment given by the courts in condemnation proceedings instituted to determine the value of the property proposed to be taken. They may so submit with security, because they will then assess on account of benefits against the remaining properties of the private owners an amount equal to the award of the court plus an additional proportionate charge for the same expense to which the property owners unwarrantedly have put the authorities in the latter's laudable efforts to benefit the public. Thus it will soon be realized by the property owners that in any such case it will be cheaper for them to donate their property outright, and thus save this additional charge. N. B.—In every case, however, care must be observed not to take all of any individual's land, or nothing will be left against which to assess on the theory of benefits. In every case, therefore, enough should be left for this most necessary purpose"

—such a declaration would shock the legal profession of the land. Yet for this court to uphold this assessment upon the record before it would be the equivalent of doing this very thing.

The judgments and orders appealed from are reversed, and the causes remanded.

WILLS ⚡647 — RESTRICTIONS — RESTRAINTS UPON MARRIAGE—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 710, providing that "Conditions imposing restraints upon marriage * * * are void, but this does not affect limitations where the intent was not to forbid marriage, but only to give the use until marriage," where testator's will gave his entire property to his widow, providing, "Should she wish to marrie agane then then 75 per cent of the hole amount at my death will go to my children," the condition was in restraint of marriage and void.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Appeal by Eliza V. Scott from an order of the court giving her a qualified estate in the whole property under the will of her husband, Charles Headwood Scott, deceased. Order reversed.

Chase, Overton & Lyman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

SHAW, J. In this case the testator made a will in the following words:

"I give all my Earthly Positons both real and persnel to my wife Eliza V. Scott. Should she wish to marrie agane then then 75 per cent of the hole amount at my death will go to my children known as C. W. Scott of Detroit, Mrs. Thomas Ogg of Glendale of California, Cancel B. Scott of California, $5.00 five dollars to Mrs. C. B. Sayles of Detroit Michigan."

The court below held that this will did not contain a condition in restraint of marriage and distributed the estate upon that construction, given the widow a qualified estate conditional upon her remaining unmarried.

The court is of the opinion that this was not a correct construction of the will and that the effect of the expression beginning with the words "should she wish to marrie agane" is that if she should marry she would by that act forfeit 75 per cent. of the estate given to her in the previous clause. This makes it a condition in restraint of marriage and therefore absolutely void under section 710 of the Civil Code. The first part of the will, the clause giving her all his estate, is the effective part of the will.

The order is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by Benjamin H. Brainerd against Rose M. Kydd. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. McCaughey and Edward J. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The complaint is founded upon a promissory note made by defendant, dated August 12, 1910, payable to her order at the office of the Western States Life Insurance Company one day after date, and indorsed by her in blank. On the day this note was delivered, the plaintiff and the defendant met at the home of the defendant. He represented himself as, and in fact was, the agent of the company, authorized to take subscriptions for its stock. After some negotiation the defendant agreed to subscribe for 40 shares at $25 per share, whereupon the note in suit, an application, and a receipt were signed and countersigned, respectively, by plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff received the note and application, and defendant the receipt. The application and receipt, consisting of printed forms, with blank spaces, which the parties filled in, contained the terms of plaintiff's agency, and constituted the written contract for the sale and purchase of the stock. Defendant expressed herself as willing to pay at once the amount called for by the contract, if the plaintiff would wait until she could go to the savings bank to procure the money; but, as the plaintiff was leaving for Honolulu on that day, he could not wait, and took the one-day note in issue here instead of cash. It was understood between the parties when the plaintiff took the note that the next day the defendant would call at the office of the Western States Insurance Company in San Francisco, pay her note, and take delivery of the stock. Plaintiff at once took the note and application to W. E. Grigsby, of the firm of Pratt & Grigsby, general agents of the insurance company, explaining the transaction and telling him that the defendant would call the next day. Mrs. Kydd called as she had promised, but, having in the meantime learned that she could invest her money to better advantage, declined to proceed with the transaction. The company, on the other hand, refused to release her from the obligation she had incurred, and tendered to her the stock called for by the contract. She declined both the tender and to pay the note. The note and application for the stock remained in the possession of Pratt & Grigsby until the plaintiff returned from Honolulu, which was some time after the apparent maturity of the note. Learning what had occurred, plaintiff, with a view doubtless of saving his commissions, bought the note from the company. The stock had been issued in the name of Richard O'Connor and indorsed by him, and was held by the company ready to turn over to the defendant at any time upon payment of the note.

The defendant in effect contends that, whether the answer pleads fraud or not, the transaction is of such a nature that it was the duty of the court to refuse to entertain the action. There is absolutely no foundation in this case for such contention. The case involves a plain business proposition, and it is but fair to say that, according to the testimony, it is free from any taint of fraud.

[1] Defendant's next contention is equally without merit. She asserts that the findings of the court are not supported by the evidence, for the reason that they are to the effect that the note upon its execution was indorsed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff as his own property, and that then and there he became the owner of the note. Of course, according to the evidence, he took the note as the agent of the company in payment of whose stock it was given, and there is nothing in the findings holding to the contrary. All that the findings in effect hold is that, at the time of the commencement of the action, the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note.

[2] The third contention of the defendant is that the note never became a binding obligation for want of acceptance by the insurance company. The simple and ready answer to this contention is that plaintiff, if not others, testified in so many words that the company did receive and accept the note; and, as we read the record, it is an undisputed fact in the case that the company did accept the note, and was ready at once to deliver the stock according to the terms of the contract, and later every precaution was taken by the company and the plaintiff here to compel the defendant to perform her part of the contract.

[3] Passing to the point as to whether or not there was any consideration for the note, but little comment is necessary. It appears that, if the defendant had taken up the note the day after its date, the company having accepted her application as it did, she would have been entitled to receive 40 shares of the capital stock of the company at the agreed price of $25 per share, all as was stipulated in the application and receipt, which constituted the contract between the parties. The note, therefore, it must be held, was supported by a consideration. Vickrey v. Maier, 164 Cal. 384, 129 Pac. 273; 7 Cyc. 691.

[4] In this connection defendant further contends that, if any consideration ever existed, it has since failed. This claim is based on the circumstance that, about two months after the note was executed, all the original issue of stock of the company had been sold, and that it was then impossible, even if the defendant had been willing to accept the same, to deliver to her 40 shares of the original issue, which she claims the contract calls for. Under her contract she was to accept the 40 shares the day after the execution of the note; and as the evidence shows that that number of shares of the original issue was tendered to her on that day, which tender was open to her acceptance for two months thereafter, we are at a loss to see how it can be said that the consideration failed. This point, like every other point made in the case, is highly technical. The 40 shares to which she was entitled under the contract were issued and have stood at different times in the names of one other person and the plaintiff, to be delivered to her at any time upon payment of the note. Thus it is seen that her claim in this regard is without substantial merit.

Coming now to the last point which we shall consider, it is sufficient to say, in answer to the same, that it was and is assumed by both sides that, when plaintiff called at the insurance company's office the day after the making of the note and contract, she intended to effect a release, if possible, from those obligations, but there was no attempt to show a rescission of the contract; and we have no doubt that any error the court may have committed with reference to the admission of evidence was harmless and inconsequential.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by the Mission Fixture Company against George E. Potter. Judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment and the refusal of a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

B. F. Thomas and Richards & Carrier, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant. H. P. Starbuck and Canfield & Starbuck, all of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of a certain lot of personal property. The alleged value of all the property claimed to have been converted was the sum of $337.32. The court, in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff, first determined that that recovery should only be for the sum of $50, which was the value of only a portion of the property described in the complaint. Thereafter a motion was made, under the provisions of section 663, C. C. P., by the plaintiff that the court enter upon the findings of fact as made a different judgment, and this motion was granted and a judgment for the sum of $320.26, together with costs, was then entered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, and, the same being denied, took this appeal, which is from the judgment, as well as from the order referred to.

The property alleged to have been converted consisted of two lots of gas and electric fixtures which were consigned to defendant and one Fred R. Carrel, who were doing business as a copartnership at Santa Barbara under the name of Santa Barbara Electric Company. These consignments were made in July and August of the year 1909. About one year later the partnership existing between the defendant and Carrel was dissolved; Carrel purchasing the interest of defendant, Potter, and continuing the business theretofore conducted by the copartnership, under the same name. Notice of the dissolution and change was given directly to the plaintiff herein. The consigned goods were goods to be used as samples from which orders might be made to the plaintiff, which was a manufacturer of such articles. The consignments were made in such a way as to create a contract of bailment from which the parties derived mutual benefit. On the one hand, the bailees were enabled to exhibit in their store samples of various kinds of fixtures without being put to the expense of paying for such samples, and, on the other hand, the consignor was benefited by the orders which would be received for merchandise of the kind shown by the samples furnished. It was agreed that these fixtures would remain in the possession of the bailees, subject to being returned at any time to the bailor upon its demand. After the dissolution of the partnership between Carrel and Potter, Carrel continued in the business and the sample fixtures held on consignment remained with him. They were allowed to remain there for the purposes of the business which was thereafter conducted by Carrel. They were allowed to remain there by the plaintiff because of the benefit which it was presumed would accrue to it through sales to be made by Carrel of fixtures of the kind shown by sample.

[1] The trial court by its findings determined that all of the consigned fixtures were left in the possession of Carrel in August, 1910, when Potter withdrew from the firm, and that notice of the dissolution was given to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff continued thereafter its business relations and dealings with the said Carrel; that thereafter Carrel abandoned the business and all of the stock and materials thereof and left the city of Santa Barbara, leaving only of the two lots of consigned fixtures a small part, the value of which was $50; that the remainder of the consigned fixtures could not then "or since, and cannot now, be found." A finding follows to the effect that the defendant here took possession of the small lot of fixtures left by Carrel which belonged to the consignments and converted the same to his own use. If it may be said that these findings are sufficient to show a conversion of all of the fixtures and facts which would make the defendant responsible therefor in damages, then it must be said that the evidence does not sustain such findings. As to the small lot of fixtures for the value of which the court first entered judgment, we think that such a judgment was warranted not only by the evidence, but by the findings.

After Carrel abandoned the business, the defendant, by an action brought to recover a debt due him from Carrel, took possession of all of the stock found in the place of business of Carrel, and caused a sale thereof to be made under execution. It may be urged that the instructions of the defendant, who was the plaintiff in that action, to the officer making the sale, provided only for a sale to be made of the property of Carrel; but whether that is true or not seems immaterial, as it sufficiently appears that all of the merchandise found in Carrel's place of business was appropriated by the defendant, and whether he could under such a sale give good title or not, he did, in fact, cause the possession of the remainder of the consigned goods to be transferred to another person. But as to the larger part of the consignments, as segregated by the trial judge in his findings, the same conditions of fact or as to the law do not apply.

[2, 3] We think that when the firm of Potter & Carrel was dissolved, and the plaintiff was given notice of that fact, and, understanding clearly the situation, proceeded to deal with Carrel as the new owner of the business, it thereby estopped itself from thereafter claiming that the responsibility of Potter continued as to the goods formerly consigned to the copartnership. It should be kept in mind that the consigned goods were allowed to remain with Carrel for a year and a half after the dissolution of the partnership occurred. They were left there, not for the purpose of benefiting the firm or the firm's business as it had previously existed under the copartnership, but directly for the benefit of the business which was continued thereafter; the consideration moving to the plaintiff being that it would secure orders for goods as per samples which made up the consigned lots. The mutual considerations were continuing; the property could have been retaken upon demand at any time by the plaintiff, and all obligation required from it would have been thereby discharged. There need be no question made as to the law which declares that a retiring copartner may be held for the obligations of the copartnership theretofore created. The text-book rule is uniform, and the decisions are without conflict to that point. See Parsons on Copartnership, § 296, and cases cited. In this case, when Potter notified the plaintiff that he had withdrawn from the firm, plaintiff had the option to demand the return of the goods, or to continue business with Carrel under the same or different arrangement with respect to the consigned merchandise. It chose to follow the latter course, and allowed the sample stock to be left in Carrel's place of business solely because of benefits to be received in the future from the business as conducted by Carrel. Under all of these facts, surely it must be said that impliedly a new contract was made with the new proprietor of the business formerly conducted by the copartnership, and that the responsibility of the defendant as a copartner had ceased before the alleged conversion was made.

We think that the judgment should be reversed.

The judgment and order are reversed.

CLOYNE v. LEVY. (Civ. 1608.)

1. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION — COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT — PART PAYMENT — CONSIDERATION — "ACCORD."

Where a debtor is insolvent, or where a genuine controversy as to the amount due exists, acceptance by the creditor of less than claimed by him in extinguishment of the debt is a sufficient consideration for a parol agreement to extinguish the debt within Civ. Code, §§ 1521, 1524, defining an "accord" as an agreement to accept, in extinction of an obligation, something less than that to which the person agreeing to accept is entitled, and providing that part performance of an obligation, when expressly accepted by the creditor in writing in satisfaction, extinguishes the obligation.

2. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION — COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT — ACCEPTANCE OF LESS SUM THAN AMOUNT DUE — EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to justify a finding of an accord and satisfaction, so that the creditor could recover an additional sum.

4. CONTRACTS 129—GAMING 5—VALIDITY—GAMBLING CONTRACT.

A contract between the principal stockholder of a bank and a depositor of the bank, which recites the rendition of judgment in favor of a third person against the depositor and his intention to appeal, and which provides that depositor shall leave the deposit in the bank pending the appeal and until final termination of the litigation, in consideration of which the principal stockholder, on final defeat of depositor, will pay to him legal interest on the judgment from a specified date, which depositor shall then be under obligation to pay, is not invalid as tending to encourage litigation or as in the nature of a gambling contract, and the mere fact that in the contingency that the judgment shall be reversed no interest shall be paid will not affect the validity of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Robert M. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Thomas Cloyne against A. Levy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, Wolff v. Cloyne, 156 Cal. 746, 106 Pac. 104.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for appellant. Robert M. Sheridan, of Ventura, and Edward M. Selby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action grew out of the following facts: Thomas Cloyne agreed in writing to buy from M. L. Wolff a certain tract of land, at which time he paid $1,000 on account of the purchase price thereof. Upon Cloyne refusing to consummate the deal by paying the balance of $16,026.80, in accordance with the agreement, Wolff, on June 28, 1907, tendered him a deed, which Cloyne refused to accept. Whereupon Wolff brought suit upon said contract for the specific performance thereof.

The result of the trial was a judgment rendered on February 14, 1908, in favor of Wolff for $16,912.05, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. until paid. From this judgment Cloyne appealed to the Supreme Court. Defendant Levy had no interest in the litigation, but it appears that Cloyne had a large sum of money on deposit in his bank, and before taking said appeal Cloyne and Levy, who was the chief owner of the bank, made an agreement on February 29, 1908, which, after reciting that judgment had been rendered in said action in favor of Wolff bearing "interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from and after the 28th day of June, 1907," and that Cloyne intended to appeal said case and had on deposit in the Bank of A. Levy, Inc., a sum of money exceeding the sum of $18,000, of which bank Levy was the principal stockholder and therefore to his interest to have said deposit remain in said bank pending the conclusion of such litigation, provided:

That Thomas Cloyne should leave a sum of money amounting to at least $18,000 on deposit in said bank pending said appeal and until the final termination of the litigation, in consideration of which "the said A. Levy hereby agrees in consideration thereof that if the said Thomas Cloyne shall eventually be defeated in said litigation, that is to say, if judgment shall finally be rendered against said Cloyne in said matter, then and in such event the said A. Levy agrees to pay to said Thomas Cloyne an amount equal to the legal interest figured at 7 per cent. per annum on said judgment from June 28, 1907, and which said Thomas Cloyne shall then be under legal obligation to pay."

It was further provided, that if the case should be reversed or eventually decided in favor of Cloyne, Levy should not pay any interest on said deposit.

The judgment in the case of Wolff v. Cloyne, 156 Cal. 746, 106 Pac. 104, was, on January 15, 1910, by the Supreme Court affirmed, and on February 17, 1910, Levy paid to Cloyne the sum of $2,313, which represented interest on said judgment rendered in Wolff v. Cloyne at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum for a period extending from February 14, 1908, the date of the judgment, to the date of its affirmance on appeal.

The action is upon the agreement to recover the balance of $754.38, alleged to be due thereon. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Defendant in his answer admits the execution of the agreement as set out in the complaint, but, by both answer and cross-complaint, alleges that said written agreement does not express the true intent and meaning of the parties in making said agreement, which, as alleged, was that he, defendant Levy, should pay plaintiff such rate of interest from the date when said judgment was rendered, to wit, February 14, 1908, and not from June 28, 1907, which was the date when Wolff tendered the deed to Cloyne, but that in reducing their agreement to writing a mutual mistake was made in inserting the date June 28, 1907, as the time from which interest should run.

Upon these allegations defendant asked for a reformation of the agreement. It is also alleged in the answer that this mistake was discovered by both parties on or about February 17, 1910, at which time defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $2,313, and that plaintiff accepted said sum in full satisfaction and discharge of any and all claims under and by virtue of said agreement.

It thus appears that defendant, while conceding that under the agreement as written plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum sued for, nevertheless insists not only that the amount paid under the circumstances shown constituted an accord and satisfaction, but also that under the evidence he was entitled to have the instrument reformed so as to express what he insists was the true intent and meaning of the parties. As to both these contentions, the court found against defendant.

The obligation of defendant under the terms of the written agreement was to pay plaintiff interest on the judgment from June 28, 1907, to the date of its affirmance. This amounted to $3,067.38. On February 17, 1910, defendant paid Cloyne $2,313 towards the liquidation of said indebtedness. Appellant insists that such payment constituted an accord and satisfaction, the effect of which was to discharge the obligation.

[1] If this payment of the lesser sum extinguished the obligation of defendant upon the agreement, it was (in the absence of an acceptance in writing, or made pursuant to the terms of a written instrument [Civ. Code, § 1524]) by virtue of a new agreement, which in law is termed an accord and satisfaction. Civ. Code, § 1521. To support, and render such an agreement, when executed, valid, since there was no writing as specified in section 1524, supra, it must, like other contracts, be founded upon a sufficient consideration. Deland v. Hiatt, 27 Cal. 611, 87 Am. Dec. 102; Dobinson v. McDonald, 92 Cal. 33, 27 Pac. 1098. The fact that the debtor is insolvent, or that a genuine controversy exists as to the amount of the obligation, may, in the absence of a writing, constitute sufficient consideration for the agreement when the creditor accepts, in extinction of the obligation, a less sum than that due from the obligor.

[2] Appellant's contention is that when plaintiff, on February 17, 1910, went to the former's bank, presented his bank book and requested that Levy enter therein, to plaintiff's credit, the amount of interest due to him under the terms of the agreement, a dispute arose between them as to the correct amount, and after some discussion on the subject, wherein plaintiff expressed the opinion that he was entitled to a greater sum than that which appellant proposed to pay him, finally agreed to accept interest for the period extending from February 14, 1908, thereby waiving any right to interest for the period from June 28, 1907, to February 14, 1908. Conceding this contention supported by the testimony of defendant (as to which we entertain grave doubt), it is nevertheless contradicted not only by plaintiff himself, but by his daughter, who was present. From this testimony, accepted by the court as true, it appears that Cloyne handed his bank book to Levy, asking him to make entry of credit therein of the amount of interest due; that Levy took the book and made a computation, and, after the same was verified at Levy's request by an employé of the bank, he then made the entry of $2,313 and handed the book to Cloyne, saying, "There is your interest." According to plaintiff's testimony, there was not only no dispute, but no discussion. He relied upon Levy, who appears to have been his banker, to enter the correct sum. Afterwards, feeling that the sum paid was less than that due, he had a computation made which disclosed the balance herein claimed to be due under the terms of the agreement. The finding of the court to the effect that there was no accord and satisfaction is amply supported by the evidence.

[3] Little is urged in support of the proposition that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding to the effect that there was no mutual mistake in reducing the agreement to writing, other than that the recital of the rendition of a judgment bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum is, since the judgment was rendered February 14, 1908, inconsistent with such fact. This apparent inconsistency is fully explained, however, by the testimony of plaintiff that, owing to the fact that the judgment as rendered included interest from June 28, 1907 (the date of the tender of the deed by Wolff), plaintiff and his friends insisted that Levy should obligate himself to pay interest from such date. To this defendant objected, but finally agreed thereto; whereupon, to remove any uncertainty as to this being the meaning of the parties, the words, "from June 28, 1907," were inserted by interlineation after the words, "per annum on said judgment," and with this interlineation made the parties executed the agreement. The finding upon the evidence disclosed could not have been other than that made.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the agreement tended to encourage litigation, or was in the nature of a gambling contract, and therefore void as against public policy. It was made upon a sufficient consideration, namely, that defendant was to have the use of the money for which he was to pay interest. The fact that in the contingency that the judgment should be reversed he was to pay no interest could not affect the validity of the agreement.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

THOMAS v. BORUFF. (Civ. 1617.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 1, 1915.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS ⇄ 24—COMPENSATION—AGREEMENT TO PAY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a physician against the brother-in-law of a patient for services performed in an operation, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that defendant promised to pay the expenses in connection with the operation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by C. P. Thomas against F. L.

Boruff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Trippet, Chapman & Biby, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hindman & Yakey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, a physician and surgeon, sues in his own behalf and as assignee of H. E. Southworth, also a physician and surgeon, to recover for services rendered in performing, at the special instance and request of defendant, a surgical operation upon Henry Caystile, brother-in-law of defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The appeal may be disposed of by a consideration of the evidence in support of the finding:

"That on or about the 7th day of April, 1913, the plaintiff herein, C. P. Thomas, and the said H. E. Southworth, at the special instance and request of the defendant herein, F. L. Boruff, performed professional services for one Henry Caystile, which said services were and are of the reasonable value of $500, which the defendant herein undertook, promised, and agreed to pay for."

The evidence tends to prove that, while Dr. Southworth had theretofore treated Mr. Caystile, he was not under employment by him at the time the operation was performed; that defendant asked him to perform it, and the defendant, upon being told by Southworth that the latter had spoken to Dr. Thomas regarding the matter, personally requested him to perform the operation, and said: "I want you to give him all the service that is possible, every attention, and I will foot the bills." On the morning when the operation was performed, in conversation with both plaintiff and Southworth, defendant said to the former, "I suppose you have called me in here for the purpose of having me say that I will pay for these services;" and plaintiff said, "Well, if those are the facts, Mr. Boruff, that is all right." "Well," said defendant, "you boys go ahead and fix him up the best you can, and I will pay the bill." Upon plaintiff telling defendant that the operation was necessarily attended with great danger and uncertainty, he replied, "Go ahead and do the best you can for him." Another witness testified that Mr. Boruff said to plaintiff to do the best he could for the man, and he (defendant) would pay the bill. Not only does this testimony strongly tend to establish an original promise on the part of defendant to pay for the services, both of plaintiff and that of his assignor, but the testimony of defendant himself is corroborative of this view. His testimony is that, upon Dr. Southworth requesting him to "stand for the expense," he said, "Yes, I will stand for the bill if you will allow me to select the man to operate;" to which Dr. Southworth replied, "Well, I have selected a man and Henry wants me." "I know he does," said defendant, "he prefers to have you, but I will not pay the bills on your account;" to which Dr. Southworth said, "I have secured Thomas; he is a good man;" in answer to which defendant replied, "Go ahead, if he wants you; go ahead." This evidence might very properly be construed as a waiver of defendant's wish to name the operator as a condition of paying the bill.

Since the finding complained of is supported by the evidence adduced on behalf of plaintiff, it follows that there was no error in the ruling of the court in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit. Conceding that, even if defendant had not promised to pay the bill, plaintiff and his assignor might nevertheless have rendered the service, it is sufficiently clear, we think, that before performing the operation defendant made an original promise to pay the expense, and that plaintiff and Southworth relied upon such promise.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by John Finnan and another against Reclamation District No. 273 and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, Clary & Louttit, of Stockton, and F. E. Boland, of San Francisco, for appellants. A. H. Ashley, R. C. Minor, and Geo. F. McNoble, all of Stockton, and F. O. Housken, of New Hope, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. On February 8, 1910, there was filed with the board of supervisors of San Joaquin county a petition for the levy of an assessment, No. 3, of $167,006.90, upon the 7,047.80 acres of land in reclamation district No. 773 (situated entirely in San Joaquin county), and on the same day respondents, as the owners of 317 acres of land in said district, filed with said board their protest against said levy, and on February 25th following they filed an additional protest. The board of supervisors, however, appointed commissioners to levy the assessment prayed for.

On June 12, 1911, the assessment list made by said commissioners was filed in the office of the county treasurer of said county. It remained there until July 13, 1911, and was then returned to the board of trustees of said district. That board, on July 25, 1911, made its order directing that the total amount of said assessment be paid. On January 29, 1912, said reclamation district brought an action in the superior court of said county against respondents to recover $7,080.70, the amount assessed against a portion of their land. Respondents' demurrer thereto was sustained on the ground of the want of facts. On March 13, 1912, an amended complaint, verified by the secretary of said district, was filed in said court. In this amended complaint the whole record of the proceedings relating to this assessment No. 3 was set forth either directly or by way of exhibits. On May 27, 1912, the superior court sustained respondents' demurrer to said amended complaint without leave to amend, and on May 31, 1912, judgment was entered accordingly. No appeal was ever taken from that judgment. However, the assessment list, which had been filed with the county treasurer, was withdrawn, and on July 15, 1912, it was presented to the board of supervisors, which board made an order fixing August 6, 1912, for the consideration of said list, and on said date the board approved said assessment. On December 16, 1912, respondents commenced this action in the superior court to have said orders of the board of supervisors annulled, and to have it adjudged that said assessment was null and void, that the district had no lien on the lands of plaintiffs, and that the defendant district, its trustees, officers, etc., be enjoined from offering for sale or selling any portion of said lands and for general relief. The complaint proceeds upon the theory that the board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to appoint commissioners to levy the assessment, that the invalidity of said assessment was conclusively determined by said judgment of May 31, 1912, and that, by reason of the fraud of defendants, the plaintiffs were deprived of the opportunity to contest the said assessment before the said board. The findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs, and were entered November 5, 1913. On February 3, 1913, another suit was also brought by plaintiffs for a writ of certiorari to annul said order of the board appointing commissioners, and also the order approving the assessment list filed by said commissioners. The judgment in that action was entered April 19, 1913, and was in favor of plaintiffs as prayed for. Appeals have been taken on separate records from these last two judgments, and it is manifest that the vital questions involved therein are identical; the difference being as to the form of procedure that should have been adopted in the court below. The action now being considered contemplated and resulted in complete relief to plaintiffs, and the other was commenced because of doubt on the part of plaintiffs as to the proper remedy to invoke.

In the first action commenced, as stated, on January 29, 1912, defendants therein (plaintiffs here) took the position not only that the complaint, and also the amended complaint, failed to state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, but that by reason of certain amendments to the reclamation statute, approved April 5, 1911, the superior court had no jurisdiction of the action. As to the latter objection, however, the trial court ruled against the defendants, but held that no cause of action was or could be stated. As to the jurisdictional question, Hon. J. A. Plummer, the trial judge, in his opinion filed upon the demurrer to the original complaint, declared:

"In so far as the objection that the court has no jurisdiction of this action by reason of the act of the Legislature approved April 5, 1911, is concerned, the court is of the opinion that section 18 of said act, which becomes section 3478 of the Political Code, completely answers the contention of counsel for defendants, and that under the provisions of said section the action may be maintained."

The basis for the contention of said defendants (respondents herein) that the court had no jurisdiction of said action, and which contention, it may be said, is now the claim of appellant herein (plaintiff therein), is found in section 3462 of the Political Code, as amended by said statute of 1911. Therein it is provided that the assessment list prepared by the commissioners "shall be filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county." Prior to said amendment the section provided: "The list so made must be filed with the treasurer of the county." Said amended section also provides that the board of supervisors shall appoint a time for hearing objections to said assessments, and shall give notice thereof by publication for two weeks; that any person interested in any of the land subject to the assessment may file written objections thereto; that the same must be considered by said board; that after hearing the evidence offered the board "may modify or amend the assessment in any particular, or make a reapportionment of the entire assessment." Furthermore, if the amount of any assessment be changed, another day must be appointed for hearing any objection to said assessment as thus changed, and this procedure shall be followed "until the amount of each assessment shall be finally fixed and approved." When the board of supervisors shall finally approve the assessment, such order shall be indorsed upon said assessment list, signed by the chairman and attested by the clerk of said board, "and such decision of said board of supervisors shall be final, and thereafter said assessment list shall be conclusive evidence that the said assessment has been made and levied according to law, except in an action commenced as hereinafter provided. The lists shall then be filed with the county treasurer. * * * No objection to such assessment shall be considered by the board of supervisors or allowed in any other action or proceeding, unless such objection shall have been made in writing to the board of supervisors as above specified." It is further provided that any person aggrieved by the decision of the supervisors may bring an action in the superior court to have said assessment corrected, modified, or annulled, but such action must be brought within 30 days after said assessment list has been filed in the office of the county treasurer, and, "if said action shall not be commenced within 30 days, no action or defense shall thereafter be maintained attacking the legality of said assessment in any respect." The subsequent section provides that from and after the filing of said list or a certified copy thereof with the county treasurer the charges assessed upon any tract of land shall constitute a lien thereon, and shall impart notice thereof to all persons.

It is thus to be seen how ample are the powers conferred by this statute upon the trustees of the district and the board of supervisors, and how limited is the time apparently in which proceedings must be instituted if any application is to be made to the superior court for a review of the action of these local boards in determining and fixing the assessment and its apportionment; such application to be made only if the property owner has filed his objections with the said board of supervisors. It is the contention of appellant that therein the Legislature has clearly expressed its intention to provide an exclusive method of redress on the part of an aggrieved party, and the conclusion follows that a landowner who fails to file his objections with the board of supervisors or to bring his action in the superior court within said 30 days is precluded from questioning in any subsequent proceeding the validity of said assessment, unless upon the ground that by reason of fraud he was prevented from pursuing the course therein prescribed.

[1] The radical change made in the law was, no doubt, intended to avoid the long delays incident to the old procedure, and to afford a prompt and effective agency for validating and collecting assessments. As pointed out in Reclamation District No. 351 v. Sels, 117 Cal. 165, 49 Pac. 131, "the property owner is entitled to a hearing at one time or another upon the question of benefits," and before the passage of section 3493½ of the Political Code he made his showing when an action was brought to recover the assessment. But by the adoption of said section provision was afforded for an action by the district, to be brought within one year, to test and determine all questions relating to the validity of the assessment, and therein the property owner could urge any available defense. In either case, however, protracted litigation often ensued, and the payments were sometimes deferred for years, even if the court did not finally determine the assessment was invalid by reason of some technical defect in the proceedings, and thus require the work to be done again from the beginning.

[2] The principle of the amendment is, of course, commendable, and, as far as we are advised, there is no valid legal objection to the provision in reference to the finality of said proceedings, at least as far as their regularity and the question of the apportionment of the assessment are concerned. This can be said of defects in the original petition as well as of other irregularities. No doubt, an omission of a material fact from said petition or the absence of any petition at all could thus be cured. This consideration is adverted to in Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 116 Pac. 750, wherein, in reference to the necessity for filing a petition to authorize the city board of trustees to make an order to change the grade of a street, it was said:

"Where a statute requires such a petition to be filed as a condition precedent to the making of such order, the board or council has no power to make the order until a sufficient petition has been filed. This is settled by the cases of Turill v. Grattan, 52 Cal. 97, Mulligan v. Smith, 59 Cal. 206, and Kahn v. Board, 79 Cal. 396 [21 Pac. 849], and as to that point there is no dispute. But the necessity for such petition is the creature of the statute. It is not required by any constitutional guaranty. From this it follows that the statute may dispense with such requirement, or it may provide that the decision of the board or council as to its sufficiency, or any subsequent act depending upon it, such as the issuance of bonds, shall be conclusive evidence of the fact that a sufficient petition has been filed. Such provisions will be upheld as valid. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 356, 80 Pac. 81. In the case just cited, and in German, etc., Society v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 130, 69 Pac. 89, it was held that the conclusive evidence clause of the street improvement bond act of 1893 cured all such defects."

[3] But we do not understand that such provision has the effect of validating an act that is void; in other words, of making an assessment lawful when the purpose of it is contrary to the law, and of placing beyond the reach of the general equity powers of the court the question of the jurisdiction or legal authority of the board to take any step at all toward the levy of an assessment.

It is certainly fundamental that no person's property can be taken for a purpose not authorized by law. Land in a reclamation district must be assessed for reclamation purposes or the assessment cannot be lawfully enforced. The order of the board of supervisors, if in excess of authority, assuredly cannot be less amenable to attack in any independent proceeding than the judgment of a court of record, and yet, in Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 Pac. 317, it was held that it is not within the power of the Legislature to divest the jurisdiction in equity cases conferred by the Constitution upon the superior court, and that "jurisdiction could not be divested or affected by section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure, making the decree of distribution conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees," and that "the power of a court of equity to relieve against judgments is not confined to cases where they have been procured by fraud, but extends also to judgments wrongfully given by reason of mistake either of the court or of the injured party unmixed with fraud."

We think Judge Plummer was right in the following comments:

"This provision of the Code, however, must be limited and confined to acts of the board of supervisors upon matters over which they have jurisdiction. In other words, the law provides that boards of supervisors upon statements presented to them by boards of trustees of reclamation districts may levy assessments for certain purposes, particularized and specified in the Codes. When it is shown that trustees have asked for the levy of an assessment in accordance with those provisions, and for the purpose for which assessments are allowable, and that the board of supervisors has acted therein within the limits prescribed by the Code, then and in that event the action of the board of supervisors will be deemed final and conclusive. But whenever it appears that an assessment has been levied for purposes other than those specified in the Code, section 3462 certainly cannot be held to validate such an assessment and preclude an inquiry as to the same by an owner whose lands are about to be sold under proceedings (or for purposes) having no warrant in law. * * * If this is not a correct statement of the law, then the property rights of an owner of land within a reclamation district are subject to the whims and caprices of those who may happen to be the trustees of a reclamation district."

[4] In said opinion it is also said:

"It appears by the statement filed with the board of supervisors on February 8, 1910 (upon which this proceeding rests), that $115,397.90 of the assessment for $167,006.90 asked are inserted in said statement for the purpose of covering two prior assessments declared illegal, and legal interest accrued thereon, and that this assessment list presented to the board of supervisors and approved by it is, in fact, an assessment, to the extent of (at least) $115,397.90, to overlap and cover said former illegal assessments. It is further stated in said report that certain landowners had not paid such illegal assessments, that certain other landowners had paid the same, and that the treasurer of San Joaquin county must credit the several paying landowners, upon this (or any following) assessment, with the amounts paid by them upon the said assessments declared illegal, together with interest upon said several sums from the dates of their respective payments (the amounts of said payments and interest to be applied to the payment of any assessment thereafter levied). For this purpose, the report asks that there be included in this assessment the amounts so paid by the several landowners upon the said two illegal assessments, together with interest thereon from the several dates of payment to February 7, 1910. Then follow interest items aggregating $12,661.90. It will be noted that there is no provision either in the old Code or in the amended Code which authorizes an assessment for any such purpose; and there is no provision in the amended Code which authorizes the board of trustees of any reclamation district, or any officer thereof, to allow any such credit. Section 3466½ is the sole measure of both the mode and the power of adjusting assessment burdens under such conditions, to wit, a separate assessment according to benefits derived (not to expense incurred) or a reassessment."

It may be said that respondents claim there were other fatal defects in said assessment, but they need not be noticed.

Briefly stated, it was therefore the opinion of the lower court not only that under the amended statute a court of equity could inquire into the legal authority for the assessment, and that in the instant case the assessment was invalid, but also that the whole proceeding as to the levy and collection of said assessment was to be measured by the statute as it existed when the petition was filed with the board of supervisors, and hence that the court had jurisdiction of said action of January 29, 1912, and that its judgment therein was a conclusive determination of the invalidity of said assessment. It is conceded by appellants that such was the effect of that judgment if the old law was operative. That question undoubtedly depends upon the proper construction of said section 3478 of the Political Code as amended by said act of 1911.

[5] The language of that section is as follows:

"All reclamation districts now legally existing in this state, which were created by or formed under the provisions of any statute of the state, shall henceforth be subject to the provisions of the Political Code of the state of California relating to reclamation districts the same as though such districts had been formed by or created under the provisions of said act relating to 'swamp and overflowed salt marsh and tide lands': Provided, that this provision shall not affect any proceeding that shall have been already commenced for the levy or collection of assessments in such districts when this act takes effect; nor shall it affect any act done or performed in relation to the affairs of such districts prior to such last-mentioned date."

It is true that the assessment had not been actually levied, but the proceeding had "been already commenced" for the levy and collection of said assessment. The filing of the petition for the assessment and the appointment of the commissioners, as already seen, took place long "prior to such last-mentioned date." These prior acts were, indeed, important only as a part of the process for the levy and collection of the assessment. In fact, their only purpose was to lay the legal foundation for said assessment, and it seems to have been the intention of the Legislature that, where the initiatory steps had been taken, the course was to be pursued to the end under the old statute. If this is the right view, then the said action brought by the trustees in January, 1912, was expressly authorized by the law, and was concededly final, as before stated.

As the matter is presented here, we think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

FINNAN et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY. (Civ. 1323.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 9, 1915. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1915.)

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by John Finnan and another against the Board of Supervisors of the County of San Joaquin. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clary & Louttit, of Stockton, and McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is a companion case to No. 1330, 148 Pac. 227, the opinion in which is filed herewith. While this bears an earlier number on appeal than the other cause, it was brought later in the superior court, as we have already seen. For a statement of the facts it is sufficient to refer to said opinion in No. 1330. If we are right in the conclusions reached therein, this action was unnecessary, and resulted in costs that might have been avoided. However, the fact that the other action was pending does not seem to have been called to the attention of the learned trial judge who presided in this action. If it had been, he might have held that it afforded "a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." In view of our conclusion in the other case, we deem it unnecessary, though, to decide whether the old law afforded such remedy, as the question now seems moot so far as this court is concerned. It may be added that, under said amended statute, such remedy seems to be clearly afforded.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS $\hookrightarrow$ 20 — GROUNDS—FRAUDS—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

Where a party to a contract did not occupy confidential relations to the other party, the latter was not justified in relying on representations of the parties that the contract, as reduced to writing, contained a stipulation orally agreed on, and the other party could not, on the ground of fraud, obtain a reformation of the contract by the insertion of the provisions.

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS $\hookrightarrow$ 17 — GROUNDS—MISTAKE.

Where a lessee intended that the lease should embody a provision orally agreed on, and believed that it was inserted therein, and his failure to discover the omission was due to his own carelessness, and there was nothing to show that the lessor suspected that the lessee so believed, the lease could not be reformed on the ground of the lessee's mistake.

An oral agreement by a lessor of premises described in the lease as a two-story frame apartment house, to construct, if required, a third story and lease it to the lessee at an annual rental equal to 10 per cent. of its cost, is disconnected with the lease and a chattel mortgage given by the lessee for the price of furniture contained in the premises and bought by the lessee, and the lessor's breach of the oral agreement does not defeat his right to enforce the lease and chattel mortgage.

An oral agreement by a lessor in a written lease of premises described as a two-story frame apartment house for a term of years, to construct, at the request of the lessee, a third story and lease it to him on specified terms for the term of the original lease, is in effect a contract for a lease of premises for more than a year and is void under the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by A. E. Kepner against the John M. C. Marble Company, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert G. Loucks, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Oscar A. Trippet and John E. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This was an action for the reformation of a lease made by defendant to plaintiff and, as reformed, to have the same, together with a chattel mortgage made by plaintiff to defendant and a bill of sale made by defendant to plaintiff, all executed in connection with the said lease, rescinded for failure of consideration. Defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and also filed a cross-complaint for the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage given it by plaintiff. The court gave judgment for defendant and rendered a decree for the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

In August, 1909, defendant was the owner of a two-story apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, known as the Boylston Apartments, together with certain furniture contained therein. As a result of negotiations between the parties, it was, on August 31, 1909, orally agreed that defendant would sell to plaintiff the said furniture for the sum of $1,800 in cash and lease said apartment house to him for a term of five years from September 1, 1909; it being understood that plaintiff should execute to defendant a chattel mortgage upon said furniture to secure the payment of the rent of said premises to the extent of not exceeding $2,000. It was further orally agreed, if plaintiff should so elect and request, defendant would in the spring of 1910 construct a third story upon said apartment house, in which case, and upon the construction of which, plaintiff would lease it, paying therefor as rental, during the balance of the term specified in said lease, 10 per cent. per annum upon the cost of such construction. Defendant prepared the lease, together with the bill of sale of the personal property and the chattel mortgage, and on September 3, 1909, plaintiff went to the former's office, where the documents were presented to him for his approval and execution. After a half hour's examination and consideration thereof, he executed the lease and chattel mortgage (retaining duplicate copy of the lease), and received from defendant the bill of sale to the furniture sold to him, and which was covered by the chattel mortgage. The lease contained mutual covenants usual in such instruments, but made no reference to the fact orally stated by defendant that it would in the spring of 1910, if desired by plaintiff, add to said apartment house a third story for which plaintiff should pay the rental as hereinbefore mentioned.

Plaintiff entered into possession of the demised premises, and on November 1, 1909, the parties executed a supplement to the lease, which, after reciting that the lessor, at the request of the lessee, was about to complete improvements (which consisted of a steam-heating plant) at a cost of $1,150 upon the premises, made upon the understanding with the lessee that he should pay an increased yearly rental of 10 per cent. thereon, and further that "whereas, it may become desirable during the term of the lease to make further improvements upon the premises which will inure to the advantage of the lessee," provided that plaintiff should pay said additional rental, commencing on December 1st, and which supplement contained the further provision:

"And it is further agreed that in the event that, at the instance and request of the lessee, the lessor shall construct upon, or add other improvements to, the premises, the lessee shall pay an additional rental of 10 per cent. of the actual cost thereof to the lessor."

On January 20, 1910, plaintiff demanded that defendant erect the third story upon said apartment house, but defendant refused to comply therewith for the reason that such structure would be in violation of a city ordinance.

The reformation asked is the insertion in the original lease of the alleged oral agreement, whereby, it is claimed, defendant obligated itself, at the request of plaintiff, to construct an additional story upon said apartment house.

[1] The grounds which will justify the reformation of a written contract are: First, fraud; second, a mutual mistake of the parties; and, third, a mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected. Not the slightest ground exists for claiming that, with intent to deceive the plaintiff, defendant represented that the lease, as reduced to writing, did contain the alleged oral covenant.

[2] Moreover, defendant did not occupy a fiduciary relation towards plaintiff; hence he was dealing with it at "arm's length" and was not justified in relying upon such representations, even though they were made. Neither does it appear that the provision omitted therefrom was due to mutual mistake of the parties.

[3] As we understand appellant's contention, it is that the omission was due to his mistake, since it was his intention to have it inserted, and believed it was so incorporated, which facts the defendant at the time knew or suspected. That plaintiff intended to have the provision incorporated in the lease is wholly inconsistent with the fact that he spent a half hour or so examining that and other papers and retained in his possession a duplicate of the lease which presumably, by reason of its importance and in view of the fact that he, as stated, did not examine it carefully before its execution, must thereafter have acquainted himself with its contents, and likewise inconsistent with the fact that two months later he executed the supplement thereto, wherein he made no reference to the alleged obligation of defendant to construct a third story, or make other improvements other than such as defendant at its option might make. There is no evidence that it was ever agreed orally that the written lease should embody such provision. As said by the trial court:

"Unless it was understood or intended by the parties that the terms of their agreement respecting the third story should be incorporated into their written lease of the two-story building, there is no ground for a reformation."

Appellant cites the case of Los Angeles Co. v. New Liverpool Co., 150 Cal. 21, 87 Pac. 1029, wherein, supported by numerous authorities, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

"The mere failure of a party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation at the instance of the party who executes it thus carelessly."

The principle there enunciated cannot aid appellant in the case at bar, since the court upon sufficient evidence finds that it was not the intention of the parties to incorporate the provision in the lease. Conceding, however, that plaintiff did intend to have it embodied in the lease and, believing it was so inserted, signed the lease, and that his failure to note such omission therefrom was due to his own carelessness, notwithstanding which fact he would, provided the mistake was at the time known to or suspected by defendant, be entitled to have it reformed, the evidence in the case wholly fails to establish such knowledge on the part of defendant, or even disclose reasonable grounds upon which to base the suspicion that plaintiff executed the instrument under a mistaken belief that it contained the provision. The evidence and circumstances proven, together with the inferences fairly deducible from such circumstances, fully justified the court in making findings of fact from which it properly concluded that plaintiff was not entitled to have the lease reformed in the manner prayed for.

[4, 5] The oral contract was one wholly disconnected with the lease and chattel mortgage given to secure payment of the rent reserved therein. By it defendant agreed to construct in the spring, if so requested by plaintiff, a third story upon said two-story apartment house and lease it to plaintiff for an annual rental equal to 10 per cent. of its cost. While defendant might be liable for a breach thereof, such non-compliance constitutes no defense to the enforcement of the lease and chattel mortgage, the terms of which, as we have seen, must be construed according to the plain import of the language used therein. To quote from the opinion of the trial judge:

"If the oral agreement respecting the third story be regarded as an agreement requiring the lessor to make improvements in or upon the leased premises, then it is in direct conflict with the provision of the written lease that the lessor shall not be required to make any improvements, and therefore such oral agreement is inadmissible under the provisions of sections 1625 and 1639 of the Civil Code. Tracy v. Union Iron Works, 104 Mo. 193, 16 S. W. 203. It would also conflict with the description of the premises described in the written lease. The leased premises are described in the written lease as a 'two-story frame apartment house.' The performance of the agreements respecting the third story would convert the leased premises into a 'three-story frame apartment house.' If the oral agreement respecting the third story requires the lessor to build new or additional premises and to lease the same to the lessee for a term beginning in the spring of 1910 and ending with the term described in the written lease of the original two-story building—a term of more than four years—and to lease the same at a rental equal to 10 per cent. of the cost of building such new or additional premises, then the contract is in effect a contract for a lease of a premises for more than a year, and it is void under subdivision 5, § 1624, of the Civil Code."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by David T. Ruffin against David Becker and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant E. R. Lilienthal appeals. Affirmed.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial. There is no controversy as to the facts, the construction of a certain written instrument being determinative of the merits of the case. The action was brought against Becker as lessee and Lilienthal as guarantor or surety for the recovery of the sum of $2,100 for rent of certain premises on Geary street in San Francisco. As stated above, there is no dispute as to the terms of the lease, the amount due thereunder, or that appellant Lilienthal guaranteed the payment of the rent. There are only two grounds upon which appellant relies for a reversal: (1) That a certain executory contract of sale dated April 29, 1908, operated as a release of the guarantor from all obligations created by said lease; and (2) that the court erred in overruling appellant's objections to certain questions asked of the plaintiff, the only witness examined at the trial.

[1] The said instrument of April 29, 1908, by which appellant claims to have effaced his liability under the lease, was as follows:

"This agreement, made this 29th day of April, 1908, between David T. Ruffin of San Francisco, California, first party, and E. R. Lilienthal of the same place, second party, Witnesseth:

"That first party has agreed to sell, and second party has agreed to buy, that certain property in San Francisco, California, together with the improvements thereon [describing said leased property] for the sum of nineteen thousand dollars, whereof one thousand dollars have been paid by second party to first party contemporaneously herewith, and the balance shall be payable upon the completion of the purchase as hereinafter provided.

"Second party shall have thirty days after receipt from first party of an abstract of title to said property for the payment of the balance of the purchase price against delivery of a good and sufficient deed free from incumbrance.

"If during said thirty days, second party shall point out in writing any objections to the title, first party shall have sixty days within which to remedy said defects. If during said sixty days said defects should not be remedied, then, unless the time be extended, this agreement shall terminate, and said deposit shall be repaid to said second party. * * *

"It is part of the consideration hereof that second party shall be released from all liability under that certain written guaranty executed by him of performance by David Becker under the lease made to the latter by first party under date of October 31, 1906."

It seems to us that the reasonable construction of said instrument leads to the conclusion that the parties intended that if the title was not made satisfactory to the prospective purchaser, said executory contract of sale should cease to be operative, and that all rights of both parties created by said contract should be at an end. In other words, they agreed that if Ruffin failed for 60 days to make good any defects in the title pointed out by Lilienthal, the parties should thereafter sustain to each other the same relation as though no such contract had been executed. This, it is believed, is the fair import of the expression, "This agreement shall terminate and said deposit shall be repaid to said second party." If said contract was extinguished the provision thereof in relation to said release of the guaranty would, of course, fall with the other terms. Lilienthal did point out certain objections to the title, and no steps were taken by Ruffin, within 60 days or, indeed, at any time, to obviate the objections, and nothing further was done toward the consummation of the sale or the transfer of the property. As we view it, the agreement of sale, therefore, terminated and it constituted no defense to the action on said guaranty.

We cannot accept appellant's contention that he was released from any obligation on the guaranty by virtue of the execution of said executory contract of sale. At the time of the execution of said contract there was due for rent the sum of $1,200, and Lilienthal was bound to make good to Ruffin the sum of $300 per month till the end of the term, amounting to something over $12,000. Unless the language of the contract compels the construction we should be slow to impute such unreasonable intention on the part of Ruffin to surrender this valuable right resting upon a concededly valid obligation for a contract of sale that was quite likely to and really did lapse at the expiration of 90 days after April 29, 1908. It seems more reasonable to hold that the parties had in view the consummation of the sale, and that the consideration for the transfer of the property was, on the part of Lilienthal, the payment of $19,000 and of Ruffin the conveyance of the land and the release of said guaranty.

[2] But if there is any ambiguity in the respect indicated, then it must be construed against appellant in accordance with the familiar principles pointed out in the briefs.

First, the said contract of sale was prepared by Lilienthal, and neither Ruffin, nor any legal advisor of his, had anything to do with its preparation. "In cases of uncertainty not removed by the preceding rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist." Section 1654, Civil Code; Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 348, 40 Pac. 534.

[3, 4] Second, it must be taken in the sense that Lilienthal supposed Ruffin understood it. Section 1864, Code of Civil Procedure. There can be no doubt from the evidence as to the facts in relation to this point. Mr. Ruffin testified:

"At the time this thing was executed I had it read over twice and Mr. Lilienthal interpreted it for me partially. He said: 'That's a fair agreement; it is fair to you; it is fair to me.' And he said, 'You give me 30 days after you give me the abstract to pay for it in, and at the end of that time if I find any flaws in the title I will give you 60 days to remedy it in; and at the end of that time if you have not remedied them, our agreement is null and void, and we have not accomplished anything; we are back where we started.'"

Third, the ambiguity is entirely clarified by the parol evidence of the intention of the parties. We have already quoted above sufficient of the testimony of Mr. Ruffin to relieve the question of any doubt that the relinquishment of the liability on the guaranty was to be conditional upon the completed sale of the property.

[5] If we are right in the constructions we have placed upon said executory contract of sale, parol evidence of the conversations and prior negotiations of the parties was unnecessary and, indeed, inadmissible, but it was entirely without prejudice, since it was in line and harmony with the written instrument itself.

But as we conceive it, the view most favorable to appellant that can be taken is that said instrument was ambiguous and fairly susceptible of two different constructions, so that reasonably intelligent men on reading the contract would honestly differ as to the meaning thereof. Hence, upon this assumption, the case would be one for the application of the familiar rule embodied in sections 1856 and 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We deem further consideration of the cause unnecessary. Being entirely satisfied that the decision of the lower court is just, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. The judgment heretofore rendered was set aside to permit appellant to file his reply brief. His time had been extended several times in accordance with stipulations of the attorneys and apparently the last period agreed upon had expired. The cause was therefore deemed submitted and the judgment of affirmance followed. Thereafter it was made to appear that another stipulation had been signed by the attorneys for respondent giving appellant additional time to file his reply brief. Through inadvertence this stipulation had not been presented to the court, and the court was not apprised of its existence until after said judgment was rendered. No objection was made by respondent to the motion of appellant to reopen the case. We have considered said reply brief, but we adhere to the views expressed in the opinion heretofore rendered. Affirmed.

KINCAID v. DUNN et al. (Civ. 1663.)

1. DAMAGES $\approx$ 113 — INJURY TO PERSONAL PROPERTY—MEASURE—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, § 3333, relating to breach of an obligation not arising from contract, the measure of damages for injuries to personal property, in the absence of its total destruction, is the difference in its value immediately before and after the injury, provided that, if it be capable of repair at an expense less than its diminution in value, the recoverable damage is limited to the cost of repairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 90, 91, 279, 280; Dec. Dig. $\approx$ 113.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR $\approx$ 173—REVIEW—THEORY OF CASE BELOW.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's automobile, where the case was tried below on the theory that the proper measure of damages was the cost of repairs, the defendants making no offer to show that the diminution in value, the proper measure of damages claimed by them on appeal, would be less than the cost of such repairs, they could not complain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1079-1089, 1091-1093, 1095-1098, 1101-1120; Dec. Dig. $\approx$ 173.]

3. DAMAGES $\approx$ 188—INJURIES TO PERSONAL PROPERTY.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's automobile, evidence held sufficient to justify a finding that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $310.85.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 511; Dec. Dig. ¶188.]

4. DAMAGES ¶46—INJURIES TO PERSONAL PROPERTY—RECOVERY.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's automobile, it was not a condition precedent to recovery for certain items of damage that plaintiff should actually have expended the sum in replacing or repairing the damaged parts.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by W. J. Kincaid against Francis Dunn and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank D. McClure, of Los Angeles, for appellants. T. W. Duckworth, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for damages. The complaint charged defendants with so negligently driving an automobile that it ran into and collided with plaintiff's automobile, injuring it to his damage in the sum of $350. The court gave judgment for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

[1, 2] Appellants' chief contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that plaintiff's automobile was damaged in the sum of $310.85. For the purpose of ascertaining the damage, plaintiff was permitted, without objection on the part of defendants, to testify as to the cost of repairing the car. Appellants now insist that such evidence was erroneously admitted for the reason that the measure of damage was the difference in the value of the car before and after the injury. Section 3333, Civil Code, provides:

"For the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, the measure of damages * * * is the amount which will compensate for all of the detriment proximately caused."

This detriment, in the absence of total destruction of the property, is the difference in the value of the property immediately before and after the injury, provided, however, if the injury be capable of repair at an expense less than the diminution in value of the property as injured, the damage is limited to the cost of making such repair. Section 435 (9th Ed.) Sedgwick on Damages. As stated, the cause was, without objection on the part of defendants, tried upon the theory that the injury could be repaired, as found by the court, at a cost of $310.85. Neither did defendants offer to show that the diminution in value on account of the injury would be less than the cost of such repairs. They should not now be heard for the first time on appeal to complain that the case was tried on an erroneous theory.

[3, 4] Conceding the correctness of the theory upon the trial so had, appellants nevertheless insist that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of damage in the sum of $310.85. The evidence clearly tends to prove that after the accident plaintiff had the car taken to a garage and fixed up to an extent that would enable him to get it home, for which work he paid $123; that later he paid $36 for replacing parts that were broken in the collision, making a total of $159. It further appeared that the fenders were broken, the cost of repairing which was $22; that the lamps were likewise broken, the cost of obtaining which was $33; that the windshield was broken, the cost of replacing which would be $15; and that the tonneau or body was smashed and broken, the cost of repairing which would be $200. These items, added to the sum actually paid out, aggregate an amount in excess of that which was allowed by the court and clearly support the finding as to the amount of damage. Appellants, however, contend that the last four items, aggregating $270, should not be considered in ascertaining the amount of damage sustained by plaintiff for the reason that he had neither incurred nor expended any sum in the replacing of such damaged parts or making repair thereof. In other words, the position of counsel is that, if plaintiff's automobile had been totally destroyed, he could not have maintained an action to recover damages therefor unless he had first bought a new machine. While it is true, as contended by appellants, that no recovery can be had in personal injury suits for services rendered by physicians in attending the injured, unless such bills have been paid, or at least liability incurred therefor, such rule does not apply in an action to recover for damages to personal property. In the one case the damages are special and can only arise out of the fact that the expense has been incurred and constitutes a liability against the plaintiff, whereas in the other the action is for general damages.

While there was some conflict of evidence touching upon the negligence of defendants, that offered on behalf of plaintiff clearly tended to establish the issue in his favor and was ample to support the finding complained of.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

IIART v. ALL PERSONS, etc., et al. (Civ. 1245.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 26, 1915.)

1. QUIETING TITLE ¶44—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—SUFFICIENCY.

A plaintiff, in a suit to quiet title, cannot rely altogether on defendant's failure to prove title, and cannot prevail, unless he shows title in himself, and, if he has no title, he may not complain that some one else, also without title, asserts an interest in the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-92; Dec. Dig. ¶44.]

2. QUIETING TITLE $\S$ 10—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—SUFFICIENCY.

Actual possession and occupancy of land under claim of ownership for any period enables the possessor to maintain action to quiet title against a trespasser or one establishing no title in himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 36-42; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 10.]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION $\S$ 16—ACQUISITION OF TITLE BY ADVERSE POSSESSION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"OCCUPANCY."

One who never exercised any acts of possession of land, except to survey it and set boundary stakes, does not show occupancy, within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1006, providing that occupancy for any period confers title against all, except the state and those who have title by prescription, transfer, will, or succession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 82-89; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 16.]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION $\S$ 17—"OCCUPANCY"—"OCCUPATION"—"ACTUAL POSSESSION."

Occupancy within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1006, providing that occupancy for any period confers title, good against all, except the state and those having title by prescription, transfer, will, or succession, is synonymous with actual possession, as distinguished from constructive possession, and the possession must be such as, if continued uninterruptedly for the statutory period, may, so far as possession is required, ripen into title, and "occupation" meaning subjection to control and signifying actual possession.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Actual Possession; Occupancy.]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION $\S$ 27—POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held not to justify a finding that plaintiff was in occupancy of the land in controversy, within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1006, declaring that occupancy confers title against all, except the state and those having title by prescription, transfer, will, or succession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 121, 122, 652, 664, 684; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 27.]

6. QUIETING TITLE $\S$ 44—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

A plaintiff, suing to quiet title under the McEnerney act, who relies on adverse possession, must show every element necessary to constitute adverse possession by clear and positive testimony, and proof that, for purposes of pleasure, members of plaintiff's family once or twice a week went to the land in controversy to see ships come in and enjoy the beautiful view of the ocean it afforded, and to have an occasional picnic there, does not show adverse possession, for the land possessed considerable value as a residence site.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Suit to quiet title under the McEnerney Act by Catherine Hart against the Spring Valley Water Company and others, in which the defendant named set up title to a part of the land in controversy. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant named appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, of San Francisco, for appellant. Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. On August 25, 1911, plaintiff brought suit under the McEnerney act to establish her title to two parcels of land situated in the city and county of San Francisco. In its amended answer appellant set up title to a portion of one of these parcels, but the court found in favor of plaintiff as to all land claimed by her. The appeal is from the whole of the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial, although no error is claimed, except as to a portion of one lot of the land. The situation is explained by the following diagram; the land in dispute being the shaded portion:

B C D E—Land described in complaint.
F I—Line of Spring Valley Water Company's fence.
B C I F—Land admittedly owned by Catherine Hart.
F I D E—Land in dispute.

It is stated by appellant that:

"Neither party claimed title to the disputed territory by direct chain of title from a paramount source. Plaintiff's claim reduces itself to an assertion of title by prescription under a conveyance in 1878 from a party who did not deraign title from any paramount source of title. Appellant claims by prescription under three separate conveyances, none of which are from grantors shown to be connected with the title of plaintiff's grantor."

During the trial it was also stated by appellant that its only claim "is that of adverse possession." The conveyances upon which plaintiff relies, it may be stated, are a deed from A. W. Von Schmidt to Henry Hart (plaintiff's husband), dated January 21, 1878, deed from Henry Hart to Henry E. Hart (plaintiff's son), dated some time between January 21, 1878, and December 15, 1890, deed from Henry E. Hart to Catherine Hart, plaintiff herein, dated December 15, 1890.

At the outset it may be well to state that it would have been legally impossible for the court to have found in favor of defendant's contention that it had a title by prescription to said disputed tract. Evidence of certain essential elements of adverse possession on the part of defendant was utterly lacking. Indeed, it is at least doubtful whether there was sufficient evidence of any of these elements. The only showing made in favor of defendant's claim was in reference to a certain fence that was built years ago upon or near the southern line of said shaded portion of the diagram. There was no evidence that defendant had exclusive possession of the disputed strip or that it paid any of the taxes that were levied upon it. There was no showing that said tract was entirely inclosed or that any portion of it was used or actually occupied by defendant.

As to the Spring Valley Water Company's fence, no witness was called who had personal knowledge of when or how or under what authority it was located and constructed, and the two who testified declared nothing of their own knowledge, except simply facts from which only the inference could be drawn that the fence actually existed along said line from a very early period. The most important witness for appellant was Mr. Herman Schussler, who was assistant engineer of the company from 1864 to 1866, and who has been chief engineer and consulting engineer ever since. He testified:

That he visited Lobos creek with Mr. Elliott, the city engineer, in the summer of 1866, and that he then saw a fence. "For the purpose of keeping cattle and impurities out of the creek, there was a fence on both sides of the creek. If I remember right, there was one on both sides—one on the south side, on the upper edge of the bank, and one on the north side of the flat close to within 50 or 75 feet of the creek—so that the cattle and horses of the government officers would not get at the water. * * * Anywhere between 1866 and 1870 I saw that the fence was up on the upper edge of the slope—quite a straight line. There was an old board fence there."

He further testified:

That he did not put up the fence nor order it put up; that "it was there before I came there"; and the only thing he knew about the fence was that he "had seen it there a number of times."

The only other witness as to this matter for appellant was George P. Dillman, a surveyor and civil engineer, but he knew nothing about the fence and did not see it until 1908, and his testimony is significant only as to the location of the old fence. He declared:

That "I was just told to make a survey of the fence as it existed from Fifteenth avenue to the ocean. I didn't have any other instructions. I just picked up the fence as it went along." That he did not "know anything about the title."

[1] The foregoing is not decisive of the case, however, as, notwithstanding no finding nor judgment as prayed for by defendant could be sustained, appellant has the legal right to insist that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff.

It is, of course, true that, in an action to quiet title, plaintiff cannot rely altogether upon defendant's failure to prove his title. The rule is as stated in Williams v. City of San Pedro, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 49, 94 Pac. 236:

"It is elementary that a plaintiff, in an action to quiet title, cannot prevail unless he shows title in himself. If he has no title, he cannot complain that some one else, also without title, asserts an interest in the land"—citing cases.

Therefore we must consider the attack made by appellant upon the judgment in favor of respondent, and especially the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support two certain findings of the court "upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support which," appellant claims, "depends the correctness of the judgment which the lower court entered." These findings are:

"A. W. Von Schmidt was on January 21, 1878, and long prior thereto, in open, actual, notorious, exclusive, and peaceable possession of the real estate described in paragraph 2 of said complaint," and "ever since said January 21, 1878, the said Henry Hart, Henry E. Hart, and Catherine Hart, the plaintiff, have been in the actual, open, notorious, exclusive, and peaceable possession of said above-described estate openly, claiming to own said described real estate against all other persons and against all the world, and during the period between said January 21, 1878, and December 15, 1890, the said Henry Hart and Henry E. Hart so claimed the said real estate in fee, and since said December 15, 1890, said Catherine Hart, the plaintiff, has so claimed title to said described real estate in fee against all persons and against all the world."

[2] Before considering, however, the sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings, we may refer to a principle that is not disputed, to the effect that:

"The actual possession and occupation of land under claim of ownership for any period is sufficient to enable the party in possession to maintain an action to quiet title as against a trespasser or one who establishes no title in himself." McGovern v. Mowry, 91 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 746; Morris v. Clarkin, 156 Cal. 16, 103 Pac. 180.

The foregoing statement, which we adopt, is taken from portions of the opinion heretofore filed in the case. Upon further and more careful examination of the evidence and the principles of law applicable thereto, we find ourselves compelled to reach a different conclusion from that first arrived at.

Neither party deraigned title from the paramount source. Both parties, however, claim to have "entered into the possession of the property under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question" (Code Civ. Proc. § 322); and both urge that their claim has ripened into title by adverse possession, as defined in section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

"For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by any person claiming a title founded upon a written instrument, * * * land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases: 1. Where it has been usually cultivated or improved; 2. Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure; 3. Where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing timber for the purposes of husbandry, or for pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant; 4. Where a known farm or single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared, or not inclosed according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated."

Section 325, Code Civ. Proc. provides:

"That in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under the provision of any section or sections of this Code, unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously," etc.

Defendant's claim of title by prescription has already been disposed of. It remains to determine whether plaintiff has shown sufficient facts to support the findings in her favor.

[3] It was admitted that plaintiff has whatever title was in Von Schmidt, and if the latter, when he conveyed to Henry Hart, had such possession as would have sustained an action against a trespasser, the concession of defendant in effect clothes plaintiff with such title and would be sufficient to support her action as against defendant. Von Schmidt was not a witness, and all we know of his possession is derived from the testimony of members of the Hart family. There is no evidence of any inclosure of the land by Von Schmidt and no evidence that he made any use of the land. He claimed to own it and, in 1878, caused public notice to be given that he would sell at public auction certain blocks of land which, it is claimed, included the land in question. Such sale was held, and Henry Hart bought certain land at the sale and took a deed from Von Schmidt. The fence shown on the diagram as the Spring Valley Water Company's fence was there at that time, and Henry Hart testified that Von Schmidt told him it was put there "to keep the cattle out," but when it was erected or by whom does not appear, although the evidence was that it was in existence in 1866. The probability is that the water company caused it to be erected, as in 1866 it was maintaining a fence of which the fence referred to by Henry Hart was a part, extending from Fifteenth avenue, along Point Lobos creek, to the ocean; and Engineer Schussler testified that it was to keep cattle from the creek and prevent the water from pollution "and holding the land." Speaking of this fence, he testified:

"The company's fence, as I have known it for many years, was along the line indicated on Johnson's survey, which is marked on this map here."

He did not state, however, who caused the fence to be built, as it was there when he took office with the company.

Appellant attaches significance to the calls in Von Schmidt's deed to Henry Hart. The description reads that, from the point of beginning 250 feet from the northeast corner of Lake street, the line runs:

"Thence easterly at the right angle and parallel with Lake street, one hundred and twenty feet, thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Twenty-First avenue one hundred and twenty feet, more or less, to the southerly line of the lands of the Spring Valley Water Company, thence northwesterly along said line of said lands one hundred and twenty feet, more or less, to the easterly line of Twenty-First avenue, thence southerly along said line of Twenty-First avenue one hundred and twenty-four feet, more or less, to the point of beginning."

The call for 120 feet northerly to the southerly line of defendant's lands, and thence northwesterly along said line, opens a question whether the distance or the monument would control, and it would seem also to suggest a recognition on the part of Von Schmidt and his grantee that the southerly boundary of defendant's land was the northerly boundary of plaintiff's land. From the view of the case we have taken, we do not find it necessary to consider this feature of the evidence.

Henry Hart testified that Von Schmidt told him that he "went down to within 50 feet of the creek," which would include the land in dispute north of this fence, as shown by the diagram. Hart testified:

"There were stakes there—surveyed stakes—a number of stakes—the tops of the stakes with Von Schmidt's name on them on the northerly line within 50 feet of the water. Q. And was on your boundary line? A. It was on our boundary line. Q. How many of these monuments were there? A. There was about 12 on each side, north, east, west, and south."

Did the fact that Von Schmidt surveyed the land, staked the boundaries as shown, and afterwards pointed out the land as land he was selling, constitute actual possession or occupancy? Section 1006 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"Occupancy for any period confers title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, transfer, will, or succession."

The term "occupancy," as here used, means possession, actual possession, as contradistinguished from constructive possession. "Occupation" is synonymous with the expression "subjection to the will and control" and with "possessio pedis," and signifies "actual possession." Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 683, 690; McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 209, 12 Pac. 428; U. S. v. Rogers (D. C.) 23 Fed. 658, 666. In Plume v. Seward, 4 Cal. 95, 97, 60 Am. Dec. 599, where the claim rested on possession, Mr. Chief Justice Murray said:

"From a careful examination of the authorities, I am satisfied there must be an actual bona fide occupation, a possessio pedis, a subjection to the will and control, as contradistinguished from the mere assertion of title, and the exercise of casual acts of ownership, such as recording deeds, paying taxes," etc.

In Murphy v. Wallingford, 6 Cal. 648, 649, citing Plume v. Seward, the court said:

"A mere entry without color of title, accompanied by a survey and marking boundaries, is not sufficient."

There is no evidence that Von Schmidt ever exercised any acts of possession, except to survey the land and set boundary stakes. This we are satisfied was not sufficient to constitute occupancy as contemplated by the statute.

[4, 5] Having no title by possession or otherwise, Von Schmidt conveyed none. Plaintiff must therefore rest her right to recover either upon her own occupancy, as we have held that term to mean under section 1006 of the Civil Code, or she must recover by reason of having established adverse possession. But occupancy, as we have seen, is synonymous with possession, and the possession must be actual and such as, if continued uninterruptedly for the statutory period, might, so far as possession is required, ripen into title. What was the character of the possession shown by plaintiff? We quote from the testimony.

Plaintiff, Catherine Hart (wife of Henry) testified that she went on the premises first 33 or 34 years ago.

"Q. Did you go upon the premises? A. I did not live on it at all. Q. Did you go upon it and see it—walk over it? A. Yes, sir; walked over it all the time. Q. How often? A. Most always go there—maybe once a week, or maybe twice a week, anyway—and the beautiful scenery you could see there and the ships coming in on the water and we would take lunch there sometimes."

She testified:

"That no one claimed title, to her knowledge. 'They never bothered me up to now. Q. Did you cultivate the land in any way? A. No, sir; never planted anything and never leased it to any one.'"

She testified:

"That there were no sidewalks there. 'The street was there and I could walk to the place. I was there often. I used to take the children there for the view. It was a beautiful place to visit.'"

Henry Hart testified:

"That after he bought the property he went on the property 'sometimes a dozen times a month, sometimes two or three times a week. I would go out there to have a good walk, ever since I bought it from Von Schmidt. Q. Prior to the time the Spring Valley Water Company served papers on you under the McEnerney act, did they ever make any claim to you of any interest in that property? A. Never. Q. Did they ever dispute your right to go upon the property? A. No, sir. Q. Did you claim ownership of the property when you went on the property? A. Yes, sir.' He and his wife paid all the taxes. 'Q. Did Von Schmidt point out to you the property which you were then purchasing from him? A. He pointed to me the spaces. He said, 'That is my ground.' Q. Did you see a fence on the property at that time? A. There was a little rickety fence put up there for keeping the cattle from getting to the water. Q. Do you know how far that fence was north of Lake street? A. I didn't go down that far to look at it at that time. Q. Did it go across the property which Von Schmidt pointed out to you as being his property? A. There was a creek of water that the Spring Valley used to use, and there was a little fence to keep the cattle out. * * * Q. You never cultivated the property? A. No; I bought it same as I would buy any other piece of ground to hold it—to let it stop there. Q. Did you build a fence on the property? A. Me and my boy, when we were putting the McEnerney act on, we had it fenced. Q. When did you put that fence on it? A. Here about two or three years ago. I forgot how long since we had the McEnerney act."

It appeared that he put the fence there in August, 1911. The evidence was that this so-called McEnerney fence was built after the defendant in this action had commenced an action to quiet its title under the McEnerney act against all persons, in which this plaintiff was one of the defendants. That action was commenced December 30, 1910, and is pending.

Henry Hart testified:

"That, assisted by his son, he built a 'fence five or six or eight years ago, three or four boards high. It was built five or six years ago when the teams used to be running over it, and I didn't want the teams running over it. * * * It was to the south of Spring Valley.'"

Plaintiff's son fixes the time this fence was built as a year or two before the McEnerney fence was built. This fence, however, did not inclose any of the land in dispute, to wit, the land north of the Spring Valley fence, and it does not definitely appear upon what part of the land the fence was, except that it was south of the Spring Valley Company's fence and was to keep the teams from running over the land.

The most that can be said of this testimony is that, for purposes of pleasure, members of the Hart family once or twice a week went to the land to see the ships come in, to enjoy the beautiful view of the ocean it afforded, and to have an occasional picnic there. They did this under claim of ownership, and no one disputed their right, but there was nothing in these acts importing that kind of actual possession of the land which the law demands of one claiming ownership of it; there was nothing in them to indicate exclusive ownership or possession. It was no more than other persons residing in the city might have done and probably did. For more than 30 years plaintiff and her grantors had exercised this and no other kind of dominion over this land. The fencing done south of the Spring Valley Company's fence, as to which the time of its construction and where it was erected are indefinite, would not add anything to the claim of actual possession of the land in dispute; and the fence built in 1911 to comply with the requirements of the McEnerney act was constructed to meet the claim of the water company that had, prior thereto, erected a fence around the land.

[6] Did plaintiff establish her claim of adverse possession? The burden was on plaintiff to show that every element necessary to constitute adverse possession was made clear (1 Cyc. 1143); and the doctrine of adverse possession is to be "strictly construed, and such possession cannot be made out by inference, but only by clear and positive proof." 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 887. The requirements in an action under the McEnerney act are very fully and clearly set forth in Lofstad v. Murasky, 152 Cal. 64, 68, 91 Pac. 1008, in which the rule as stated in Plume v. Seward, supra, was approved.

We held, in Mattes v. Hall, 21 Cal. App. 552, 563, 132 Pac. 300, that, whether the entry is with or without claim of title under a written instrument or without color of title, "the possession must be evidenced by means having reference 'to the particular locality or quality of the property,' must be 'manifested in some appropriate manner.'" In Cohen v. Anderson, 22 Cal. App. 634, 135 Pac. 1096, we had occasion to consider the claim of adverse possession where the claimant sought to build up a right by proof of using the land as a summer resort; the only season of the year when it could be so used being a few months in the summer. We there held that adverse possession was not made out.

Respondent claims that:

"No particular use of the land was required of the plaintiff and her predecessors, and the uses to which it was put by them were such as were appropriate and reasonably adapted to the particular land, its condition and location, and were sufficient proof of actual possession."

There are cases in our California reports and elsewhere which would sustain the claim of possession where the evidence showed that the land was peculiarly adapted to the particular use to which it was being put, by reason of its condition and location. Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567, is cited by respondent, among other cases. But in that case the court said:

"By actual possession is meant a subjection to the will and dominion of the claimant, and is usually evidenced by occupation—by a substantial inclosure—by cultivation, or by appropriate use, according to the particular locality and quality of the property."

Mining claims and water privileges are mentioned as having a peculiar character. There was no evidence tending to show that the property here involved possessed any exceptional quality, or that its locality gives it any peculiar character, or that its use was "according to the particular locality and quality of the property." While, no doubt, the land in question furnishes a beautiful view of the ocean and may be a delightful spot for picnics and to enjoy a morning's walk, there is no evidence that this is the highest or best or only use to which it may be put or to which it is adapted. The description of it by plaintiff's witnesses would indicate considerable value as a residence site. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that the use made of this land was such as would meet the requirements of the statute or that it shows such possession as the cases uniformly hold to be essential in establishing adverse possession.

In Lofstad v. Murasky the court quoted approvingly from Wolf v. Baldwin, 19 Cal. 313, in stating what kind of actual occupation was required under the Van Ness ordinance and as applicable under the McEnerney act, as follows:

"A possession which is accompanied with the real and effectual enjoyment of the property. It is the possession which follows the subjection of the property to the will and dominion of the claimant to the exclusion of others; and this possession must be evidenced by occupation or cultivation, or other appropriate use, according to the locality and character of the particular premises. * * * It must, in other words, be an open, unequivocal, actual possession—notorious, apparent, uninterrupted, and exclusive—carrying with it marks and evidences of ownership, which apply in ordinary cases to the possession of real property."

It was said, in Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24, 46:

"A mere intention to occupy land, however openly proclaimed, is not possession. The intention must be carried into actual execution by such open, unequivocal, and notorious acts of dominion as plainly indicate to the public that the person who performs them has appropriated the land and claims exclusive dominion over it. Anything short of this is not what the law denominates * * * possession."

The statute requires, as one of the prerequisites to the establishment of adverse possession, "that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously," etc. Civ. Code, § 325.

Inasmuch as the occupation contemplated by the statute has not been sufficiently shown, the finding of ownership in plaintiff is not established, and the judgment is not supported. This alone, without considering other objections made by appellant, compels a reversal.

So far as concerns the land in dispute, to wit, the land north of the Spring Valley Water Company's fence, as shown on the diagram, the judgment and order are reversed, and, as to the land south of said fence, the judgment and order are affirmed; each party to pay his own costs.

ALTPETER et al. v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO. (Civ. 1258.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 9, 1915.)

1. PLEADING ⚡248 — AMENDMENT — NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

An amendment which changes the cause of action set out in the original pleading is not allowable.

2. PARTIES ⚡59 — SUBSTITUTION — NEW PARTY.

Where there is no joint interest or privity of interest, a different defendant cannot be substituted for the defendant originally sued, and in this respect there is no distinction between individuals and corporations.

3. APPEARANCE ☞8—WHAT CONSTITUTES—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, providing that a defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him, an appearance may be made by acts other than those enumerated, if of an unequivocal character showing a submission to the general jurisdiction of the court; and the action of an attorney for a corporation named in the summons by mistake and against which there was no cause of action before amendment of the complaint so as to make another corporation a party defendant, in trying to obtain a dismissal, was not an "appearance" for the substituted defendant.

4. JUDGMENT ☞138—VACATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing, when the summons has not been personally served on the defendant, the court, on terms, may allow such defendant within one year after judgment to answer to the merits of the original action, a corporation substituted as a party defendant in place of another corporation, and for whom the attorney for such other corporation had no authority to appear, was entitled to a vacation of the judgment against it and to answer to the merits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Catherine Altpeter and another against the Postal Telegraph Cable Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and from the denial of its motion to set aside and vacate the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed, with direction to grant motion and allow defendant to file an answer.

See, also, 143 Pac. 92.

Willard P. Smith and B. B. Blake, both of San Francisco, for appellant. E. E. Gaddis, of Woodland, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant moved to set aside and vacate the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs on the ground that defendant was not served with summons and did not appear in the action. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the order.

It appeared that when the action was commenced there existed two corporations bearing the same name, one organized under the laws of the state of New York, and one organized under the laws of the state of California. They will be referred to hereafter as the New York corporation and the California corporation, respectively. In the title of the action the name of the corporation was given without stating where incorporated, but in the body of the complaint the defendant was described as "a corporation organized and acting under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New York." This corporation had then on file, in the office of the secretary of state, a copy of its articles of incorporation, and had also filed a statement designating the name and residence of the person or agent upon whom process could be served, namely, J. K. Beede, of Sacramento, who was served with summons as such designated agent. The articles of incorporation of the California corporation were, of course, on file in the same office whence issued the certificate of the secretary of state showing that it had been duly incorporated, and a copy of these articles was in the hands of plaintiffs' attorney, and was introduced in evidence by him, and showed that the principal place of business of the corporation was in San Francisco, and that there were three directors or trustees, two of whom resided in Berkeley, Alameda county, and one in Fruitvale, said county, and that they were the subscribers to all of the shares of the corporation. Beede was an employé of the California corporation.

The New York corporation having been duly served with summons, its attorney, Mr. L. T. Hatfield, filed an answer to the complaint, and appeared when the case was called for trial. The action was for damages caused by the alleged cutting down of trees in front of plaintiff's premises by defendant's employés. When the first witness was called it appeared from his testimony that the persons engaged in the alleged trespass were in the service of the California corporation, and were not acting for or by authority of the New York corporation, and were not in any way connected with that corporation. Thereupon followed the proceedings which have given rise to this appeal. The upshot was that the court allowed the complaint to be amended by striking out the words "New York," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "California," and, as thus amended, and after Mr. Hatfield had withdrawn from the case, disclaiming any authority to appear for the California corporation, the court directed the trial to proceed, no one representing the defendant, and the jury brought in a verdict against the substituted defendant, the California corporation. It is from the judgment on this verdict that the defendant seeks to be relieved and to be given an opportunity to be heard upon the merits.

[1, 2] If the two corporations were distinct and separate entities, the court was unauthorized to allow the complaint to be amended, as was done, and to order the trial to proceed in the absence of any service upon the California corporation, and without its being represented or having made an appearance.

It is well settled that an amendment of the original pleading is not allowable which changes the cause of action therein set forth (Hackett v. Bank of California, 57 Cal. 335; Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 128, 135 Pac. 37); nor can a different defendant be substituted for the defendant originally sued where there is no joint or privity of interest (Dubbers v. Goux, 51 Cal. 153; Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 Pac. 695); and the rule is the same where the defendant is a corporation; there is no distinction made between natural and artificial persons in respect of such an amendment (Western Ry. of Alabama v. McCall, 89 Ala. 375, 7 South. 650; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Loveland, 16 Colo. App. 146, 64 Pac. 381; Concrete Publishing Co. v. Reed, 70 Misc. Rep. 22, 126 N. Y. Supp. 653).

All the proceedings at the trial are made part of the record now here on the appeal. It is quite evident that plaintiffs' attorney was of the opinion that, because both corporations had the same name, the fact that one was organized and existed under the laws of the state of New York and the other under the laws of California, so simple an amendment as striking out the words "New York" from the complaint and inserting the word "California" was allowable and, to strengthen his view, he introduced witnesses who were officers and employes of the California corporation to show the identity of the two corporations in point of fact. It appeared from the testimony very clearly that the two corporations were as distinct and separate as any two persons could be who were born of different parents and happened to have the same name. It did not appear that the two corporations had any officers or employes in common. There was an entire failure to establish any identity between the two others than in their name. After some interchange of opinion between counsel and the court the court took the matter under advisement until the afternoon session. At the opening of court Mr. Hatfield stated:

"Of course, if there is an amendment allowed which results in dismissing this defendant, naturally we have no objection, but any orders involving any other parties to the action we insist should include an order dismissing the defendant who is in court. There is no representation of any other defendant here, and we do not propose to appear for them or anything of the kind, so the making of any orders should be upon the theory that there be a dismissal or nonsuit to the New York corporation."

Mr. Hatfield was then called by plaintiffs as a witness, apparently for the purpose of showing that he was at that time the attorney for the California corporation, and Mr. Beede was called by plaintiffs and interrogated as to his employment. So far as concerns Mr. Hatfield, it appears elsewhere, as will presently be shown, as well as from his testimony, that he had no authority to appear for the corporation, and he frequently stated in the course of the proceedings that he appeared only for the defendant served with summons. Mr. Beede's employment was with the California corporation, and he had no other except that, as has already been stated, he had been designated by the New York corporation as the person on whom service of process might be made. Some discussion ensued between counsel in which Mr. Hatfield again insisted:

That he was not appearing for the California corporation, and that he had no authority to appear for it; "that counsel for plaintiffs was notified almost immediately that he had sued the wrong party. There is no surprise in this case. The Court: The only question on which I am in doubt is whether or not the plaintiff has been put upon inquiry here as to whether or not he had not sued the wrong party by this answer. * * * Mr. Gaddis: He simply told me that we had sued the wrong party, without giving us any other information at all. Mr. Hatfield: You admit that you were notified that you had sued the wrong party? Mr. Gaddis: Yes; but that wouldn't mean anything."

The court then stated:

"I shall have to strike out the name of 'New York' and substitute the name of 'California' in the pleadings. Mr. Hatfield: Then we ask to have a formal order made showing that the New York corporation is dismissed. The Court: The motion to amend will be granted. * * * Mr. Gaddis: I want both corporations before the court, and then I will know where I stand. It seems to me I am entitled to have that. * * * Mr. Hatfield: We want the record so we will know what it is, if the New York corporation is stricken out. Mr. Gaddis: I want both corporations in. Mr. Hatfield: There is no such application before the court. Mr. Gaddis: There is no reason why this corporation should be stricken out. Why does Mr. Hatfield exercise such diligence? Mr. Hatfield: Because it is my business."

After some remarks by the court and counsel:

"Mr. Gaddis: All I ask is to amend that and do that by interlineation. Mr. Hatfield: We object to any interlineation. * * * The Court: I understood your motion to be a motion to amend by striking out 'New York' and substituting 'California.' Mr. Gaddis: Yes, sir. Mr. Hatfield: We would like the court's instruction on the effect of that. The Court: The ruling is that the motion is permitted that it be done on the face of the record; striking out the words 'New York' and substituting the word 'California' on the face of the record. The clerk will make the order striking out the words 'New York' on the face of the record, and insert the word 'California.' Mr. Hatfield: We take an exception. Are there any terms? The Court: I see no occasion for any. You are not before the court. Mr. Hatfield: I would ask for an order dismissing the case as to the Postal Telegraph Cable Company of New York. The Court: There is no such defendant in the case, and never has been. I am taking your words exactly as they were given. The Postal Telegraph Cable Company of New York—there is no such company as I have seen. Mr. Hatfield: I never said anything of the kind. (The reporter reads the remark of Mr. Hatfield as follows: 'I would ask an order dismissing the case as to the Postal Telegraph Cable Company of New York.') The Court: That is not a party before the court. Mr. Hatfield: I understand, and I respectfully suggest that we withdraw from the case. If we are not before the court, we are not here. The Court: That is a different proposition, and that is not before the court. Mr. Hatfield: Then we will retire, and we do not intend any disrespect to the court. If the California corporation is the defendant in this case, we have no appearance for it, and no authority to appear. The Court: You will not be bound by the proceedings whether you remain or not. Mr. Hatfield: If we made a defense I think we would. The Court: Your presence or absence doesn't alter the situation. Mr. Gaddis: I am sorry to see you go. The Court: I will state now you have a jury here, and the jury will have to be disposed of. Mr. Gaddis: I expect to go ahead and put in the case with your honor's permission. (At this point Mr. Hatfield leaves the courtroom.)"

The trial then proceeded, and several witnesses were sworn and testified, and counsel offered in evidence the articles of incorporation of the California corporation. The record then reads:

"(At this point Mr. Hatfield returns into court.) Mr. Hatfield: I would like to have ten days in which to prepare a bill of exceptions—ten days' additional time. The Court: I will grant you the order of ten additional days. Mr. Gaddis: Inasmuch as there is no appearance on the other side, I will have to read these articles of incorporation."

We think any fair interpretation of what took place leads to the conclusion that Mr. Hatfield had no authority to appear for the California corporation; that he did not intend to appear for it, and did not, in fact, so appear. The contention of plaintiffs' counsel at the hearing was that he had a right to amend, and in this view he was sustained by the court. The amendment was not allowed, nor was it asked, on the theory that Mr. Hatfield appeared for the California corporation. "The only question is," said the court, "the question to amend, which seems to me to be proper; there is nothing else before the court."

Mr. Hatfield, throughout the proceeding, distinctly stated that he did not appear for the California corporation, and had no authority to appear for it; and that he had no such authority appears by the uncontradicted affidavits, submitted with the motion of J. G. Blake, president of that company, William Hearn, vice president, S. Elberg, secretary and treasurer, and also by Mr. Hatfield's affidavit. Mr. Blake deposed:

"That during all said time he was the only person authorized to employ attorneys for said corporation defendant. That affiant never at any time employed, retained, or instructed L. T. Hatfield, Esq., or any other attorney or any other person to represent the said defendant in the above-entitled action until after the return of the verdict by the jury at the trial of said action; that after the trial of said action, and after receiving notice of the result of said trial, affiant employed J. S. Spilman, Esq., as attorney for said defendant and L. T. Hatfield, Esq., as counsel, * * * for the purpose of procuring relief from such judgment by having the same annulled or vacated or set aside by such proceedings as they might be advised to be proper in the premises."

He also deposed that:

J. K. Beede "is not, and never has been, an officer or a managing agent of the defendant corporation"; that he "is and at all times herein mentioned has been, the chief operator and in charge of the company's telegraph station at the city of Sacramento; that he has not and never has had, any power or authority to transact any other business for or on behalf of the defendant corporation, * * * or to accept service of process against or to appear for it in any court."

With the motion was filed the verified answer of defendant, in which answer, among other things, it denied having willfully or at all cut down or injured the trees mentioned in the complaint, or that it has caused the plaintiffs or either of them the damage claimed or any damage.

[3] "A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him." Code Civ. Proc. § 1014. The Supreme Court has held that an appearance may be made in an action by acts other than those enumerated in the statute, but they must be of an unequivocal character showing a submission to the general jurisdiction of the court, such as calling for some affirmative relief. Judge Temple, speaking for the court, said, in Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 305, 45 Pac. 470, 471:

"This statute was intended to settle all disputes upon the subject. There can be no chance for argument about equivocal acts. State v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202, seems to be the other way, but the reasoning is far from satisfactory. There was no need of a statute to tell us that the acts specified would constitute appearance. The occasion for a rule was to dispose of questions upon which there might be dispute."

See the subject considered in Salmonson v. Streiffer, 13 Cal. App. 395, 110 Pac. 144, where it was held that written objections filed to the sufficiency of the sureties upon the undertaking given by plaintiff did not constitute an appearance.

It will be observed that all the proceedings during which "the course of conduct created by L. T. Hatfield," which, it is now claimed, constituted an appearance, took place before there was any amendment of the complaint, and before the California corporation was made a party to the action. He promptly withdrew as soon as the amendment was made. There was, in fact, no action pending against that corporation during these proceedings, and it cannot with legal propriety be held that an appearance was made when no action was pending.

[4] But, aside from all other considerations, the undisputed fact is that Mr. Hatfield had no authority to appear for the California corporation, and, having taken steps within the statutory period for relief by the remedy afforded by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, it seems to us, conceding that the learned trial judge had discretion to grant or deny the relief asked, it was an abuse of such discretion to deny it. Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 Pac. 232, was a case where an attorney at law assumed to represent the plaintiff at the hearing of a certain matter, but had no authority to do so. It was held that, irrespective of section 473, a court of equity had power to set aside the judgment. In Merced County v. Hicks et al., 67 Cal. 108, 7 Pac. 179, summons was not served on any of the defendants, but, at the request of one of them, an attorney signed a demurrer which on its face purported to be the joint demurrer of all of them. But the attorney had no authority to appear for any of the defendants other than Hicks. The court held that there was no appearance of the other defendants. Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 Pac. 728, was a case where it appeared that judgment was obtained without service of summons. One S. D. Wood assumed to represent the defendant, but, in fact, had no power or authority to appear for or represent it. The court held the judgment to be void.

Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, among other grounds of relief in certain cases, provides:

"When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action."

No question of estoppel arises here. We think appellant has fairly shown its right to be heard on the merits.

The order is reversed, with directions to grant defendant's motion and allow it to file an answer.

Action by F. H. Hecker against Miles Morley and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles M. Ackerman, of Los Angeles, for appellant. H. C. Millsap, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This was an action by a creditor of Miles Morley to set aside a conveyance of property by Miles Morley to James Morley, on the ground that the conveyance was made to defraud the plaintiff as a creditor of Miles Morley. The court found that there was no intent to defraud, and that there was a valuable consideration, and upon those findings gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff on his appeal makes the point, and this is the only point, that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the findings.

The only question being whether or not the findings are sustained by the evidence, the decision must go upon the familiar ground that an appellate court cannot interfere with the findings of the trial court where there is substantial evidence to sustain it. There is sufficient evidence here to support the findings of the court below. It is useless to recapitulate the evidence or state the reasons upon which the conclusions of the court may be upheld.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. R. Willis, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against Catherine Agoure and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, with order that defendants recover from the plaintiff the sum of $100 as damages because of this appeal.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per. W. I. Foley, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The action in this case was begun by the filing of a paper, designated as a complaint, on January 20, 1913. Summons was served upon the defendants on January 22, 1913. On January 24, 1913, the court below of its own motion entered this order:

"In this case the complaint states no cause of action in favor of plaintiff nor any other person. It is not signed or filed by any attorney of this court or by any person having an interest in any cause of action stated therein. The references therein to the probate department of this court are contumacious and disrespectful, and, this court believing that citizens should not be harassed by legal proceedings instituted by irresponsible persons, and that courts ought not to waste time and incur expense considering such pleadings, the court, on its own motion, orders plaintiff's complaint stricken from the files, and the cause dismissed."

This order was duly entered as a judgment, and the plaintiff appealed. It does not appear that either party was present when the order was made. The proceeding would perhaps have been more orderly and regular if the court had cited the plaintiff to appear before it at some fixed time to show cause why such an order should not be made, and had then made the order. Regardless, however, of any question of the regularity of the proceedings, the order must be affirmed on the ground that by no possibility could it have produced any harm to the plaintiff.

[1] The so-called complaint presents a pretended cause of action so preposterous that it should not be tolerated by any court. The plaintiff claims $1,000,000 damages because of the death of Pierre Agoure, which it is alleged, was caused by the negligence of the defendants. The defendants are the widow and heirs of Agoure, and are the only persons in whose behalf an action could be maintained for Agoure's death from the negligence of another. Actions for death caused by negligence cannot be maintained at all except in cases where the statute so declares. Sections 376 and 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure give the right to maintain such actions only to the parent, the personal representative, or the heir, or the guardian of an heir, of the person whose death has been so caused. The plaintiff does not show any relationship whatever to Mr. Agoure. He alleges that there was a partnership once existing between Agoure and two other persons named Menendez and he describes himself as a surviving partner—that is, a surviving partner of a firm of which he was not a member—and he alleges that the damages were caused by the loss to the partnership of the "society" of Agoure. Nothing quite so preposterous has, to our knowledge, ever been presented in any court. The only thing for a court to do with such a pretended cause is to dismiss it. Such dismissal could not have injured Mr. Lapique in the slightest degree.

[2] The taking of this appeal could have had no other motive than that of keeping alive an action on a claim that was utterly without foundation. It could not have been for any other purpose than to cause the defendants the annoyance and delay that ensued from taking the appeal, and perhaps as a means of securing some sort of a compromise. It is a case in which damages should be awarded.

The order appealed from is affirmed, and it is further ordered and adjudged that the defendants recover from the plaintiff the sum of $100 as damages because of this appeal.

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1915.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨901—DIVORCE ⇨285
—ALIMONY—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

As an order will not be reversed unless error is shown and the burden of showing it is on the appellant, an order in divorce, requiring the plaintiff husband to pay counsel fees and furnish his wife with expense money, will not be disturbed, where the wife's affidavit on which the order was granted was not in the record.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Frank M. Kellogg against Clara Kellogg. From an order requiring plaintiff to pay counsel fees and furnish his wife with expense money, he appeals. Order affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for appellant. G. F. Hoff and J. M. Chatterson, both of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court has examined the briefs, and, in the absence of the parties, will proceed to determine the case without further delay.

The action is brought by the husband against the wife, to obtain a divorce. The appeal is from an order made by the court during the progress of the case, requiring the husband to pay to the wife certain sums of money for counsel fees and for expenses in traveling from Michigan to San Diego to attend the trial. It is claimed on the part of the appellant, the husband, that the evidence taken by the court does not show any proof of the husband's abilities. In the condition of the record we cannot assent to this proposition. The case comes within the principle, so often stated, that a judgment or order will not be reversed unless error is shown, and that the burden is upon the appellant to show the error. An affidavit of the wife was introduced and set out in full. It refers to and makes a part thereof another affidavit made by her in a previous case between the parties for the same cause. The record shows that the affidavit in the other case, which was referred to in the affidavit filed, was received and considered by the court, but the transcript does not set forth its contents. There is nothing in the record to show its contents, or the facts it proved or tended to prove. Under the rule just stated, the court, on appeal, must assume that it contained facts sufficient to support the order of the court below. For that reason the order of the court will have to be affirmed.

The order is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by C. M. Arnold against B. E. Loomis and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William H. Schooler, of Chico, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, of Martinez, and Lee D. Windrem, of Port Richmond, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The complaint alleges that on May 1, 1899, plaintiff and B. E. Loomis were partners engaged in buying, selling, and dealing in real property in Contra Costa county, and that on that date they entered into an agreement to buy a tract of about 20 acres from one A. F. Pacheco and his wife. Certain details of the transaction, not necessary for consideration here, are also set out in the complaint, and the subsequent payment of one-half of the purchase price for the land by each of the copartners is alleged. There are further averments that the Pachecos, at request of the copartners, conveyed the property to Mollie A. Loomis, wife of B. E. Loomis; that part of the property was afterwards sold by the copartners, the proceeds being used to discharge the liens of certain mortgages; that 8.66 acres of the land remained unsold; and that plaintiff had vainly demanded conveyance of a half interest therein from defendants. The prayer was for judgment decreeing that Mollie A. Loomis held the property in trust for her husband and for the plaintiff, share and share alike, and that she be compelled to execute a conveyance of plaintiff's interest to him, or to sell the land under order of court and distribute the proceeds in equal parts to the copartners. In their answer the defendants denied the existence of the alleged copartnership, and the payment for the land in the manner alleged, but averred that the property was purchased by Mollie A. Loomis with her separate funds. The statute of limitations was also pleaded. Findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff. Defendants have appealed from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The formation of a copartnership rests upon the testimony of Mr. Arnold alone. He did not prove any written contract of copartnership. The only writing in evidence which at all relates to the interest of plaintiff and B. E. Loomis in the land is as follows:

"San Francisco, March 4, 1901.

"This will certify that C. M. Arnold is entitled to one-half of the net proceeds of the eight and a fraction acres situated on Wild Cat creek when sold. Said land being in Contra Costa county, and that said Loomis shall in like manner share in the commissions to be made in case of sale of the Horton tract or any portion of said land adjoining the 8.66 acres.

"[Signed] C. M. Arnold.
"B. E. Loomis."

Mrs. Loomis, as a witness, stated that she had read this document but had regarded it as merely an agreement to divide commissions. The plaintiff testified that he had never conversed with Mrs. Loomis about the property either before or after the deed was executed and delivered to her, as grantee of the Pachecos. His theory was that a trust in his favor had been thrown upon Mollie A. Loomis by her acceptance of the deed.

[1-3] Appellants insist that there is no evidence to support the finding with reference to the existence of a partnership between plaintiff and Mr. Loomis. It is true that the formation of the copartnership rests upon Mr. Arnold's testimony, but a copartnership of this kind may be created by parol (Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 26, 21 Pac. 359; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 484, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133), and necessarily proof of its continued existence may depend entirely upon oral testimony. But there was other evidence that B. E. Loomis had admitted the existence of a partnership in the ownership of the land. Plaintiff's wife and another witness testified to such admissions, and the written instrument clearly recognizes the right of C. M. Arnold to share equally in the "net proceeds" of the land in question. But appellants say that Mrs. Loomis was not bound by any of these things. While it is true that she was not present when the copartnership was formed or when the admissions in evidence were made by her husband, it is equally true that she knew of the writing in which Mr. Loomis unqualifiedly admitted that Mr. Arnold was entitled to one-half of the "net proceeds." This admission was made within two years after the land was purchased. Mrs. Loomis testified that her husband acted as her agent in all the matters pertaining to the property. She knew, as she admitted, that her husband and Mr. Arnold were to help sell the land, and, as sales of parts of it were made from time to time, she signed the deeds. As Mr. Loomis was her agent, his acts were binding upon her.

[4] But appellants insist that, as Mrs. Loomis furnished part of the money for the property, she acquired an interest which must be recognized. The court found that she advanced part of the money paid by her husband, but that she was afterwards repaid. This finding is supported by plaintiff's testimony that the entire purchase price of the land was realized and paid from the sales of a portion of it, and it is therefore immaterial how much was advanced by either partner or the source from which Mr. Loomis derived the money which he put into the purchase from the Pachecos. The written declaration also supports the conclusion that, at the date thereof, all matters relating to the purchase price had been settled.

[5, 6] Acceptance of the deed to the property with knowledge of the purpose for which it was made to her and of the agreement between her husband (who was her agent) and C. M. Arnold implied a promise on Mrs. Loomis' part to reconvey. It was a voluntary trust, not, as appellants contend, an involuntary one against which the statute of limitations begins to run immediately upon its creation. It was not merely a constructive trust, but it was one voluntarily assumed and intended by the parties to be a continuing one. Against such a trust, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the trustee repudiates it. Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 581, 26 Pac. 1108; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 359, 62 Pac. 555; Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 722, 127 Pac. 66.

No other alleged errors require consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 22, 1915.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨333—ALIENATION OF AFFECTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against the father of plaintiff's husband for damages for alienation of the husband's affections, where plaintiff's evidence was that defendant had been active in inducing plaintiff to leave the ranch upon which she resided with her husband and in preventing her from rejoining him, and had advised the husband to leave plaintiff and threatened to disinherit him if he should again live with her, questions to defendant as to what his son said in a conversation shortly after the marriage, as to whether his son had ever complained of plaintiff's treatment of him, as to whether he had said that he could not get along with her, and as to whether his son had told him that she drank to such an extent that he could not control her, was improperly excluded, as the declarations sought to be shown were admissible as showing the state of the husband's feelings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1124; Dec. Dig. ⇨333.]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨325—ALIENATION OF AFFECTIONS—RIGHT OF ACTION.

A charge of alienating the affections of a husband from his wife is not sustained, if it appears that, before the defendant acted, the husband entertained no affection for his wife, and that his actions toward her were the result of his own feelings instead of being caused by any persuasion or inducement of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1119; Dec. Dig. ⇨325.]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨325—ALIENATION OF AFFECTIONS—RIGHT OF ACTION.

In an action for alienating affections, it must appear that the defendant has acted from improper motives, and a much stronger case must be made out where the defendant is the parent of a spouse alleged to have been alienated.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨333—ALIENATION OF AFFECTIONS—EVIDENCE—MOTIVE OF DEFENDANT.

In an action against plaintiff's father-in-law for damages for the alienation of her husband's affections, evidence of the husband's declarations to defendant that plaintiff had not treated him well, that he could not get along with her, and that she drank to such an extent that he could not control her, were admissible as bearing upon the motives actuating the defendant in advising or seeking to bring about a separation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1124; Dec. Dig. ⇨333.]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1058—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In such case, error in the exclusion of evidence bearing upon defendant's motive was prejudicial, and was not cured by permitting the husband to testify to some of the matters he had told his father, where the scope of the inquiry was not so broad as that included in the questions to defendant, and where the son's credibility as a witness was also impeached.

6. TRIAL ⇨46—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—OFFER OF PROOF.

The rule that the sustaining of objections to questions will not furnish ground for reversal without a statement indicating to the court the nature of the testimony sought to be elicited has no application, where the questions themselves are so framed as to clearly show the nature and purport of the testimony sought; nor was the defendant called upon to explain the purpose for which the testimony was offered, when it was admissible generally on the main issues of the case.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Dolly Crife against Samuel Crife. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Carpenter & Gibbons, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant. Lamy & Putnam, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendant is the father of plaintiff's husband, and is sued for the recovery of damages on account of the alleged alienation of the husband's affections. The cause was tried without a jury, and the court awarded the plaintiff a judgment in the sum of $1,500. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The findings on the main issues are attacked as unsupported by the evidence, but we are satisfied, from an examination of the record, that there was sufficient evidence to justify the findings complained of.

[1, 2] The only remaining point made by the appellant is that the court erred in sustaining objections to various questions put to the defendant while he was testifying as a witness in his own behalf. The plaintiff had introduced testimony tending to show that the defendant had been active in inducing the plaintiff to leave the ranch upon which she resided with her husband, and that when she attempted to return, the defendant took steps to prevent her from rejoining her husband. There was further testimony tending to show that the defendant had advised his son to leave the plaintiff and had threatened to disinherit him if he should again live with her.

In this state of the case the defendant sought to prove that during the marriage and before the separation of the plaintiff and her husband, and before the defendant had sought to bring about such separation, the husband had made certain declarations and statements to the defendant. The nature of these declarations is clearly indicated by the questions asked, some of which were as follows:

"What did he [the son] say in that conversation [a conversation which took place shortly after the marriage]?" "After the marriage and before Dolly [the plaintiff] and Henry [the husband] moved to Huasna, did Henry ever complain to you of Dolly's treatment of him?" "After the marriage between your son and Dolly, and before the 8th day of August, 1911, did Henry ever tell you that he could not get along with Dolly?" "After the marriage of your son and daughter, and before Dolly left the ranch at Huasna in August, 1911, did your son ever tell you that Dolly drank to such an extent that he could not control her, or did he ever tell you during that time that she abused him so bad that he could not live with her?"

These questions were objected to on the ground that they were irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, self-serving and hearsay, and the court sustained the objections, on the theory, as it said, "that self-serving declarations are not admissible as such." The rulings, which were not based on any merely formal ground, were erroneous. In an action for alienating the affections of a husband or wife, the state of the feelings of such husband or wife is material. A charge of alienating the affections of a husband from his wife is not sustained if it appears that, before the defendant acted at all, the husband entertained no affection for his wife, and that his actions toward her were the result of his own sentiments, instead of being caused by any persuasion or inducement of the defendant. In this case, therefore, the relations between the plaintiff and her husband, and the nature of his feelings toward her, were a proper subject of inquiry. It is a general rule of evidence that, where the state of a person's affections or feelings is material, the declarations of such person as to his or her own state of affections are admissible. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1730. This rule has been applied in many cases similar to the one before us. A few of these may be cited: Gilchrist v. Bale, 8 Watts. 335, 34 Am. Dec. 469; Glass v. Bennett, 89 Tenn. 478, 14 S. W. 1085; Price v. Price, 91 Iowa, 693, 60 N. W. 202, 29 L. R. A. 150, 51 Am. St. Rep. 360; Perry v. Lovejoy, 49 Mich. 529, 14 N. W. 485. See, also, note to Fratini v. Caslini, 44 Am. St. Rep. 849.

[3] It is also well settled that, in an action for alienating a wife's affections and enticing her away, a material point of inquiry is the intent with which the defendant has acted. It must appear that the defendant has acted from improper motives. The decisions require a much stronger case to be made out where the defendant is a parent of the spouse alleged to have been enticed. Hutcheson v. Peck, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 196; Bennett v. Smith, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 439; Glass v. Bennett, supra.

[4] The evidence here offered not only tended to show the state of the husband's feelings toward the plaintiff, but it also had a legitimate bearing upon the motives actuating the defendant in advising or seeking to bring about a separation. It was a part of the information upon which he acted, and he was entitled to have it considered by the court in the determination of the question whether he was acting maliciously or in good faith and for the legitimate protection of his son.

[5] It was virtually conceded on the argument that the testimony should have been admitted. It was argued, however, that its exclusion was harmless because the son was permitted to testify to some of the matters that he had told his father. This did not cure the error. The scope of the inquiry permitted in questioning the son did not cover as broad a field as that included in the questions above quoted. Furthermore, the son's credibility as a witness was impeached, and it is quite evident from the record that the judge himself viewed his testimony with suspicion. Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt of the prejudicial effect of the refusal to allow the defendant's own testimony regarding the declarations made to him by his son.

[6] The additional point is made that the sustaining of an objection to questions like those under discussion will not furnish ground for reversal, in the absence of a statement indicating to the court the nature of the testimony sought to be elicited. But the rule thus invoked can have no application here, since the questions themselves were so framed as to show clearly the nature and purport of the declarations sought to be proved. Nor was the defendant called upon to explain the purpose for which the testimony was offered. Such explanation may be necessary where testimony is admissible for a limited purpose only. But here the declarations were admissible generally, and had a direct bearing on one of the main issues in the case. We think the appellant was entitled to have this evidence heard and considered by the court.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Proceedings by Charles Hicks against Elizabeth J. Loyd and others to establish heirship of George E. Loyd, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hammack & Hammack, of Los Angeles, for appellants. T. W. Duckworth, of San Bernardino, and Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. George E. Loyd died, leaving a will which contained no mention of Charles Hicks. The will was duly admitted to probate, and at the proper time Hicks instituted a proceeding to determine heirship, claiming to be entitled to succeed to a portion of the estate as the illegitimate acknowledged son of the decedent. The findings and decree were in favor of his claim, and the beneficiaries named in the will appeal from the decree and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The court found that the plaintiff, Charles Hicks, is the illegitimate son of George E. Loyd and one Mary Hicks, and was born to them out of wedlock on March 4, 1861, in the state of Iowa. It further found that on June 22, 1861, at Centerville, in the state of Iowa, said George E. Loyd—

"in a writing signed by him in the presence of one Archibald Hicks, a competent witness, acknowledged himself to be the father of the said Charles Hicks, plaintiff; that said writing, so signed as aforesaid, was and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Centerville, Iowa, June 22nd, '61.

"This is to certify that Geo. Loyd as father of Chas. Hicks agrees to pay Mary Hicks the sum of five hundred dollars, for the support of Chas. Hicks, the amount to be paid on or before August 22nd, '61. Geo. E. Loyd."

The statement on motion for new trial shows that there was a conflict in the evidence on the issues in controversy, and the findings are therefore beyond review here. The appellants assign no errors of any consequence on rulings of the court in admitting or excluding evidence. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is without merit.

The real question is whether the findings support the conclusion that Hicks is entitled to succeed to a part of the estate as heir of Loyd, and this question is properly raised on the appeal from the judgment.

[1] Section 1387 of the Civil Code provides that:

"Every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child. * * *

If this is the law governing the rights of the parties, the findings quoted fully establish plaintiff's status as heir. The construction of section 1387 has been settled by Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915, 19 L. R. A. 40. It was there decided that the section is to be liberally construed; that it does not require an acknowledgment in any precise or set form of words; that the writing need not declare that the child therein acknowledged is illegitimate; and that it need not be attested or signed by the "competent witness" in whose presence it is executed. Every fact necessary to make a case under the section as thus construed was found by the court below.

[2] The appellants contend, however, that plaintiff's rights must be defined by the statutes of 1850 (St. 1850, p. 220), in force when the paper of acknowledgment was signed. The statute is very similar in terms to the foregoing provision of section 1387, but it had been held, in two cases decided prior to the enactment of the Codes, and of the rules of construction therein contained (Civ. Code, § 4), that such statute, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed. Estate of Sandford, 4 Cal. 12; Pina

v. Peck, 31 Cal. 359. Since the writing here involved was executed in 1861, the appellants seek to refer plaintiff's claim to the statute then in force, read in accordance with the construction given to it by the courts.

Whether plaintiff's position could be maintained under the statute of 1850, as interpreted in the Estate of Sandford and Pina v. Peck, need not be here decided, for we are satisfied that section 1387, rather than the statute of 1850, is the measure of plaintiff's rights. Section 1387 appears in the chapter of the Civil Code dealing with succession. It declares that certain persons are heirs of certain others. It is simply a statute of succession or inheritance. And so this court has decided. Estate of Magee, 63 Cal. 417; Blythe v. Ayres, supra. But since no right vests in a presumptive heir until the death of the ancestor (Civ. Code, §§ 1384, 1385), it is thoroughly settled that the persons entitled to succeed must be ascertained according to the law in force at the date of the ancestor's death. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116; Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 609, 64 Pac. 995. The writing of 1861 vested no right in the plaintiff when it was executed. If the statute had been repealed before Loyd's death, and no similar law had taken its place, the plaintiff could not have claimed as an heir. He must found his claim on the law in force when rights of heirship attached, and that law is section 1387 of the Civil Code. The contrary view was suggested in the opinion in the Jessup Case, 81 Cal. 419, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 6 L. R. A. 594, but the expression was plainly obiter; the case involving, not a right of heirship under section 1387, but the creation of the relation of parent and child by virtue of an alleged adoption under section 230 of the Civil Code.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

3. NEW TRIAL 108—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence showing the contents of a will destroyed by decedent, testimony at the trial held so to discredit such evidence as to render improbable that it would change result upon second trial.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 979—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Appeal by Collins P. Emerson from an order of the court denying his motion for new trial in proceedings to admit to probate a will of Thomas B. Emerson, deceased. Order affirmed.

Fred N. Arnoldy and Irwin, White & Rosecrans, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hanson, Hackler & Heath, James W. Miller, and John E. Carson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial, made upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The proceeding was an application under section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure, by Collins P. Emerson, a brother of the decedent, to admit to probate a will which, it is alleged, was destroyed after the death of the decedent. The court made findings that the provisions of the alleged will were not proven by two credible witnesses; that the proposed document was not the will of the decedent; that there were no witnesses to the document; and that it was not written, signed, or dated by the decedent himself.

[1, 2] The decision of the appeal is controlled by the well-established rules that the courts look with distrust and disfavor upon motions for new trials based on the ground of newly discovered evidence; that such motions should not be granted by trial courts unless the new evidence is such as to make it reasonably probable that it would change the result upon another trial; that the moving party must state in his affidavits facts which show that he exercised reasonable diligence from the beginning in endeavoring to discover the evidence before the first trial; that the decision of these questions rests in the sound discretion of the trial court; and that its decision will not be reversed on appeal unless an abuse of that discretion clearly appears.

[3, 4] Tested by these rules, we are satisfied that the order of the court below cannot be disturbed. The petitioner testified that he saw the alleged will before its destruction and copied it; that it was destroyed in his presence by the widow; and that it was olographic in character. The widow testified that the document was not signed by the decedent, and that it was partly printed. The testimony of each of them was contradictory and unsatisfactory in itself. The new evidence consisted of the testimony of Mrs. Manz, a niece of the decedent, who deposed that he showed it to her shortly before his death while he was visiting her in Illinois, and that she read it. She performed a remarkable feat of memory in stating the contents of the will, nearly three years afterwards, giving it in the identical words of the copy which the petitioner testified he had made. She wrote a letter to the petitioner about three months after the death of Emerson, saying that on his visit to Illinois Emerson had said to her that he had his matters fixed before he left California, and asking petitioner if he "had found anything," but saying nothing of having seen or read a will. The petitioner, although he received this letter nine months before the trial, made no inquiry of Mrs. Manz about the matter at any time. He wrote two letters to the widow regarding the alleged will before he filed the petition for probate, in which he referred to the contents of the will in a manner showing that he was relying on his memory entirely, and indicating very clearly that he did not copy it, as he testified he had, and that he had no copy. In these letters he gave the contents of the will, in part, and professedly from memory. But his version there given was materially different from the proffered copy which he now claims he then had in his possession. These circumstances, and others not mentioned here, tend to discredit the alleged newly discovered evidence, and also the evidence given at the trial relating to the contents of the proposed will. It must also be remembered that the judge of the court below had seen the witnesses, and could best determine their relative credibility. We cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in denying the motion.

The order is affirmed.

BRANCH RY. CO. et al.
(L. A. 3493.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1173—REVIEW—DETERMINATION.

Two plaintiffs sued to quiet title, claiming by prescription based upon adverse possession. The evidence failed to show that continuous adverse possession by one of them necessary to ripen into title. Held that, as the record did not disclose the respective interests of the parties, judgment for plaintiffs must be reversed as to both.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Hugh Warring and another against the Southern Pacific Branch Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Frank Thunen and W. M. Singer, both of San Francisco (William Singer, Jr., of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Kidder & Warring, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs have sued to quiet their title, pleading the narrow ground that they are the owners under title by prescription, based upon an adverse possession for the required length of time. The evidence in the record fails to show, as to Hugh Warring, that continuous adverse possession without interruption which the law requires to constitute title by prescription. For this reason it is necessary to reverse the judgment. The record does not show the respective interests claimed or possessed by the two plaintiffs, and, because of that fact we cannot make a decision which will limit the judgment to the interest of M. D. Warring alone, and it is necessary to reverse the entire judgment. The plaintiffs upon the going down of the remittitur should have leave to amend their pleadings. The claims are apparently not the same as they appear to be by the complaint, and the allegations should be made to correspond to the facts as they claim them to be.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the plaintiffs have leave to amend their pleadings as they may be advised.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Pearl M. Fawcett against Frances Fawcett, revived after her death against Wallace Gregg, her executor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. P. Adams, of Los Angeles, and Newman Jones, of Riverside, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action by plaintiff brought against Frances Fawcett, his mother, to have himself declared the owner of certain real estate, the legal title to which was in the name of the mother. During the trial Frances Fawcett died, and the action was continued in the name of the executor. In addition to an answer denying the material allegations of the complaint, defendant filed a cross-complaint, the purpose of which was to secure from plaintiff an accounting for the proceeds derived by him from the use of said real estate while in possession thereof. On the issues joined the court found in favor of defendant, and, upon an accounting had, gave judgment against plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

In substance, the complaint alleges: That in 1895, in the state of Iowa, plaintiff and his father, Mahlon Fawcett, were copartners engaged in the hardware business under the firm name and style of Fawcett & Son. That during said year they exchanged said hardware business for a farm, known as the Doxsee farm, title to which was taken in the name of the father. That in 1905 the latter came to California, where he made a contract for the purchase of the real estate herein involved, known as the Whittier ranch or lemon grove. That in making the purchase thereof he agreed to pay $5,000 in cash, and gave his note for $6,000, secured by a mortgage upon the real estate. Pursuant to the contract, he made a payment of $300, and returned to Iowa and borrowed the sum of $5,000 upon the Doxsee farm with which to make the first payment upon the purchase price of said lemon grove. He proposed to plaintiff, who was then living in Iowa, that plaintiff with his family remove to California and take care of the lemon grove, promising plaintiff that if he would do so and take the entire management and control thereof, and out of the proceeds and profits of the same pay off the deferred payment thereon, and pay the mortgage on the Doxsee farm, that he, Mahlon Fawcett, was willing to give said lemon grove to plaintiff as his share of the property which they through their joint efforts had acquired, and agreed to convey the same to plaintiff when fully paid for; to all of which plaintiff agreed. Upon the making of the first payment due upon the lemon grove, the owner thereof executed a deed to Mahlon Fawcett, who executed his notes and mortgage thereon to secure the deferred payments of $6,000. That plaintiff took possession of said lemon grove, and with his family resided thereon, having entire charge and management of the same, and from the proceeds thereof paid off the balance of the purchase price, and also the mortgage upon said Doxsee farm. That about one year prior to the death of Mahlon Fawcett plaintiff suggested to his father that, in order to avoid probate proceedings and keep the property standing in the name of Mahlon Fawcett, the latter make deeds to the same to plaintiff's mother, and thereupon Mahlon Fawcett made deeds to all of the property standing in his name to Frances Fawcett, and placed them in a box used in common by Mahlon Fawcett and plaintiff, requesting that upon his death plaintiff have the deeds recorded. That in the month of December, 1908, Mahlon Fawcett who was about to undergo a surgical operation, stated to plaintiff in the presence of defendant that he wished to arrange with plaintiff about their property interest and make provision for plaintiff's mother during her life, and proposed to plaintiff that his mother should during her life hold title to the lemon grove and keep possession and control of the same, and upon her death he should come into full ownership thereof, pursuant to the agreement theretofore made between plaintiff and his father, and plaintiff should, out of the proceeds of the properties and income thereof, pay off incumbrances upon the property, and the income from the lemon grove should be his, and the income from the Doxsee farm should belong to his two sisters, and that the defendant should make a deed of the lemon grove to plaintiff and place it in escrow to be delivered to plaintiff upon her death. That defendant at all times had full knowledge of the said understanding, arrangement and agreement between plaintiff and Mahlon Fawcett that plaintiff should have the said Whittier ranch as his (plaintiff's) share of the property which plaintiff and said Mahlon Fawcett had acquired through their joint efforts. That upon Mahlon Fawcett's death the deeds so executed by him conveying the property to defendant were filed for record, and plaintiff thereafter requested defendant to execute a deed conveying the lemon grove to him in accordance with the agreement so made with his father, to which his mother was a party, which request was by defendant refused.

The alleged errors of which appellant complains are: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding made by the court to the effect that Mahlon Fawcett was the owner of a hardware business conducted in the name of Fawcett & Son, and that plaintiff had no interest therein; second, it is claimed the evidence establishes an understanding between plaintiff and his father that the lemon grove should be the plaintiff's; third that the court erred in giving judgment against plaintiff upon the accounting had.

[1-3] No good purpose could be subserved in making particular reference to the voluminous evidence, most of which was of a circumstantial nature. The partnership claimed to have been entered into between plaintiff and his father in 1890, at which time the latter, in exchange for a farm owned by him, purchased a hardware business, rests in an alleged parol agreement, proof of which depends upon inferences drawn largely, if not wholly, from the circumstantial evidence introduced. While it may be conceded that such evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie case as to the existence of such alleged partnership, other evidence and circumstances are fully as cogent in proving its nonexistence. That it is, as claimed by appellant's counsel, incredible that a man with a family of eight or nine children should devote his time during a period of 20 years to the care and management of another's property is answered by the fact shown that during all of said period plaintiff and family had received their support from the proceeds of this ranch and other lands owned by the father, which, in addition to, presumably, sharing in the property as an heir, might well compensate him for his labor. At all events the burden rested upon him to establish the fact that a partnership existed. That the evidence presents a substantial conflict is practically conceded by counsel, who suggest that in weighing the testimony the judgment of the trial court was influenced against plaintiff by the fact of defendant's death occurring during the course of the trial. Be it so, since such conflict exists, no question of law is presented for review by this court.

[4] The second contention, namely, that there was an understanding between plaintiff, his father, and defendant that he should have the property, possesses even less merit. Plaintiff testified to facts which, if true, and aside from any question of law involved, might be deemed sufficient to establish such understanding. But in this he is flatly contradicted by the testimony of his mother, who states the deed conveying the property was delivered to her unconditionally, and in the absence of any suggestion or understanding that plaintiff should have the same. Moreover, there was evidence which tended to prove that the alleged understanding had with the father was subsequent to the delivery of the deed, at which time title to the property immediately vested in Mrs. Fawcett; hence it follows that Mahlon Fawcett had no interest in the ranch which he could make the subject of trust or such understanding, and the mother's assent thereto, if made, being oral and after acquiring the title, is nonenforceable.

Objection to the judgment given upon the accounting had seems to be based solely upon the alleged errors hereinbefore discussed. Since the rulings of the court in making the findings attacked are sustained, it follows that the court did not err in rendering judgment upon the accounting.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte WORSHAM. (Cr. 385.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — 10 — ORDINANCES — VALIDITY.

An ordinance of a city, which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors within the city and declares that every person who at any time visits or is present at any place where liquors are sold, kept for sale, offered for sale, furnished, or distributed shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, makes it criminal for one to visit such a place, no matter how innocently or how lawful his purpose, and is invalid because beyond the power of the city to enact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-12; Dec. Dig. § 10.]

Habeas corpus by Charles Worsham for his discharge from custody under a commitment on conviction for violation of a city ordinance. Petitioner discharged.

Russell Graham, of Whittier, for petitioner. C. R. Holton, of Whittier, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner is in custody of the city marshal of the city of Whittier and is held by virtue of a commitment, on sentence of fine, issued out of the recorder's court of said city. It appears that petitioner was convicted before the recorder of the crime of misdemeanor committed in the city of Whittier. The complaint charged that the defendant did willfully and unlawfully visit a place within the city of Whittier where intoxicating drinks were delivered, divided, and distributed. Ordinance No. 157 of said city is an ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the city, and, among other things, it is therein provided that:

"Every person who at any time visits or is present at any place within the city of Whittier where spirituous, vinous, malt or mixed liquors, or any alcoholic or intoxicating drinks are sold, kept for sale, offered for sale, furnished, distributed, divided, delivered or given away in violation of this ordinance, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

This language is very broad and includes every possible case of visiting such a place as that described. It is identical in principle with an ordinance of the city of Modesto which was under consideration in the case of Ah Jow, in the United States Circuit Court for the District of California, reported in 29 Fed. 181. Referring to words which made any person, who visited such room or place as the one described in that case, guilty of a misdemeanor, the court said:

"Under this section it would not be lawful for any person, whether Caucasian citizen, or other inhabitant, to enter such a place or drug store for many of the ordinary and proper purposes of life, as to purchase other goods, to collect bills, or transact any legitimate business. To lawfully prohibit, under penalties, the citizens or inhabitants from entering such a place, innocently, not knowing its character, or for any lawful purpose, and without reference to its object, is, in my judgment, entirely beyond the power of the city of Modesto. It is to prohibit an act which is innocent in itself, and lawful under the general laws of the land, and therefore inconsistent with the laws of the land."

We think that the foregoing decision is a correct statement of the law as applicable in the present case. In so ruling we recognize and approve of the decisions in such cases as Ex parte Meyers, 7 Cal. App. 528, 94 Pac. 870, and People v. Conness, 150 Cal. 114, 88 Pac. 821, cited on behalf of respondent. In the first of these two cases the petitioner was held under a charge that he permitted a minor to remain in and visit a pool room, contrary to the provisions of an ordinance which prohibited the proprietor of such place to permit a minor to remain therein. In People v. Conness the conviction was under a statute forbidding a man to allow or permit his wife to remain in a house of prostitution. The provisions of the ordinance of the city of Whittier go beyond the limits of the restrictions mentioned in those cases. Being thus general in their terms and intentionally made applicable to all persons and inclusive of all purposes, the attempted prohibition is beyond the power of the city. It will be a very easy matter to amend the ordinance so that it will not violate any law and will still be effective as a prohibition ordinance.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

2. TRIAL—392—ACTION FOR PRICE—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a note for the price of a stallion sold by plaintiffs to defendants, in which the defense was that such stallion had been warranted to be up to a described standard for breeding purposes, or the sellers would take him back and surrender the note, a finding "that no misrepresentations were made or fraud practiced by plaintiffs in the sale of said stallion to defendants; that plaintiffs performed each and every part of their contract of sale and gave full consideration for said note"—was insufficient to sustain judgment for plaintiffs, since it failed to decide the facts with respect to the alleged agreement, while a trial court must specifically find on all the material issues, independently of request by either party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 916-917; Dec. Dig. 392.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Ray C. Griswold and another against Charles A. Winters and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for new trial. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellants. Farr & Myers, of Imperial, and McPherrin & Nichols, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This appeal is by the defendants from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action is brought upon a note for $1,000 executed by appellants to respondents. Concurrently with the delivery of this note and another of like amount, and in consideration of said notes, the respondents sold and delivered to appellants a stallion at an agreed price of $2,000, payable as specified in the notes. The answer alleges that the respondents represented that the stallion was "an 80 per cent. foal-getter," and promised that if defendants would buy the horse and give their promissory notes to plaintiffs for the purchase price thereof, in the event that said horse did not prove to be wholly sound, free from blemishes, and an 80 per cent. foal-getter plaintiffs would take back the horse and surrender the notes. The answer contains allegations further showing that the purchase was made in reliance upon these representations and promises; that a fair test was made during the season following the sale; that the horse was an almost entire failure and was wholly valueless for breeding purposes; that respondents knew the representations to be false when made; that on ascertaining the facts aforesaid appellants have promptly offered to return the horse to respondents, and have demanded surrender of the notes, all of which offer and demand have been refused.

[1,2] Although evidence was received in respect to these matters of defense, the court has failed to decide the issues raised thereby, except as such decision may be found in the finding:

"That no misrepresentations were made or fraud practiced by plaintiffs in the sale of said stallion to defendants; that plaintiffs performed each and every part of their contract of sale and gave full consideration for said note."

This is not sufficient, and the error is distinctly relied upon in the specifications in the statement on motion for a new trial, which specifications presumably contain the grounds on which the motion was made (Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 598, 140 Pac. 283), although, as too often occurs, the grounds of the motion are not directly shown by the record. The finding above quoted may perhaps be sufficient as a decision that the representations alleged to have been made concerning the horse were not made, or that if made, they were in good faith and without any fraudulent practice. But the court wholly fails to decide the facts with respect to the defense that respondents had promised that if the horse did not come up to the described standard for breeding purposes, they would take him back and surrender the notes; that the horse was an almost total failure for those purposes; that on discovering the fact of such failure appellants had offered to return the horse in as good condition as that in which he was received. Appellants were entitled to findings which would decide these issues of fact which were a substantial part of their defense. Cargnani v. Cargnani, 16 Cal. App. 96, 116 Pac. 306.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the Creditors' Adjustment Company against Peter Rossi. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for appellant. Peter A. Breen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for services rendered by J. B. Albert, who assigned his claim to the Benjamin S. Brown Agency, who, in turn assigned the claim to the plaintiff. The action is based upon a written agreement.

The defendant Rossi had an option of a ground lease of certain real property in San Francisco, and was seeking a tenant who would take a lease of a building to be erected by him. His efforts in this behalf had progressed so far that he had entered into an agreement for a lease of the property with the Harry J. Moore Furniture Company, and on account thereof had received a deposit of $2,000, but subsequently, owing to a dispute between them concerning the installation of a vault and steam-heating apparatus, the agreement for the lease was canceled by mutual consent, and the deposit was returned to the furniture company. Shortly after that the defendant secured the services of J. B. Albert, who had assisted him in negotiating the agreement for a lease just mentioned, to approach the furniture company and reopen negotiations for a lease. This was done, with the result that a second agreement for a lease was made with the furniture company, and the defendant received a deposit of $2,000. For this service the defendant agreed to pay J. B. Albert $500; and, two days after the agreement for the lease was executed, the defendant gave Albert the instrument which is the basis of this action, and according to the terms of which he promised to pay to Albert $500 when the lease should be executed. Subsequently the lease was executed by an assignee of the defendant.

Plaintiff recovered judgment for the amount sued for, with interest and costs, from which judgment the defendant has appealed.

[1] Defendant's main contention on the facts is that Albert was to be paid the $500 only if he succeeded in getting the furniture company to sign a lease or an agreement for a lease which would not require the defendant to install a vault and steam-heating apparatus. If this be true, why did not the defendant see to it that the provision concerning this matter was incorporated in the contract, and why did he give to Albert the written agreement to pay the $500 two days after the agreement for a lease was executed, which agreement called for the installation of the vault and heating apparatus? In any event, the testimony introduced by plaintiff was to the effect that this condition was no part of the agreement for commissions. The findings are abundantly supported by the evidence.

[2, 3] As before stated, J. B. Albert assigned his claim to the Benjamin S. Brown Agency, which in turn assigned it to the plaintiff. At the trial it developed that the first assignee was a copartnership doing business under a fictitious name, and that it had failed to file and publish the certificate required by the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. As the statute stands today, and as it has stood since the amendment to those sections of 1911, neither a copartnership doing business under a fictitious name nor its assignee may maintain an action in any court of this state; but this action was commenced before the amendment, and is governed by the law as it stood at that time, which permitted assignees of such partnerships to maintain suits. Gray v. Wells, 118 Cal. 11, 50 Pac. 23. And there is no merit in the defendant's suggestion that, while plaintiff was within its rights in bringing the action, the action cannot now be sustained because the statute employs the word "maintain," reading, "No person doing business under a fictitious name, * * * his assignee, * * * shall maintain an action," etc. The word "maintain," as here used, means to commence, institute, begin, or bring. 25 Cyc. 1664.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 448—EVIDENCE—CONCLUSION OF WITNESS.

Where accused charged with selling intoxicating liquor in no-license territory sought to show that he served the liquor to his guests, an answer to a question asked a witness of accused as to what had been his observation as to the general public going into the place where the liquor was served unless invited, "I have had friends with me, but we could not have gone down below unless we were asked to," was properly excluded as a conclusion of the witness.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 235—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where accused, charged with selling intoxicating liquor, sought to show that he served the liquor to his guests, evidence as to persons not going to the place where the liquor was received unless invited by accused was properly excluded, in the absence of any reference as to the time when persons did not enter the place unless invited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Sue Chung Kee was convicted of selling and dispensing alcoholic liquors in no-license territory, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Dixon L. Phillips and Jno. F. Pryor, both of Hanford, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with selling and dispensing alcoholic liquors in no-license territory contrary to the provisions of what is known as the Wylie Act. Stats. 1911, p. 599. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Counsel for appellant insists that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The evidence fairly tended to prove that defendant was a Chinese merchant in the town of Hanford. The building in which he conducted his business consisted of two stories and a basement, the latter being divided into several rooms which were used, among other purposes, for storage of merchandise and as a place for the cooking and serving of food to others than the family of defendant. His family, consisting of his wife and four children, lived and made their home in the second floor of the building, while the first floor was used as a storeroom in which the mercantile business was conducted. The alleged offense was committed on the evening of December 2, 1913, at which time one man alone, and later two together, went to defendant's place and without, so far as shown, any invitation so to do, went down into the basement, where they found defendant, and expressed themselves as being "awfully dry" and desirous of obtaining a drink, in response to which defendant gave to each of them a bottle of beer, and to one a second bottle. While they were sitting at a table engaged in drinking the beer from the bottles, the city marshal appeared and arrested defendant. It appears that the day before defendant had purchased and had delivered at his place a quantity of beer, and while he admits serving to these men in the basement under his storeroom, over which his family resided, it is nevertheless insisted that the serving thereof was at his own home to these men as his guests as an act of hospitality, where no money or thing of value was received in return therefor, and that the place where served was not a place of public resort, and hence the act constituted no offense, as provided in the first subdivision of section 16 of the act aforesaid. The court embodied this provision of the law in an instruction given to the jury, and it is apparent from the verdict rendered that they were not satisfied the evidence established the claim made by defendant. Considering all the evidence, both direct and circumstantial, we are of the opinion the jury were justified in reaching a conclusion inconsistent with the theory urged by appellant that these three men found in the basement drinking beer were so doing at his home as his guests. We entertain no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict.

[2] At the close of the evidence, at the request of defendant, the jury, in charge of the city marshal and another person instructed to point out the different rooms, tables, entries, stairways, etc., visited defendant's place for the purpose of viewing the same. During the argument appellant objected to certain portions thereof made by the district attorney, and assigned the same as error. These portions were references made by the district attorney to what the jurors saw on their visit to defendant's place, among other things, saying:

"You saw 17 men eating in that restaurant. Who were they? It is for you as jurors to say whether or not that is a public place. You saw, if you counted them, 17 men eating at defendant's tables and every table was filled to its fullest capacity. * * * There was not a laboring man in that bunch, not one. Those were the hangers-on around Chinatown."

And again:

"Chung Kee boasts of being the richest Chinaman in this part of the country; everybody knows that."

The contention of defendant is that, while counsel for appellant at the time assigned the action of the district attorney as error, he meant and intended it as misconduct. Accepting it as a sufficient assignment, and conceding that the district attorney in making his argument went outside of the record, nevertheless it is impossible to perceive how the substantial rights of defendant could have been prejudiced by the argument. Presumably he referred to what the jurors had seen on their visit, and if there was no one eating at the tables, as stated by him, or a less number than 17, the statement so made would have been idle in convincing the jury that the statements so made rather than what they say were true.

[3, 4] Error is predicated upon rulings of the court in sustaining objections of the district attorney to evidence offered. As an instance of such rulings, a witness on behalf of defendant was asked:

"What has been your observation with reference to the general public (that is, in going into this basement unless invited to do so)? A. I have had friends with me, but we could not have gone down below unless we were asked to."

The court, on motion of the district attorney, struck out this answer. There was no error in this ruling. It was not only a conclusion of the witness, but no reference was made to the time when the witness and his friends felt that it would be improper for them to enter the basement unless invited to do so.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 16, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 934 — FINDINGS — PRESUMPTION.

Where written findings are waived, the appellate court must assume such findings as will support the judgment.

2. ASSIGNMENTS $\S$ 19 — EXECUTORY CONTRACT—PERSONAL SERVICES.

Certain contracts, involving the performance of services which call for a peculiar personal capacity on the part of the promisor cannot be assigned by him without the consent of the person entitled to performance so as to transfer the obligation of such person to the assignee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 28-31; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 19.]

3. ASSIGNMENTS ⚡19 — EXECUTORY CONTRACT—PAINTING OF BUILDING.

An executory contract to paint and finish a building did not imply such special reliance upon the personal skill and responsibility of the contractor as to render it unassignable to another contractor without the owner's consent; the satisfactory performance of the work, not the fact of having it done by the contractor, being the consideration for the owner's obligation to pay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 23-31; Dec. Dig. ⚡19.]

4. ASSIGNMENTS ⚡109 — EXECUTORY CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE BY ASSIGNEE.

Although an assignment of an executory contract to paint and finish a building did not in specific terms provide that the assignee should perform, where, on receiving the assignment, he informed the owner that a person selected by him was going to run the job from that time, thus treating the assignment as one obligating him to responsibility for the work, although he thereafter left the job uncompleted so that it could not be finished within the contract price, such assignee was bound by his interpretation of the assignment that it bound him to performance, and was estopped to deny the fact.

5. ASSIGNMENTS ⚡56 — EXECUTORY CONTRACT — FAILURE TO PROVIDE FOR PERFORMANCE — STATUTE.

Held, that the assignment, under the circumstances, was not invalid under Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by executing an oral agreement, but not otherwise.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by A. L. Gribling against E. R. Bohan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. L. Whitham, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sheldon Borden and Richard J. Culver, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On September 7, 1912, an agreement in writing was made between respondent, A. L. Gribling, and L. Wetherall, whereby Wetherall was to do certain painting and finishing in a building then under construction by Gribling as general contractor. Before any work was done under this contract of September 7th, Wetherall executed to appellant, Bohan, a writing in which he said that for a valuable consideration "I hereby assign to Mr. Bohan" the said contract, and "I direct Mr. Gribling to pay all moneys to Mr. Bohan." Thereafter work was done in part performance of the painting contract. This work was done by S. Thomas and men under his supervision, engaged therefore by appellant and payments on account were made by respondent to appellant. On December 21, 1912, appellant informed respondent that he would furnish nothing more on the job, and that respondent could take any action or employ any men that he saw fit to employ to finish the work. The work having been abandoned by appellant, respondent caused it to be completed at a reasonable cost, which was in excess of the contract price. The appeal is taken by defendant from a judgment against him for the amount of this excess.

[1] Appellant contends that the contract was assigned by him to Thomas; that respondent accepted Thomas as the party to perform the contract; and that the job was abandoned by Thomas. Written findings having been waived, we must assume the facts against this contention; since there is evidence tending to support implied findings in favor of respondent as to these facts. The propositions of law urged by appellant's counsel are that the contract between Gribling and Wetherall is personal, and could not be assigned; that the acceptance of the assignment by respondent and by appellant is not mutual, because they did not agree upon the same thing in the same sense; that the acceptance is invalid because it is an alteration not in writing relating to a written contract; and that the assignment does not provide for performance of the contract by appellant.

[2-5] There are contracts for personal service or other personal performance which cannot be assigned so as to transfer the concurrent obligation without the consent of the person entitled to such performance. This is illustrated by the contract of an artist to paint a portrait, or a sale of land under agreement by the purchaser to execute his own promissory note for a part of the purchase price. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241, 247; Montgomery v. De Picot, 153 Cal. 509, 96 Pac. 305, 126 Am. St. Rep. 84. But the contract under consideration here is not one where there was any special reliance upon the personal skill and responsibility of Wetherall, the contractor, and respondent seems to have been satisfied to have the work done by another. If this contract had been fully performed by the assignee, and payment refused, he could have recovered the contract price the same as if the work had been done by his assignor. The satisfactory performance of the work, not the fact of having it done by Wetherall, was the consideration for respondent's obligation to pay therefor. Taylor v. Palmer, supra; La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 281, 285, 24 Pac. 42, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179. It is true that the assignment does not in specific terms provide for the performance of the contract by appellant. But on receiving the assignment he informed respondent that Thomas, a person selected by him, was going to run the job. Appellant from that time treated the assignment as one obligating him to do or to be responsible for the doing of the work, and by his own act placed and left the job in condition where it could not be completed at a cost within the contract price. Having done a part of the work, and having received practically the entire contract price upon the understanding that he was responsible for the job, appellant is bound by his own interpretation of the contract, and this, upon the principle of estoppel, he should not be permitted to refute upon finding the contract unprofitable. The assignment, under these circumstances, is not rendered invalid under the terms of section 1698, Civil Code, providing that:

"A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CORY et al. (Cr. 327.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 12, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 10, 1915.)

1. CONSPIRACY ⇨43—INFORMATION—CRIMINAL MEANS—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

An information, under Pen. Code, § 182, making punishable a conspiracy to commit any crime or to cheat or defraud any person by means which are in themselves criminal, or to obtain money or property by false pretenses, which charges that the defendants conspired to defraud the prosecuting witness by representing to her that a lot which they were to convey to her was level, tillable, and free from rocks, charges a criminal means, since those representations were of facts, and not matters of opinion, and were sufficient to have made the defendants guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses, contrary to Pen. Code, § 532.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 79, 80, 84-99; Dec. Dig. ⇨43.]

2. CONSPIRACY ⇨43—INFORMATION—INTENT TO DEFAUD.

An information charging conspiracy to defraud by false pretenses, which alleges that the defendants willfully and corruptly conspired together and agreed to cheat and defraud the prosecuting witness, that the representations made were false to the knowledge of defendants, and that they were made pursuant to the conspiracy, sufficiently charges an intent to defraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 79, 80, 84-99; Dec. Dig. ⇨43.]

3. CONSPIRACY ⇨47—PROSECUTION—PROOF.

The prosecution need not prove all the false pretenses alleged in an information charging a conspiracy to defraud, but proof of any one of them is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 105-107; Dec. Dig. ⇨47.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨422—EVIDENCE—DECLARATION OF CONSPIRATOR.

After a conspiracy has been established by either direct evidence or proof of circumstances from which the jury can infer its existence, declarations of one conspirator are not incompetent against the others because they were made out of the presence of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 984-988; Dec. Dig. ⇨422.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1186—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no conviction shall be reversed for error in the admission of evidence unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the judges are satisfied that the error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, the erroneous admission of statements by a conspirator, made out of the presence of his co-conspirator after the object of the conspiracy has been fully accomplished, does not require a reversal, where a consideration of the evidence shows that there was no miscarriage of justice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3215-3219, 3221, 3230; Dec. Dig. ⇨1186.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨369—EVIDENCE—SIMILAR TRANSACTIONS.

In a prosecution for conspiracy to defraud plaintiff by false representations as to the value of property, evidence of similar transactions between defendants and other persons is competent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-824; Dec. Dig. ⇨369.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨822—INSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Where portions of the charge told the jury that the allegations of the information must be proved to sustain a conviction, and other portions, which might indicate that a conviction could be had on proof of facts not charged in the information, were sufficiently limited to the particular purpose of such proof, there was no error in the charge, since it must be construed as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1990, 1991, 1994, 1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. ⇨822.]

8. CONSPIRACY ⇨43—INFORMATION—COMPLETION OF OBJECT.

An information, charging a conspiracy to defraud by false pretenses, need not allege that the person to be defrauded either had property out of which she might be defrauded, or that property was actually obtained, since the conspiracy is complete when the agreement and some overt act is committed in pursuance thereof, though the crime be not complete.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 79, 80, 84-99; Dec. Dig. ⇨43.]

9. CONSPIRACY ⇨47—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The fact that evidence was circumstantial does not make it insufficient to sustain a charge of conspiracy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 105-107; Dec. Dig. ⇨47.]

10. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨90—JURISDICTION—POLICE COURTS—MISDEMEANORS.

Under St. 1913, p. 469, giving the police courts of the city exclusive jurisdiction over misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, the court does not have exclusive jurisdiction to punish a conspiracy formed within the limits of the city, where the only overt act was committed outside the limits, since the offense was not complete until that act was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 129-136; Dec. Dig. ⇨90.]

11. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨93—JURISDICTION—POLICE COURTS—MISDEMEANORS.

Where a city charter adopted by the freeholders created police courts with jurisdiction only such as was given to justices' courts, which does not include high-grade misdemeanors, under the provision of Const. art. 11, § 8½, authorizing a city by its charter to provide for the constitution and jurisdiction of police courts, St. 1913, p. 469, giving city police courts exclusive jurisdiction over such misdemeanors, does not apply, and jurisdiction over a conspiracy consummated by an overt act in such city can be prosecuted in the circuit court under Const. art. 6, § 5, giving that court jurisdiction over all misdemeanors not otherwise provided for.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Leon Cory and another were convicted of a conspiracy to defraud by means of false pretenses, and they appeal. Affirmed on original hearing and on rehearing.

E. B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Decision was heretofore made herein affirming the judgment, and order denying the motion for a new trial, both of which had been appealed from. Thereafter a rehearing was granted. After argument upon the rehearing and consideration of the various matters urged at that argument, the court is satisfied to readopt the opinion heretofore rendered herein as to its main text, with the addition of some further discussion as to certain of the points urged by appellants as grounds for their claim for a reversal. The opinion referred to is as follows:

"Appeal from a judgment of imprisonment and order denying a motion for a new trial.

"Defendants were charged by an information of the district attorney with the crime of conspiracy as defined in section 182 of the Penal Code. By that section the crime of conspiracy is made to consist of the conspiring together by two or more persons: '1. To commit any crime; * * * 4. To cheat and defraud any person of any property by any means which are in themselves criminal, or to obtain money or property by false pretenses.' The foregoing quotations are of the parts of the section noted which are material to the charge as laid in the information. The allegations contained in the information are quite lengthy and, in brief, set out that the defendants with two other persons conspired and agreed to cheat and defraud one Gladys I. Stewart out of money and property by means of trick, artifice, and device and false and fraudulent representations and pretenses; that said persons agreed together that one of their number, not either of the defendants, should represent to the complainant that Cory and Ford and a corporation called the Mutual Benefit & Loan Society were about to distribute certain parcels of land near Elsinore, in the county of Riverside, for advertising purposes, by chance; that the defendants should further represent that the complainant had been selected as a person to receive one of the lots, and that in consideration of the payment to them of $12.50 they would deliver a free and clear title to the lot; and that it was further to be represented that the land was located within one-half mile from Elsinore Cemetery, and within 1½ miles from Elsinore Lake and within three miles from the town of Elsinore, and that the lot was a slightly lot on level land in a desirable location, well adapted and suitable for building and residence purposes, and located in a tract no part of which was hilly and all of which was level and was tillable and arable land, free from rock, and was valuable; that the representations set forth were made to complainant. An allegation followed that each of the representations as alleged were false and untrue to the knowledge of the defendants at the time they were made. The evidence introduced on behalf of the people shows that the complainant, who was a resident of Pasadena, received a call from a woman at her house; that this woman told her that the society mentioned were distributing lots for advertising purposes, and delivered to her a coupon which she told her would cost her nothing. A few days later a man made his appearance at complainant's house and informed her that she had been fortunate in the drawing and was entitled to a lot in the Elsinore subdivision, which he said she might obtain by paying $12.50, which he represented as the cost of preparing a deed and furnishing an abstract of title. This man made statements as to the alleged level character of the land, and complainant paid him the money and later received a deed and abstract. Upon some investigation being made she learned that the land was not desirable, nor as represented, and immediately called at the office of the defendants Cory and Ford and demanded the return of her money. She first met Ford, and he refused to return the money and insisted that the land was good land and level. When complainant first entered the office both Ford and Cory were present together, but Cory withdrew, and the first statements were made by Ford, in response to her demand, without the presence of Cory. Soon, however, Cory entered the room and appeared to be very angry at the accusations made, and he then insisted and represented that the land was level and was of good character and favorably located. It was claimed on the part of the defendants that a portion of the money paid by complainant was for the purpose of supporting an application made by her to become a member of the society, but the testimony of the complainant was that she made no such application and had no notice of any such contention until she received through the mails, after she had paid the money demanded, a notice that some part of it had been applied on account of her pending application to become a member of defendants' corporation. All of the evidence, direct and by circumstance, tended to show a fraudulent scheme entered into and carried out by the defendants and their agents with the design to secure money unlawfully.

[1] "Appellants contend that the information did not state sufficient facts to constitute a public offense. It is argued that 'there was no attempt to charge or prove that a conspiracy existed to defraud the complaining witness by any means which were in themselves criminal.' It must be said, we think, that the information did contain allegations of pretenses which were actionable and which, if they resulted in the accomplishment of the designs of the persons making them, would have made the perpetrators subject to prosecution for having fraudulently obtained the property of another, as that crime is described in section 532 of the Penal Code. Excluding from consideration many of the alleged false pretenses, the representations that the lot was level and was tillable and free from rock were sufficient upon which to found an action where such representations were deceitfully made. These statements were as to matters of fact of which the complainant had no knowledge, and were not mere expressions of opinion as to which persons might differ.

[2] "That the false representations alleged to have been made with fraudulent intent appears when all of the charging clauses of the information are read together. It is first alleged that the defendants 'unlawfully and corruptly conspired together and agreed to cheat and defraud' the complainant; it is further alleged that the representations made were false to the knowledge of the defendants, and that they were made pursuant to the agreement of conspiracy. The intent to defraud thus appears to be plainly charged.

[3] "The prosecution was not required to prove all of the false pretenses alleged. Proof of any one of the material matters charged, other essential facts being established, would support a conviction. People v. Smith, 3 Cal. App. 62, 84 Pac. 449; People v. Ward, 5 Cal. App. 37, 89 Pac. 874; People v. Moxley, 17 Cal. App. 466, 120 Pac. 43; People v. Meadows, 22 Cal. App. 313, 134 Pac. 337.

"The evidence introduced by the people showed that the business concern of which defendants were the active managers and operators was engaged in a fraudulent enterprise. The methods adopted to induce credulous persons to pay money in the belief that they were securing valuable lots by merely paying the cost of title certificates and deeds were of a dishonest character throughout. Nor did either of the appellants disclaim responsibility for the misleading statements made by their agents as to the character of the land. There was testimony showing, as has been before referred to, that both affirmed that the land was level and of good character. The evidence showed that these statements were false and that a lot of the size and description which it was proposed to transfer to complainant would have been practically worthless; its value would be a matter of cents and not dollars.

[4] "The claim that the court committed prejudicial error in allowing proof of statements of one of the appellants made outside of the presence of his alleged co-conspirator is not sustained by the facts. The statement of a co-conspirator made outside of the presence of his confederate is always admissible after proof has been made of the existence of the conspiracy. This proof may be by a showing of circumstances only, and where there is some evidence pointing in that direction of a substantial nature, it is not for this court to question the sufficiency thereof. As was said in People v. Donnelly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 Pac. 177: "The ultimate fact here, of course, was the conspiracy on the part of the defendant with the other parties named in the commission of the crime, but it is not necessary in order to establish that fact to prove that the parties met and actually agreed to jointly undertake such criminal action. From the secrecy with which unlawful undertakings are adopted it would be generally impossible to make such proof by direct testimony. Evidence is indirect as well as direct, consisting of inferences and presumptions, and it is code law that upon the trial of a case evidence may be given of any facts from which the facts in issue are presumed or are logically inferable; and the jury, by the exercise of their judgment or reason, warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, may make such deductions or draw such inferences from the facts proven as will establish the ultimate fact or facts in issue. * * * From all the facts and circumstances disclosed in this case on the trial of the defendant, it cannot be said that there was not evidence from which the jury could draw the inference or find the ultimate fact of a conspiracy on the part of the defendant."

[5] "In the same decision it is pointed out that the order in which the testimony is introduced at a trial where conspiracy is charged is immaterial and subject to reasonable regulation by the trial judge. If it be admitted, in order to give point to that objection, that the object of the alleged conspiracy had been fully accomplished before the making of the incriminating statements by appellants, and that for such reason the admission of one could not be received in evidence against the other, it may be answered that, even though the objection is well founded, it abundantly appears by an examination of the entire evidence that any error committed in the regard mentioned has not, in this case, resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const. Cal.

[6] "It was competent to allow proof of similar transactions had by appellants and their agents with persons other than the complainant. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194.

[7] "The instructions as given by the court must be considered in their entirety, and when so considered they seem to present a very fair statement of the law of the case. In portions thereof the jury was distinctly advised that the allegations of the information must be proved before a conviction could result, and other portions of the instructions which might seem to indicate that the evidence to justify a conviction could be gathered from proof of facts not included within the charge were sufficiently limited to the particular and relevant purpose for which they were given."

To the foregoing opinion a further discussion of propositions especially argued on the rehearing may be added:

[8] We do not believe it was essential to the statement of a good charge to aver in the information that the complainant was actually possessed of the money out of which she might be defrauded. Counsel is correct in his statement that the information did not charge that the complainant actually parted with property, although the proof showed that she did. It was only necessary to charge the agreement of conspiracy, together with a description of some overt act done in pursuance thereof—not that the crime agreed upon was actually accomplished.

[9] It has been stated in the foregoing that we view the evidence as being entirely sufficient to sustain the charge contained in the indictment. That the evidence was circumstantial in part is not to say that it was insufficient; for the proof of a conspiracy, which is usually hatched under cover and out of the view of others than those directly concerned, is perhaps most frequently made by proof of a chain of circumstances only. People v. Stokes, 5 Cal. App. 209, 89 Pac. 997.

The question as to the jurisdiction of the superior court over the offense is made the subject of much earnest argument on the part of appellants.

[10] The crime of conspiracy is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by both. Pen. Code, § 182. It is urged that the superior court was without jurisdiction to try the offense if committed within the corporate limits of the city of Los Angeles, because the crime belonged to a class called "high-grade misdemeanors" of which the police court of the city of Los Angeles is given exclusive jurisdiction. The Constitution of the state provides that the superior court shall have jurisdiction of all cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for. Section 5, art. 6. Under this provision it has been held that the Legislature may repose exclusive jurisdiction in police courts of all classes of misdemeanors committed within the municipal boundaries. Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556, 21 Pac. 307, 541; Ex parte Westenberg, 167 Cal. 309, 139 Pac. 674. By act of the Legislature of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 95) the police court of the city of Los Angeles is given exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment. The same provision was continued in the succeeding act, approved June 6, 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 469. So that if it may be said, under the circumstances of this case, that the conspiracy was fully accomplished within the boundaries of the city of Los Angeles, then the contention of appellants must be sustained. Section 184 of the Penal Code provides that no agreement, except to commit a felony upon the person of another, or to commit arson, or burglary, amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act, beside such agreement, be done to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties to the agreement. The unlawful act here attempted, that of defrauding the complainant of money, does not fall within either of the exceptions; therefore the crime was not complete upon the concert of minds being arrived at with the unlawful object in view. There was required an overt act, which act was consummated when the false representations were made to the complainant at the city of Pasadena. The crime, therefore, was made complete only when the overt act was accomplished.

[11] But, says counsel for appellants, the police court of the city of Pasadena then had exclusive jurisdiction of the offense. However, this is not true. The city of Pasadena is governed under a freeholders' charter which was approved by the Legislature in the year 1901. Stats. 1901, p. 922. By this charter a police court is established within the city, and the jurisdiction thereof is defined in the same terms as are used to describe the jurisdiction of justices' courts created by general laws; in other words, jurisdiction is not given to such courts to try cases termed "high-grade" misdemeanors. It has been held that the state law creating police courts in municipalities is valid, except where the cities have exercised their right under section 8½, art. 11, of the state Constitution, to provide in their charters for the creation and organization of such courts. Where this has been done, then the state law ceases to apply. Fleming v. Hance, 153 Cal. 162, 94 Pac. 620. Therefore it follows that the crime of conspiracy committed within the limits of the city of Pasadena would properly be prosecuted by information in the superior court after preliminary examination, or by indictment by the grand jury, as was done in this case. To the point just discussed may be quoted the following observation found in Ruling Case Law, vol. 5, page 1076:

"A prosecution may be brought against conspirators in the county where the alleged combination or agreement was entered into. On the other hand, if an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy is committed in a jurisdiction other than that where the combination was made, the conspirators may be prosecuted in the place where the overt act was committed.

The law considers that wherever the conspirators act, there they continue their agreement, and this agreement is continued as to all whenever any one of them does an act in furtherance of the conspiracy" (citing cases).

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

ROWE v. ROSE, Mayor. (Civ. 1724.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 12, 1915.)

1. CLERKS OF COURTS ⇐7—RIGHT TO OFFICE — FAILURE TO FILE BOND — STATUTE — "COUNTY OFFICER"—"TOWNSHIP OFFICER."

Pol. Code, § 996, provides that an office becomes vacant upon failure of the officer to file his official bond within the time prescribed. Section 950 provides that county and township officers must file their bonds with the county clerk. Held, that a clerk of a police court of the city of the first and one-half class, appointed under St. 1913, p. 470, § 6, providing that such clerks shall be appointed by the judges of the court, and shall hold office for four years, was not an officer whose office became vacant upon his failure to file bond with the county clerk; he not being a "county or township officer."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Township Officer; also First and Second Series, County Officer.]

2. CLERKS OF COURTS ⇐8—RIGHT TO OFFICE—POWER OF REMOVAL—STATUTE.

The office of clerk of the police court of the city of Los Angeles, a city of the first and one-half class, created by St. 1913, p. 470, § 6, is not regulated by the provision of the city charter that all appointed officers of the city shall hold office for four years, provided that the appointing power shall have power to remove, in all cases, the provision of the charter touching removal relating only to city officers, which the clerk is not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Clerks of Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 26-29; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

3. COURTS ⇐43—POLICE COURTS—LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY.

The Legislature has authority to create police courts and to classify cities for that purpose.

Petition for mandamus by W. H. Rowe against H. H. Rose, Mayor of the City of Los Angeles. Denied.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] Petition for mandate to compel respondent to approve a certain bond offered by petitioner who claims to have been regularly appointed as a clerk of the police court of the city of Los Angeles and to be entitled to qualify thereunder. The petition sets out that on the 13th day of August, 1913, a clerk was appointed for the same office which petitioner seeks to qualify himself for, and that said clerk so appointed on said date did not file a bond with the county clerk for the faithful performance of his duties. One of the claims of petitioner is that, because of the failure to file this bond with the county clerk, the office became vacant under the provisions of section 996 of the Political Code. The clerk of the police court, whose office is brought into question, was appointed under the provisions of an act of the Legislature approved June 6, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 469), which created police courts for cities of the first and one-half class, and continued generally the plan of organization of such courts which were originally created under what is commonly known as the Whitney Act. Section 6 of the act now in force provides that the clerks of the police court shall be appointed by the judges of that court, and that such clerks shall hold office for a term of four years from the date of appointment. It is then provided that:

"Each of said clerks shall give a bond in the sum of five thousand dollars, with at least two sureties, to be approved by the mayor, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office."

It is then provided that the clerk shall render each month to the city council a detailed account of moneys collected, et cetera. The sections of the Political Code to which our attention has been directed, and which relate to the filing of official bonds, do not, in our opinion, cover the case of the clerks of the police court. Under section 950, Political Code, the official bonds required to be filed with the county clerk are those of "county and township officers." The clerks of the police court are neither county nor township officers, and our attention is not pointed to any provision of the law which seems to require that the bonds of such clerks must be filed in the same place as are the bonds of county and township officers. A reasonable requirement would be, in view of the fact that the bond is given to protect the city against any misappropriation of fees and other funds which these clerks are required to make account for, that the official bonds of police court clerks, after being approved by the mayor, should be filed in the city clerk's office. For aught that the petition shows, the clerk whom petitioner seeks to displace did furnish a bond which was approved by the mayor and presumably filed with the city clerk.

[2, 3] A second point is urged, and that is this: That the clerks of the police court are city officials, and the city charter of the city of Los Angeles provides that all appointed officers of the city shall hold office for the term of four years, provided, however, that the appointing power shall have the power to remove in all cases. The office of clerk of the police court is created by general statute. The city charter, so far as our examination of it discloses, and we are not furnished with any reference which indicates the contrary, makes no provision for the appointment of clerks of the police court. The provision of the charter referred to, providing that the appointing power shall have power of removal, must be considered as relating to city officers only, among which the clerks of the police court are not numbered. The validity of the acts of the Legislature creating police courts and classifying cities for that purpose has long been upheld. A somewhat recent case in which several former decisions are reviewed is that of Ex parte Westenber, 167 Cal. 309, 139 Pac. 674. See, also, Fleming v. Hance, 153 Cal. 162, 94 Pac. 620.

We think that no sufficient showing is made which will authorize the issuance of the writ sought.

The petition is denied.

MUSSER v. FITTING et al. (Civ. 1529.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 13, 1915.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡38—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—ASSESSMENT WORK.

The locator of a junior mining claim has the burden of proving that the senior conflicting claim was forfeited by failure to do the required annual assessment work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 87½-113; Dec. Dig. ⚡38.]

2. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡23—ACTIONS—FINDING—ASSESSMENT WORK.

Under Civ. Code, § 1426m, providing that the affidavit of the owner of a mining claim that he had performed his annual assessment work shall be prima facie evidence that the work was done, it was error for the court not to find that such work was done, where the affidavit was in evidence, and was not controverted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 51-59, 114; Dec. Dig. ⚡23.]

3. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡23—ASSESSMENT WORK—WORK BY STOCKHOLDER.

A member of a mining association or a stockholder in a corporation has such an interest in the claims owned by the association or corporation that the assessment work done by him inures to the benefit of the association or corporation so as to prevent a forfeiture.

4. JUDGMENT ⚡490—COLLATERAL ATTACK—RECITAL OF SERVICE.

Where the affidavit of service on a foreign corporation was defective, but the default judgment recited that the complaint and summons had been duly served, the judgment is good against collateral attack; since the recital of service does not show that it was based on the service which was defective, and the record, therefore, does not positively contradict the recital.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Sam G. Musser against J. P.

Fitting and another. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant Salisbury appeals. Reversed.

P. W. Forbes, of Bishop, and Boyd & Salisbury, of Reno, Nev., for appellant. A. H. Swallow, of Bishop, and Wm. J. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title to a mining claim of which plaintiff claimed ownership and right to possession. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant Salisbury appeals.

In January, 1910, plaintiff duly located a lode mining claim which he designated as the Lead Hill lode mining claim, the exterior boundary lines of which conflicted with and overlapped certain claims known as the Monster No. 4 mining claim and Monster No. 5 mining claim, ownership of which was claimed by appellant. This conflict, as between the Lead Hill lode mining claim and Monster No. 4 mining claim, covered 9.54 acres, and, as to the former claim and Monster No. 5 mining claim, covered 7.03 acres.

By answer, Fitting disclaimed any interest in the premises, and defendant Salisbury, in addition to answer denying the material allegations of the complaint, alleged that in April, 1907, J. P. Fitting duly located and perfected his claim to Monster No. 4 and Monster No. 5 mining claims, title to which claims Fitting conveyed to him by deed duly executed on December 3, 1909, since which date said defendant has been the owner in possession and, save a short time during the pendency of an order restraining him from so doing, engaged in developing and working the same and extracting ore therefrom; that Fitting, in making said location, and down to the time of such conveyance to defendant Salisbury, had complied in all respects with the laws, rules, and regulations pertaining to the location and acquisition of mining claims and mineral locations upon the public domain, and during the year 1909 had done or caused to be performed upon each of said claims work and labor of the value of $100.

Plaintiff's right depends upon whether or not the expenditure of $100 upon each of said claims was made during the year 1909 in the improvement and development thereof. If not, it is conceded that the former locator and his grantee, appellant here, forfeited all right thereto, leaving the property free and open to location by plaintiff. Upon this issue the court found:

That on April 25, 1907, J. P. Fitting was a member of a firm or association known as the J. P. Fitting Company, which employed Fitting to locate mining claims, and one D. H. Duncan was likewise employed by said company, who, on said date, and while so employed, located two claims known as Monster No. 4 and Monster No. 5, posting notices thereon, wherein J. P. Fitting was named as the locator thereof; that thereafter, on July 29, 1907, J. P. Fitting executed a deed of conveyance whereby he conveyed to said J. P. Fitting Company all of his right, title, interest, and estate in and to each of said claims, and from said date until January 1, 1910, said company was the owner and entitled to the undisputed possession of the land embraced within the boundaries of said claims; "that said J. P. Fitting Company did not do or perform any labor of any kind or description whatever upon, or make any improvement or spend any money for the benefit or improvement of said mining claims or either of them for or during the year 1909, and that no person made any such expenditure or did or performed any work or labor or made any improvement upon either of said mining claims for or in behalf of said J. P. Fitting Company, for or during said year, and that said J. P. Fitting Company was not prevented from making such improvement or from performing work and labor upon said mining claims or either of them by force or otherwise during said year."

The effect of the finding is that, while the claims were located in the name of J. P. Fitting, he thereafter, on July 29, 1907, conveyed his interest therein to the J. P. Fitting Company and that neither said company nor any person for or on its behalf did any work or performed any labor of any kind or description whatever upon said mining claims or made any improvements thereon during the year 1909.

[1] The right of Fitting to the property attached in April, 1907, when the location of the mining claims was made in his name. Plaintiff's right thereto is by virtue of a like location made in 1910. The acts of plaintiff in thus locating the claims, so far as the same overlapped or conflicted with the claims of Fitting, were ineffectual for the purpose of vesting any right thereto in plaintiff, unless there had been an abandonment by Fitting or a forfeiture of his rights by reason of failure to do the annual assessment work for the year 1909. Gear v. Ford, 4 Cal. App. 556, 88 Pac. 600. The burden of establishing such forfeiture rested upon plaintiff. Goldberg v. Bruschi, 146 Cal. 708, 81 Pac. 23; Whalen Cons'd Copper M. Co. v. Whalen (C. C.) 127 Fed. 611. Hence defendant, having established the fact of his prior location and the conceded conflict in the exterior boundary lines of the claims and conveyance made to him by said locator, might have rested his case.

[2] Defendant, however, while not required so to do, offered in evidence his affidavit made in form as provided in section 1426m, Civil Code, duly filed on January 27, 1910, as proof that he had performed the requisite annual work upon the claims for the year 1909. Under the section of the Code supra, this constituted prima facie evidence that the annual work upon said claims was duly done and performed by Fitting, as alleged in the answer. No evidence was offered tending to controvert such fact so established. The question as to whether or not the work had been done was the material issue in the case upon which the rights of the parties depended; nevertheless the court made no finding thereon. Had such been made in accordance with the evidence, it must have followed that, since Fitting's location of the claims was prior to that made by plaintiff, and since there had been no abandonment or forfeiture thereof, his conveyance to Salisbury vested in the latter good title to the property, and that plaintiff, by virtue of his attempted location, acquired no right or interest in the same. The failure of the court to make such finding was error, and, unless cured by other sufficient finding unaffected by error, entitles appellant to a reversal of the case.

[3] The court, as hereinbefore stated, found that in July, 1907, J. P. Fitting by deed conveyed the claims so located by him to a company or association (whether incorporated is not found) known as the J. P. Fitting Company, of which he was a member, and that said company failed to do the annual assessment work thereon. Conceding such fact established by proper evidence—as to which, however, we express no opinion—nevertheless, since Fitting was a member of such company or association (or, if a corporation, a stockholder therein), he had an equitable and beneficial interest in the property by reason of which the assessment work done by him inured to the benefit thereof so as to prevent a forfeiture. Wailes v. Davies (C. C.) 158 Fed. 667, and cases there cited; Anderson v. Caughey, 3 Cal. App. 22, 84 Pac. 223.

[4] Moreover, for the purpose of avoiding the effect of this deed so made by Fitting to the J. P. Fitting Company, defendant offered in evidence a judgment and decree wherein the superior court of Inyo county on June 8, 1909, in an action brought by Fitting against the company, declared said deed null and void, and ordered, adjudged, and decreed the same and the record thereof canceled and annulled for fraud practiced in procuring it. Plaintiff's objection to the reception of such document in evidence was sustained upon the ground that it appeared upon an inspection of the judgment roll that the judgment was void. The ground upon which respondent relies in support of this ruling is that it appeared from the judgment roll that defendant was a nonresident corporation doing business in this state, and that the return of service indorsed upon the summons was that the same was served "on the 4th day of May, A. D. 1909, on Charles F. Curry, as secretary of state of the state of California, by delivering to him, said secretary of state, personally in said county of Sacramento, a copy of said summons attached to a true copy of the complaint in the action therein mentioned." In the case of Willey v. Benedict Co., 145 Cal. 601, 79 Pac. 270, relied upon by respondent, it was held that proof of service so made upon a nonresident corporation, since the existence of a condition upon which service upon the secretary of state is permitted was not made to appear, was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render a judgment by default. The question there, however, arose upon a direct attack upon the judgment (Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 400, 24 Pac. 1089, 21 Am. St. Rep. 52), while here the attack is made in another action, and therefore collateral. Hence the case cited cannot be deemed an authority supporting respondent's contention.

Considering the whole record, we find that the affidavit of service is not the only evidence that defendant was served with process. The jurisdictional recitals in the judgment which constitute a part of the record are that:

"It appearing to the court that defendant, the J. P. Fitting Company, a corporation, was duly served with summons and complaint herein, and having failed to answer plaintiff's complaint filed in the above-entitled action, and the legal time for answering having expired, and no answer or demurrer having been filed herein, or other appearance made by defendant, and the default of said defendant, the J. P. Fitting Company, a corporation, in the premises having been duly entered according to law."

Notwithstanding the insufficiency of proof contained in the affidavit indorsed upon the summons, this recital must be taken on collateral attack as true, unless the record affirmatively shows the facts upon which it is based to be untrue. There is nothing to indicate that such finding was predicated upon proof of service indorsed upon the summons found in the judgment roll. The recital makes no reference to such proof as a basis for the conclusion, as was the case in Harris v. Sargeant, 37 Or. 41, 60 Pac. 608. It is not inconsistent therewith, since other sufficient proof of service or admission thereof might have been presented which justified the finding. Mr. Black, in his work on Judgments (section 273) says the recital as to due service of process in a judgment is conclusive of such fact in collateral attack, unless it be "positively contradicted by the record itself"; and, further that such "contradiction must be explicit and irreconcilable; it is not enough that the recital seems to be contradicted by inferences drawn from other parts of the record." See, also, Freeman on Judgments, § 130. The rule is that upon collateral attack every presumption should be indulged in support of the validity of the judgment. Hence, since the proof indorsed upon the summons was insufficient to justify the recital solemnly made in a judgment which imports verity, we must presume that the court had before it other and sufficient proof of service of process. This conclusion seems to be fully supported by the case of Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 345, 81 Pac. 138. The court, therefore, erred in excluding this judgment from evidence. That it was prejudicial follows from the fact that, in the absence of any conveyance by Fitting to the J. P. Fitting Company, title to the mining claims remained vested in him at the time when the evidence shows that during the year 1909 he performed the requisite work and labor upon the claims as alleged and upon which the court failed to make any finding, as hereinbefore stated.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

ROUGHTON v. BROOKINGS LUMBER & BOX CO. (Civ. 1524.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, March 13, 1915. Rehearing Denied April 10, 1915. Denied By Supreme Court May 10, 1915.)

1. CONTRACTS — 322 — PERFORMANCE — REASONABLE TIME — STATUTES.

In an action on a contract for the installation of automatic sprinklers, not specifying any time for completion, evidence held to sustain a finding that 60 to 90 days was not a reasonable time.

2. CONTRACTS — 328 — ACTION FOR CONTRACT PRICE — DEFENSES.

Under a contract to furnish materials and labor for the installation of automatic sprinklers and fire extinguishers, providing that if the work should be discontinued before completion, by fire, etc., defendant should pay for all goods destroyed, and materials and labor furnished up to that time, under which plaintiff proceeded with reasonable diligence, the fact that if the system had been installed and in operation the fire might have been extinguished, would not relieve defendant from liability for materials furnished but not destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1571–1584; Dec. Dig. — 328.]

3. EVIDENCE — 442 — PAROL EVIDENCE — CONTRACT.

Such contract, though silent as to the time within which the work should be completed, was performable, under Civ. Code, § 1657, within a reasonable time, so that parol evidence to fix a shorter time for performance than a reasonable time was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1874–1897; Dec. Dig. — 442.]

4. CONTRACTS — 319 — BUILDING CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — STATUTE — "MATERIALS FURNISHED."

Under a contract for the installation of a sprinkler system, providing that if the work was discontinued by fire, etc., before completion, defendant should pay the value of all goods destroyed, materials furnished, and labor rendered at the time of discontinuance, and in view of Civ. Code, § 1641, requiring a construction to give effect to all provisions of a contract, the term "materials furnished" referred to other goods than such as might be destroyed, and included material furnished and delivered upon defendant's premises upon which plaintiff had expended labor and cost, but which was not destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1458, 1476, 1477, 1479, 1493–1507; Dec. Dig. — 319.]

5. CONTRACTS — 322 — ACTION — EVIDENCE — REASONABLE TIME.

In an action on a contract for the installation of a sprinkler system within a reasonable time, the testimony of the superintendent of construction as to the preliminary work and assembling of necessary materials was admissible on the question of reasonable time.

6. CONTRACTS — 349 — ACTION — EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover under a contract for the installation of a sprinkler system, providing that if the work was discontinued by reason of fire, etc., the defendant should be liable for the value of all goods destroyed, materials furnished, and labor rendered, evidence as to a railway fare, and a per diem charge of plaintiff's superintendent after the fire was inadmissible, though evidence as to a similar per diem charge before the fire was admissible.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1052 — HARMLESS ERROR — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in the admission of such evidence was harmless, where the court excluded such amount from that allowed to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4171–4177; Dec. Dig. — 1052.]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1171 — HARMLESS ERROR — DE MINIMIS.

In such case, conceded error in allowing to plaintiff a railway fare of $4 could not, under the rule of de minimis, justify a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by A. P. Roughton against the Brookings Lumber & Box Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. Herbert H. Chase, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On July 7, 1910, plaintiff's assignor, Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company, made a written proposal to defendant, whereby it proposed, for a sum therein specified, to furnish materials and labor therefor and install in the box factory of defendant its system of automatic sprinklers and fire extinguishers, which proposal was, in writing, duly accepted by defendant. The proposal as accepted contained no provision fixing the time within which the installation of the plant should be made, but did provide that no change or modification of the contract should be binding upon the Automatic Sprinkler Company other than such as in writing should be indorsed thereon by the president of the company. It also contained a provision as follows:

"If at any time prior to the completion of the equipment, the work thereon be discontinued by fire or any cause other than the fault of the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company, there shall be immediately due and payable from you (the defendant) a sum equal to the value of all goods destroyed; materials furnished, labor and services rendered at the time of discontinuance."

Thereafter plaintiff's assignor proceeded with the work of installing the plant as called for by the terms of the contract, when, on September 22, 1910, at which time the installation of the plant was partially complete, a fire occurred, as a result of which the buildings and fire extinguishing system so far as installed therein were destroyed. Thereupon, pursuant to the provisions of the contract hereinbefore quoted, work was discontinued. This action is to recover the value of the goods destroyed, materials furnished, labor and services rendered up to the time when the work of installation of said plant was discontinued on account of said fire. The court gave judgment for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals.

The court found that it was untrue that the contract made between plaintiff's assignor and defendant was in part oral; that it was not agreed that the sprinkling apparatus should be installed in defendant's buildings within three weeks from July 7, 1910; that it was untrue that the proximate cause of the destruction of the buildings and plant partially installed therein was the delay of plaintiff's assignor in the performance of the work—all of which facts were affirmatively alleged in the answer as a defense to the action. The court further found that under the implied terms of the contract a reasonable time was fixed for the completion of the work, and that when discontinued by reason of the fire a reasonable time had not elapsed for the performance thereof; all of which findings are attacked by appellant for want of sufficient evidence to justify them.

[1] In the absence of any time being specified in the written proposal for doing the work, the law fixed a reasonable time for the performance thereof. Section 1657, Civ. Code.

The fact that in assembling the material for doing the work much of it had to be shipped from distant parts of the country, when considered with other circumstances shown in connection with the testimony of several witnesses to the effect that a reasonable time for installing the plant would be two or three months, fully justified the finding that such reasonable time had not elapsed when the fire occurred, at which time, the evidence tends to show, a very few days would have sufficed for completing the installation. Conceding that with an extra force of men, shipments of material by express, and special effort, it might have been completed in a shorter period, such fact in no wise tends to prove that 60 to 90 days was an unreasonable time for installing the plant.

[2] When completely installed, the sprinkling apparatus would have been valueless as a means of extinguishing fire, unless connected with a sufficient supply of water for such use. The evidence tends to show that defendant, upon whom the duty devolved, had done nothing toward the work of connecting the plant with the city water system. But, however this may be, the sprinkling company prosecuted the work, as found by the court, with reasonable diligence, and, conceding that had the plant been installed and in operation the fire might have been extinguished, nevertheless, since the company assumed no obligation under its contract to have the plant completed within other than a reasonable time, which time had not elapsed when the fire occurred, it could not be held liable for loss resulting therefrom.

[3] Appellant further insists that at the time of entering into the written contract it was orally agreed that plaintiff's assignor would complete the installation within three weeks from the date thereof. In support of this contention, counsel directs our attention to parol testimony tending to show that an employé of the sprinkler company stated that, if defendant accepted the proposal, the work would be done in not exceeding 30 days. Not only did the written proposal contain the provision that modifications thereof, other than in writing signed by the president, should not be deemed binding upon plaintiff's assignor, but inasmuch as the contract was silent as to the time within which the work should be done, the law (section 1657, Civ. Code) supplies the omitted term as to the time required for doing the work as fully and completely as though the parties had by writing in express words fixed such time. This being true, it follows that, reading the written contract in connection with said section of the Civil Code, it provided that the work should be done within a reasonable time. Hence parol evidence tending to prove a change of such term and fixing a shorter period than that which would constitute a reasonable time for doing the work would be obnoxious to the rule that the terms of a written contract cannot be varied by parol testimony. In our opinion, the court committed no error in making the findings hereinbefore complained of.

[4] The court found that at the time of the discontinuance of the work the value of the goods destroyed, materials furnished, labor and services rendered was the sum of $709.42, consisting of materials of the value of $328.31 destroyed, labor and services rendered of the value of $150.50, and materials furnished for said work delivered upon the premises, but which were not destroyed, valued at $230.61. Appellant insists that this material so valued at $230.61, which was delivered upon the premises but not installed in place, was not material furnished within the meaning of the terms used in the contract. By the terms of the contract it had agreed, not only to pay for the "goods destroyed," but for "materials furnished, labor and services rendered." If defendant was to pay only and alone for the goods destroyed, then no purpose could be subserved by the use of the words "materials furnished," to which in construing the contract some meaning must be accorded. We think it clear that in making the contract the parties in using the words "materials furnished" intended thereby to refer to other goods than such as might be destroyed, and which in this case meant material furnished and delivered upon the premises of defendant and upon which it appears some considerable labor and cost had been expended in assembling, cutting, fitting, and preparing it for use in the installation of this particular plant. Otherwise construed, no effect would be given the provision, thus violating a cardinal rule of interpretation of such instruments. Section 1641, Civ. Code.

[5] By supplemental brief, appellant directs our attention to several alleged erroneous rulings made by the court in admitting and rejecting evidence offered. The testimony of the superintendent of construction as to the preliminary work and assembling of materials necessary to make the installation was proper as tending to establish what constituted a reasonable time within which to perform the same.

[6-8] Evidence as to railway fare paid from Los Angeles to Highlands, and per diem charge of E. Barney, in charge of construction, for trip made after the fire, was improperly admitted; but since the court, as shown by its finding, excluded such sum from the amount allowed, defendant was not prejudiced by the ruling.

Evidence as to a similar charge for a like trip made prior to the fire was proper, in so far as it covered the per diem of the witness; and, conceding error in allowing railway fare of $4, such fact will not, under the rule of de minimis, justify a reversal.

We find no error in other rulings which are complained of.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PETERSON v. BEGGS et al. (Civ. 1209.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 15, 1915.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡97 — "MINING PARTNERSHIP"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where defendants agreed that one of them, who held the legal title to mining property, should operate such properties, holding the title in trust for himself and his codefendants, that after such properties had repaid him certain advances the sums remaining were to be divided equally between the parties, and that if after such repayment any property remained unsold it was to be held by the defendant trustee, one half to belong to him and the other half to his codefendants, such defendants were not associated in a mining partnership under Civ. Code, § 2511, providing that when two or more persons, who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it and extracting the minerals therefrom, actually engage in working the same, they are such a partnership, since the actual working of the mine by the parties together, contributing expenses and sharing profits, is essential to the existence of the relation.

2. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡97 — MINING PARTNERSHIP—COTENANTS.

Cotenants of a mine are not mining partners, unless all of them actually join in its working, and one not so engaged is under the liabilities only of a cotenant in respect to the mine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 222; Dec. Dig. ⚡97.]

3. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡97 — MINING PARTNERSHIP—NECESSITY FOR JOINT WORKING.

An agreement between parties combining to acquire, develop, and deal in mines, creates no mining partnership unless it contemplates the actual joint working of such mines by the associates upon acquisition and development.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 222; Dec. Dig. ⚡97.]

4. MINES AND MINERALS ⚡97 — MINING PARTNERSHIP—JOINT WORKING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against associates alleged to have been mining partners, evidence held insufficient to show that such alleged partners departed from the agreement between them that constituted one of their number sole operator of the mines, so as by an actual joint working to have become such partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 222; Dec. Dig. ⚡97.]

5. ATTACHMENT ⚡101—AFFIDAVIT—STATUTE.

Where an affidavit of attachment, in an action against three defendants, stated that it was not sought to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors "of said defendant," thus referring only to one defendant, it was insufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 538, prescribing the necessary requirements of such an affidavit.

6. ATTACHMENT ⚡122—AFFIDAVIT—AMENDMENT—STATUTE.

Such affidavit was not void, being defective only in a substantive particular, and could have been amended by plaintiff at or before the application to discharge the writ, under Code Civ. Proc. § 558, providing that an improperly or irregularly issued writ of attachment must be discharged upon application unless amended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by O. Peterson against Will M. Beggs and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for appellant Beggs. E. L. Rhodes, of San Jose, for appellants Morrell and another. Webe & Redding, of Downieville, for respondent.

SHIELDS, J. pro tem. Plaintiff prosecuted this action to recover for services rendered as a watchman or keeper of a mining property known as the Kate Hardy mine. He was employed by the defendant John W. Morrell, but, alleging that all of the defendants were mining partners, claims that they were jointly liable as such for the value of his services. Plaintiff recovered judgment. An attachment was issued in the case which defendants later moved to vacate. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order refusing to dissolve the attachment. The sole ground of attack upon the judgment is that there is no evidence to support it. This appears to be a fact.

[1, 2] On July 8th, 1909, one Tyler Dudley appears to have been the owner of the Kate Hardy mine. On that day he entered into a contract by which he agreed to sell the mine to defendant Will M. Beggs. Beggs, having possession of the mine under a previous contract, retained it under this agreement, and on the 13th day of July, 1909, entered into an agreement with the defendants Morrell which seems to be decisive of this case. This agreement recites that a number of mines and mining properties belonging to the Morrells had been conveyed to Beggs, and that they had given him a power of attorney; that Beggs had in his own name a contract to buy the Kate Hardy and other mines; that he had expended in and about said mines a considerable sum of money in behalf of the Morrells; and that he had also performed valuable legal services for them. The contract then provided that, although the title to all of the mining properties described stood in the name of Beggs, yet as between the parties he was not the owner of them, but simply held the title in trust for the parties, substantially as follows: That he was to sell the mining property, or some portion of it, and from the purchase price from time to time deduct a sum sufficient to repay to him all sums paid out by him, either to the Morrells or for the benefit of the mining properties and to compensate him for his services as an attorney in behalf of the defendants Morrell. After the repayment of these sums and the payment of the expenses of the sales, the sums remaining were to be divided equally between the parties. If after such repayment any property remained unsold, it was to be held by defendant Beggs, one half to belong to him and the other half to the defendants Morrell. By the terms of this agreement it is provided that it was made "in order that the respective rights of the parties" thereto might "be definitely settled and determined." Does it constitute them mining partners?

A concise statement of the law defining mining partnerships will help us to answer this question. Such a partnership exists "when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it and extracting the minerals therefrom, actually engage in working the same." Civ. Code, § 2511. The actual working of the mine by the joint owners is essential to a mining partnership. 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 228. The partnership arises only when the co-owners unite and co-operate in working the mine. Hartney v. Gosling, 10 Wyo. 346, 68 Pac. 1118, 98 Am. St. Rep. 1005; Skillman v. Lachman, 83 Am. Dec., note 104; Dorsey v. Newcomer, 121 Cal. 213, 53 Pac. 557; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689. The actual working of the mine by the parties together for their mutual benefit seems to be essential to the existence of the partnership relation, the parties to contribute to the expenses of the work and to share in the profits according to their respective interests. The agreement of July 13th does not seem to have contemplated any such condition. By its terms, Beggs was in sole charge of the property, and whatever work was provided to be done by it was to be done by Beggs. No money for expenses was to be advanced by the Morrells, and, under the testimony, no money was advanced by them. By this contract, if any mining work was done by Beggs and profits resulted from it, no share of such profits was to be paid to the defendants Morrell. On the contrary, all moneys realized were to be retained by Beggs to be applied to indebtedness existing in his favor. In a sense it is true that the Morrells were interested in having this indebtedness discharged and the mining properties developed, and that any moneys so applied were paid to their benefit. But their interest in profits which might be so used was not a right to the profits as such, but an interest only in any balance which might remain after profits had been so used by Beggs. Their interest was similar to that of an owner who lets a mine to be worked upon shares. The latter's interest is not a property in the profits as such, but a claim against them as a fund out of which, when ascertained, he is to be compensated. This does not constitute him a mining partner. Le Fevre v. Castagnio, 5 Colo. 564; Skillman v. Lachman, 83 Am. Dec., note 105; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 227. The same conclusion must be reached if we regard the agreement of July 13th as having constituted the parties tenants in common of the Kate Hardy mine. Cotenants of a mine are not necessarily mining partners, or partners at all; the actual working of the mine by the joint owners is essential to such a partnership. 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 228; First National Bank v. G. V. B. Mining Co. (C. C.) 89 Fed. 449. And it must be a joint working by all of the co-owners. If one co-owner of mining property engages in working it for ore, as Beggs did in this case, and as later J. W. Morrell did, the remaining owner not so engaged does not thus become a partner; he will be left to his rights and chargeable according to his duties as a cotenant only. Madar v. Norman, 13 Idaho, 585, 92 Pac. 572.

[3] There appears to be nothing in the agreement under discussion about working any of the mines mentioned in it. As a consequence, even if that writing evidenced an association of the parties for the purpose of acquiring, developing, and dealing in mines, unless it further provided that, when acquired and developed, they should be then worked on joint account, no mining partnership was created by it. Doyle v. Burns, 123 Iowa, 488, 99 N. W. 195.

Without discussing it further, it may be safely concluded that this agreement created no partnership relation. It appears to be a simple declaration of trust under which the defendant was to deal with the property as a trustee, wholly independent of his co-defendants, subject only to the conditions of his trust.

[4] This writing, however, is not necessarily determinative of this case. The parties could have departed from or acted independently of it, and either by agreement, or as the result of what they did, become liable as mining partners. But the evidence does not show this. Everything that was done by defendant Beggs was in harmony with his rights and duties under this trust agreement, and was done presumably in pursuance of it. When Beggs worked the mine, he did it without any association with his codefendants. He employed the men who worked it, he directed their labors, and himself compensated them. He at no time worked in association with the Morrells. When J. W. Morrell took possession of and worked the mine, he did so in the absence of Beggs and without his knowledge. Beggs had previously employed men to keep Morrell off the property, and, when he learned that he was at the mine and working it, both by letter and by telegram he ordered him to cease work. Plaintiff was employed by J. W. Morrell after this has been done by Beggs. The record discloses no agreement to work the mine together, and no co-operation in actually working it, and consequently does not establish a liability by Beggs for the acts of Morrell.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the evidence as to the reasonable value of plaintiff's services. Upon a retrial of the cause, persons competent from knowledge and experience should be found to furnish this evidence.

[5, 6] A writ of attachment was issued in this case on behalf of plaintiff. His affidavit for this attachment stated "that the said attachment is not sought * * * to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of the said defendant." As there were three defendants, and the affidavit referred only to one, it did not meet the requirements of section 538, Code of Civil Procedure. Pajaro Valley Bank v. Seurich, 7 Cal. App. 732, 95 Pac. 911. This affidavit was not void, however; it lacked only in a substantive particular, and could have been amended upon motion of the plaintiff at or before the hearing of the application to discharge the writ of attachment. Section 558, Code Civ. Proc.; Nichols v. Davis, 23 Cal. App. 67, 137 Pac. 41. But no such amendment was suggested by plaintiff. As a consequence, the attachment should have been discharged. In justice to the trial judge, it should be stated that the deficiency in the affidavit was not pointed out by counsel, and, when the motion was passed upon, the court was apparently without knowledge of it. The failure of counsel to call the particular point upon which he relied to the attention of the court, and later to rely upon it as error, on appeal, is not commendable. Such practice, whether or not so intended, operates to entrap courts and to prolong litigation without serving justice.

The order refusing to discharge the attachment is reversed. The judgment is likewise reversed, and the cause remanded.

TAYLOR v. NORTHERN ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 1284.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 15, 1915.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⇐75 — SETTING ASIDE VERDICT — VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE — AMOUNT.

In an action for personal injuries, the trial court, if of the opinion that under the evidence the amount awarded is not legally adequate, may grant a new trial on plaintiff's motion, on the ground that the evidence does not justify the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 151, 152; Dec. Dig. ⇐75.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1015 — REVIEW — ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the compensation which plaintiff should receive for personal injury, the rule as to the conflict of evidence upon material issues is to be applied on an appeal from an order granting plaintiff a new trial the same as though the new trial had been granted on defendant's motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3860-3876; Dec. Dig. ⇐1015.]

3. NEW TRIAL ⇐137 — NOTICE OF INTENTION — SUFFICIENCY — STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring a party intending to move for a new trial to file and serve a notice of intention, specifying the grounds on which the motion will be made, a notice, specifying that the defendant's evidence as to the defectiveness of its switch, the extent and effect of the plaintiff's injury, whether it would permanently or temporarily incapacitate him, and the amount he was compelled to spend for medical treatment, etc., was not sufficient to overcome the plaintiff's evidence on those points, and that the evidence as to the character and extent of his injuries did not justify a verdict for more than $500, and which named the witnesses testifying for plaintiff upon such points, was sufficient, within the liberal construction to be given the provision, since it informed opposing counsel what evidence should be put in the statement, and enabled the court to strike out redundant matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 277, 273; Dec. Dig. ⇐137.]

4. NEW TRIAL ⇐109 — PROCEDURE — NOTICE OF INTENTION AS MOTION.

Where a notice of intention to move for a new trial was duly filed and served, the act of plaintiff's counsel in reading to the court the notice of intention, which as the statute requires specified the grounds upon which he intended to rely in support of his motion, apprising the court of the grounds of the motion, was sufficient, without a formal motion for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by D. L. Taylor against the Northern Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Theo. W. Chester, of Sacramento, T. T. C. Gregory, of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and A. F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant. D. L. Taylor, in pro. per.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The cause was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $500. Dissatisfied with the verdict, the plaintiff applied for a new trial, which was granted. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from the order granting a new trial.

The accident resulting in the injuries to the plaintiff occurred in the city of Chico, at about the hour of 12 o'clock, on the night of December 24, 1910. The defendant, at the time of the accident, was operating a line of railway extending from the city of Chico to the city of Sacramento, said line passing through the first-named city over and along a street therein which is designated and known as "Main street." The complaint, in substance, alleges that on the night above mentioned, the defendant's train left its depot at the corner of Main and First streets, in said city of Chico; that the train was started and run through Main street at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed; that the switch and frogs on the track and the valve of the air brake were defective, which defectiveness was due to the negligence of the officers, agents, and employes of the defendant; that, as plaintiff was in the act of crossing Fifth street from the Plaza, in said city, and after he had crossed the railway track, the rear truck of the rear car of said train left the main line and took the street railway track down Fifth street; that the plaintiff was struck, bruised, and wounded by the car, which had left the main line, and—

"was seriously, dangerously, and permanently injured, and will so remain the rest of his life; that the injury consists of injury to his spine, and since said time he has been unable to use his left leg; that the same is now paralyzed, and he is compelled to go on crutches, and will ever remain a permanent cripple."

It is further alleged that the defectiveness of the switch and frogs on the defendant's track at the time and place that the plaintiff received the injuries complained of was known, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence, could have been known, to the defendant through its officers, agents, and employes in charge of said track. Among the grounds of the motion for a new trial designated in the motion of intention are insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict and errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the plaintiff, the motion being made on the minutes of the court, supported by a statement of the case. The points made by the defendant for a reversal of the order appealed from are: (1) That the specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict are insufficient; (2) that the plaintiff made no motion for a new trial.

[1] Of course, it is well settled that, in an action for damages for personal injuries, a trial court, if of the opinion that, under the evidence, the amount awarded by the jury is not legally adequate or commensurate with the extent of the injuries received, may grant a new trial on the motion of the plaintiff on the ground that the evidence does not justify the verdict.

[2] And, there being in this case a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the question of the amount of compensation which the plaintiff ought to receive for the injuries sustained by him, the established rule as to the conflict of evidence upon material issues is to be applied here the same as though the new trial had been granted on the behest of the defendant.

[3] Obviously the sole reason moving the plaintiff to ask for a new trial was that the damages awarded him by the jury were inadequate under the evidence, and we think that the specifications, while inartificially expressed, sufficiently point to the particular respects in which it is claimed that the evidence warranted a verdict in a larger sum than that returned by the jury. The rule requiring such specifications (section 659, Code Civ. Proc.) has been given a very liberal construction and application in this state in recent years. The idea is that it should be given a liberal rather than a strict construction in order that cases on appeal may be heard on their merits and to promote justice. And so it has been said that:

"If the specification is sufficient to enable the opposing counsel to determine what evidence should be put in the statement, and the judge to strike out redundant and useless matter, it is enough. The statute in this matter is not primarily for this court, but for the trial court. That court should not hear the motion unless the statement contains such specifications. Upon that subject the trial judge, who tried the case, has a decided advantage over this court in determining whether the specifications are sufficient. * * * It is in the nature of a notice, the sufficiency of which should be tested by inquiring whether the opposite party is injured by defects. It is not even to be regarded with the strictness with which an error of the court must be. If error at all, it is committed by a party and in a matter in which great liberality should be exercised by courts. Whenever there is a reasonably successful effort to state 'the particulars' and they are such as may have been sufficient to inform opposing counsel and the court of the grounds, and the trial court has entertained and passed upon the motion, in my opinion, this court ought not to refuse to consider the case on appeal." American Type, etc., Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744. See, also, Harris v. Duarte, 141 Cal. 497, 70 Pac. 298, 75 Pac. 58; Jones v. Goldtree Bros. & Co., 142 Cal. 383, 77 Pac. 939; S. P. Co. v. Lipman, 148 Cal. 480, 83 Pac. 445.

The specifications objected to here, in substance, state that the evidence produced by the defendant upon the questions of the defectiveness of the switch, the extent and effect of the plaintiff's injuries, whether the result thereof was to permanently or only temporarily incapacitate him, and the amount of money he was compelled to expend for medical treatment, etc., was not sufficient to overcome the effect of the evidence produced by the plaintiff upon those points, and that the evidence as to the character and extent of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff did not justify the jury in awarding to him damages in no greater sum than $500. Thus the particulars in which the plaintiff claims that the verdict, so far as the amount of the damages allowed thereby was concerned, was not justified by the evidence were plainly pointed out and sufficiently so to enable the defendant to have inserted in the statement, if it could, evidence of which it might reasonably be said that the jury could reasonably and justly have concluded that the sum of $500 constituted fair and reasonable compensatory relief, and that the verdict was therefore justified. Besides, the witnesses who testified for the plaintiff upon the points mentioned are referred to in the specifications by name, and this was sufficient to inform the defendant and the court of the particular testimony which it was claimed showed that in the particulars referred to the evidence did not justify the verdict, and thus counsel for the defendant were given sufficient information to enable them to present in the statement any evidence which might rebut the specifications or show that they were not well founded. The form of the specifications is not to be commended, but we cannot say that the defendant was in any degree injured or suffered any disadvantage by the defects in the form in which the specifications are set forth. As was said in American Type, etc., Co. v. Packer, supra, the trial judge, who tried the case, had a decided advantage over this court in determining whether the specifications were sufficient for the purposes for which they are required.

[4] There is no substantial merit to the point that the plaintiff did not make a motion for a new trial. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was duly filed and served, and at the time fixed for the hearing of the motion, the attorney for the plaintiff, while not making a formal motion, or, in so many words, moving for a new trial, read to the court the notice of intention which, as the statute requires, designated the grounds upon which he intended to rely to support his motion. This was sufficient to apprise the court of the grounds of the motion. A formal motion could have accomplished no more. Indeed, it is difficult to perceive how it may reasonably be held that the reading to the court of a notice of intention to move for a new trial may not itself be said to constitute a formal motion. In effect, such a proceeding is in no respect lacking in the essentials of a formal motion. The notice of intention is a notice that the moving party proposes to apply to the trial court for a trial de novo. The reading of the notice to the court, at the time fixed for the hearing of the motion, cannot well be interpreted to mean anything but a proposal to execute the intention expressed in that notice.

The matter which is of primary importance, so far as the making of the motion is concerned, is to inform the court to which the motion is addressed of the grounds thereof, and the manner in which the moving party may convey such information to the court is a matter of minor importance. Of course, "he must, in some way," as the proposition is expressed in Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 100, 77 Pac. 762, 763, "inform the court what are the grounds of the motion, but this may be done as well by reference to some paper on file in the action, in which the grounds are stated, as by word of mouth," and when this is done court and counsel well know that the purpose of it is to carry out the intention expressed in the notice. This is all that should be required.

This disposes of all the objections urged upon this appeal against the legality of the action of the trial court in granting the plaintiff a new trial, and the order appealed from is, for the reasons herein given, affirmed.

RICH v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 1454.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 17, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 13, 1915.)

1. PARTITION ⇨73—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO—PROPERTY INCUMBERED BY MORTGAGES AND EXECUTORY CONTRACTS OF SALE.

Mortgagees and purchasers under executory contracts of sale cannot be deprived of their rights by decree of partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 196-208; Dec. Dig. ⇨73.]

2. PARTITION ⇨88—PROPERTY INCUMBERED BY MORTGAGES AND EXECUTORY CONTRACTS OF SALE—DECREE OF PARTITION—EFFECT.

A decree of partition of lands, subject to mortgages on separate and described portions and to executory contracts of sale of separate and specified portions, which declares that the mortgages and contracts are valid and subsisting liens, and which provides for the appointment of referees to make physical partition and allotment to plaintiff and defendant, according to their respective interests, and that the referees, in making partition, shall allot the share to each cotenant so as to embrace the improvements made by each on the property as previously ascertained and adjudged, but in so doing exclude the value of improvements made by each from the valuation in making allotments, and value the land without regard to improvements, does not impair the effect of the mortgages or contracts, and the referees must consider the existence and effect of the outstanding mortgages and contracts, and, when making partition, treat the particular parts and parcels of the common property covered by the mortgages and contracts as so many distinct estates, and separately partition them as such, and then allot them in severalty to one or the other of the cotenants, subject to the existence and satisfaction of the mortgage and contract liens, and the decree so construed is proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 254; Dec. Dig. ¶ 88.]

3. PARTITION ¶ 46 — NECESSARY PARTIES — MORTGAGEES AND EXECUTORY CONTRACT HOLDERS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 761, providing that, where lienholders are not made parties to an action for partition, the court must either order them to be made parties or appoint a referee to ascertain whether they have been paid, and, if not, what amount remains due, etc., mortgagees and purchasers in executory contracts of separate parcels of lands sought to be partitioned are necessary and proper parties to a suit for partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. ¶ 46.]

4. SUBROGATION ¶ 22 — RIGHT TO — PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE.

Where lands, incumbered by mortgages on separate parcels, are partitioned between the tenants in common, one of the tenants, who is later compelled to pay a mortgage debt, will be subrogated to the extent of the excess payment to the interests of the mortgagee, in a proceeding instituted for that purpose under Code Civ. Proc. § 709.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 48, 55, 59; Dec. Dig. ¶ 22.]

5. PARTITION ¶ 53 — EXECUTORY CONTRACTS OF SALE — RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Where lands, in part subject to executory contracts of sale of separate parcels, are partitioned, each parcel of the common estate covered by a contract of sale may be treated as a distinct estate and partitioned in severalty, subject to the condition of the contract, and, if the interested parties cannot agree to whom payments shall be made, the court, in aid of final judgment of partition, may appoint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, a receiver for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. ¶ 53.]

6. PARTITION ¶ 14 — RIGHT TO PARTITION.

A tenant in common, entitled as such to the possession of the land, has generally an absolute right to partition, and a partition cannot be denied either because of any supposed difficulty nor on the suggestion that the interest of cotenants will be promoted by a postponement thereof to secure a rise in value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. ¶ 14.]

11. PARTITION ¶ 87 — LIEN FOR PAYMENT BY TENANT IN COMMON.

The court partitioning land may charge the share of the common property awarded to a tenant in common with a lien for the payment of sums found to be due to the cotenant for advancements made for the benefit of the common property.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action for partition by George O. Rich against C. B. Smith and others, in which defendant Smith filed a cross-complaint. From an interlocutory judgment for partition, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall and Martin Stevens, both of San Francisco, for appellant. J. J. Lermen, of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, for respondent George O. Rich. Daniel A. Ryan and Louis V. Crowley, both of San Francisco, for respondents Wienke and others. A. Kincaid, of Redwood City, for respondents Hendrickson and others.

LENNON, P. J. In this action plaintiff's complaint prayed for partition of several tracts of land located in the county of San Mateo, which, as the complaint alleged, were owned and held by the plaintiff and the defendant Smith as tenants in common. Defendant M. A. Rich is the wife of the plaintiff, and she and the remaining defendants were made parties to the action under an allegation that they held liens upon the property by virtue of existing mortgages jointly executed by the plaintiff and the defendant

Smith upon certain separate parcels of the common property. The plaintiff's complaint showed further that he and the defendant Smith had entered into executory contracts of purchase and sale covering specific portions of the common property, which contracts were still extant and unexecuted, and that, as a consequence, the other parties thereto, the defendants Nye et al., claimed some interest in the property. Incidentally the plaintiff's complaint alleged that he, with the knowledge and consent of and at the specific instance and request of the defendant Smith, advanced and expended a sum of money aggregating $19,265.04 for the improvement of the common property, and paid out and advanced for the extinguishment of liens existing upon the common property the sum of $10,890.99 over and above certain sums of money advanced by Smith for the same purposes.

Answering the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant Smith denied the existence of the alleged tenancy in common, and alleged, in substance, that whatever interest he had in the property arose out of his rights as the exclusive owner of certain contracts to purchase the property, and that by virtue thereof he conveyed to the plaintiff the lands in controversy for the alleged purpose of carrying on and conducting a partnership business which had been previously entered into between him and the plaintiff for the purpose of ultimately buying and selling the lands in controversy. The answer of the defendant Smith admitted that he and the plaintiff had sold certain parts and parcels of the property, and in effect admitted the execution and existence of the mortgages and executory contracts referred to in the plaintiff's complaint.

The defendant Smith also filed a cross-complaint, in which the allegations of his answer were again set forth, coupled with other allegations, which tended to show a cause of action to quiet title, and one for damages claimed to have been suffered by him as a result of a claimed conspiracy against him entered into by the plaintiff and his wife, the defendant M. A. Rich.

The several parties who held outstanding mortgages and executory contracts of sale covering specified portions of the property appeared in the action, and prayed for appropriate relief.

Upon all of the issues thus raised, the court made its findings of fact, which, in so far as they relate to the points presented in support of the appeal, are to the effect that the plaintiff and the defendant Smith were the owners in fee as tenants in common and in the possession of and each entitled to an undivided one-half portion of all of the lands in suit, save and excepting, however, certain designated and described lands and parcels of the whole, which the plaintiff alleged and the court found had been sold by the plaintiff and said defendant prior to the institution of the action; that the plaintiff and defendant

Smith had made, executed, and delivered certain mortgages upon certain separate, designated, and described portions of the common property, upon which there remained due and unpaid on account of principal an aggregate balance of $38,879.82; that these mortgages constituted valid and subsisting liens upon such portions of the common property as were covered thereby, save as to certain parts or parcels separately described, which had been released from the lien of the mortgage; that the defendant Smith had made, executed, and delivered contracts of sale of certain separate and specified portions of the whole property to various persons, who were named in detail; that the defendants C. T. Nye and Leslie M. Cain held executory contracts of purchase and sale in force and effect from the plaintiff and defendant for the sale and purchase of certain designated lots which were portions of the whole property in controversy; that there were no liens or incumbrances on the common property sought to be partitioned, save and except those specifically referred to hereinabove; that the defendant M. A. Rich, the wife of the plaintiff, claimed an interest in the property in controversy under the Foley mortgage, which claim, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant Rich held of record in her name title to a one-half interest in said mortgage, was without any right whatsoever, because of the fact that the consideration for the transfer, namely, $1,778.93, was paid by the plaintiff for the use and benefit of the plaintiff and the defendant Smith; that on the 22d day of December, 1908, as alleged in the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant Smith made, executed, and delivered to one Nellie Cracknell a mortgage, covering all of a certain lot of land included within the common property, which was subsequently released by the executor of the estate of the mortgagee to the plaintiff upon the payment by him of the sum of $5,210, which payment was made for the benefit of the plaintiff and the defendant Smith. Finally the trial court found the facts with reference to the claimed advances of money by the plaintiff and defendant Smith for the benefit of certain of the common property to be substantially as alleged in the plaintiff's complaint; that no co-partnership existed between the plaintiff and the defendant Smith.

As conclusions of law from these findings the trial court declared that the plaintiff and the defendant Smith owned, as tenants in common, the property in controversy, excepting certain designated and described portions, in the proportion of an undivided one-half interest in each; that the defendant M. A. Rich had no claim or interest in any of the property; that partition of the property be made, subject to the outstanding and existing liens of the designated mortgages and executory contracts of sale; that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the portion of the property to be allotted to the defendant

Smith for one-half of the amount of $21,485.83, found to have been advanced and paid by the plaintiff for the benefit and improvement of the common property; that all of the lands found to be owned by the plaintiff and the defendant Smith, as tenants in common, can be partitioned according to the respective and ascertained rights of the interested parties, without prejudice to either or both.

An interlocutory decree in keeping with the findings of fact and conclusions of law was made and entered, which, after declaring the several mortgages and executory contracts of sale to be valid and subsisting liens, provided for the appointment of referees to make physical partition and allotment of the common property, which was specifically described, to the plaintiff and the defendant Smith according to their respective interests as found by the court and designated in the decree; that the referees, in making such partition, allot the share of each cotenant so as to embrace the improvements made by each of said cotenants upon the property as previously ascertained and adjudged, but in so doing to exclude the value of the improvements made by each of the tenants in common from the valuation in making said allotments, and value the land without regard to such improvements.

The appeal is by the defendant Smith alone from the interlocutory decree upon a certified record of all of the proceedings had in the lower court; and in support of the appeal the principal contention of the defendant Smith is that:

"The court was without any authority to order partition of the property in suit for the following reasons: (a) The existence of the mortgages found in the findings precludes the making of any partition. (b) The existence of the contracts for the sale of parts and portions of the property which were not completed precludes the making of any partition."

This contention seems to be based upon the theory that, because of the several subsisting mortgage and contract liens covering a portion of the property, actual physical partition was impossible; or, if possible, that the probable resulting inequities to one or both of the cotenants would be so manifest and grievous as to make an order for such partition rather than a sale of the property an abuse of the discretion vested in the trial court by the provisions of section 763 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention is in effect that the mortgagees and other incumbrancers are entitled, as a matter of legal right, to have the security for their respective liens kept intact upon each of the particular parcels of the whole property covered by the mortgage or called for by the executory contracts of sale; and that the order for their physical partition must necessarily result in dividing the debt and splitting the respective liens of the several incumbrancers.

[1-3] Undoubtedly the mortgagees and the parties to the subsisting executory contracts of sale could not be deprived of the right granted to them by their respective mortgages and contracts to look and resort wholly and solely to the particular pieces of property, originally mortgaged or contracted for in satisfaction of the mortgages or in execution of the contracts; and, if the decree in the present case called for anything to the contrary, it would certainly be subject to reversal upon the appeal of any or all of the aggrieved incumbrancers. But the decree entered in the present case does not, either expressly or impliedly, in any manner alter or impair the scope and effect of the security of the mortgages or the subject-matter of the contracts. On the contrary, the integrity of the several mortgage liens and contracts which the trial court found to be valid and subsisting is by implication and in express terms recognized and maintained by the decree. Counsel for the defendant Smith insists, nevertheless, that physical partition is impracticable, if not impossible, unless the decree directing the same contemplates and compels the splitting of the mortgage and contract liens. This must be done, it is said, because it cannot be ascertained where, in making specific allotments to the respective parties, the lines of physical division will be run. In other words, it is erroneously assumed that the referees selected and appointed to make the partition will and must treat all of the lands in controversy as a single tract, and then proceed to divide the same into two equal parts, quantity and quality considered, without regard to the existence of the outstanding mortgages and contracts. If this course were pursued, it certainly would result in a splitting of the security of the mortgages and the subject-matter of the contracts of sale, and could not be countenanced, for the reason that, aside from the inequalities that would be likely to accrue to one or both of the cotenants, it would seriously impair, if not utterly destroy, the respective obligations of the mortgages and the contracts of sale. Cummings v. Cummings, 73 Cal. 434, 17 Pac. 442; Green v. Arnold, 11 R. I. 364, 23 Am. Rep. 466; 1 Jones on Mortgages, § 706. That the interlocutory decree neither contemplates nor compels the method of partition suggested upon behalf of the defendant Smith is in a measure confirmed, if confirmation be needed, by the fact that the mortgagees and contract holders, who are necessary and proper parties to the proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 761), have not appealed. In our opinion, the decree contemplates that, in making physical partition, the referee shall consider the existence as well as the scope and effect of the outstanding mortgages and contracts of sale, and may, when making such partition, treat the particular parts and parcels of the common property covered by the mortgages and the contracts of sale as so many distinct estates, and separately partition them as such,

and then allot them in severalty to one or other of the cotenants, subject, however, to the existence and satisfaction of the mortgage and contract liens. There can be no valid objection to thus treating and disposing of the incumbered portions of the common property. Green v. Arnold, supra; Cheney v. Ricks, 168 Ill. 533, 48 N. E. 75.

[4] No objection to such method of partition has been suggested, save that, in the event of a foreclosure of any one or all of the mortgages, one or other of the cotenants may perchance be compelled to pay the mortgage debt in full. The answer to this objection is that, in the event that foreclosure proceedings become necessary by reason of the failure of the owners in severalty of the mortgaged property to contribute equally to the payment of the mortgage debt, then the particular owner who may be compelled to pay the entire debt will be rightfully and readily subrogated, to the extent of the excess payment, to the interests of the mortgagee in a proper proceeding instituted for that purpose. Code Civ. Proc. § 709; Quick v. Brenner, 101 Ind. 230.

[5] It is apparent that what might be done with the mortgage liens might likewise be done with the contracts of sale (that is to say, each parcel of the common estate which is covered by a contract of sale may be treated as a separate and distinct estate, and so partitioned in severalty, subject to the condition of the contract); and while at first blush there may appear to be some slight difficulty in dealing with the receipt of any moneys which may from time to time become due and payable under the terms of the contract, yet, upon second thought, it seems to us that, if the interested parties cannot agree as to whom such payments may be made, the court may, in aid of the final judgment of partition, appoint a receiver for that purpose, under the provisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which permits the appointment of a receiver in an action between parties jointly interested in any property or fund. High on Receivers (4th Ed.) p. 607.

[6] Before passing from this phase of the case, it should be noted that the defendant Smith alleged in his answer that a foreclosure sale of the mortgaged premises would result in a sacrifice of the property; and it was asserted and not disputed upon the oral argument that a partition by a sale of the entire property would result in the insolvency of both parties. In brief, it seems to be conceded by both parties that a partition by sale would prove disastrous; and therefore it may be safely assumed that this was the reason which prompted the lower court to exercise its discretion in favor of an order for physical partition. That this was so is further evidenced by the fact that the defendant Smith, while complaining of physical partition, still insists that, under all the pleaded and proven facts in the case, partition by sale should not be ordered, because of the grievous loss which result therefrom to both parties. It will thus be seen that the ultimate contention of the defendant Smith is that partition of any kind should be denied until such time as partition would result in the fullest profit to both parties.

This position is utterly untenable. Ordinarily, if the party seeking partition is shown to be a tenant in common, and as such entitled to the possession of the land sought to be partitioned, the right to partition is absolute, and cannot be denied, "either because of any supposed difficulty, nor on the suggestion that the interest of the cotenants will be promoted by refusing the application or temporarily postponing action, to secure the advantages to result from a rise in market values." 30 Cyc. 177, 178, 189.

[7] We are satisfied that the referees appointed to make partition may readily do so in keeping with our views as to the scope and effect of the interlocutory decree, without substantial injustice to either cotenant, and at the same time preserve the rights of the mortgagees and other incumbrancers, without diminution or entanglement. If, however, they fail to do so, objections to their report will afford ample remedy to the party claiming to be aggrieved thereby. Cheney v. Ricks, supra.

[8] The finding of the trial court that the plaintiff and the defendant Smith were tenants in common and not copartners in the land in controversy is, in our opinion, sufficiently sustained by the evidence adduced upon the whole case. The best that can be said in favor of the defendant Smith on this phase of the case is that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, which, of course, will not suffice to overthrow the findings.

[9, 10] There is no merit in the contention that the trial court awarded to plaintiff an interest in the "Wienke tract" greater than that to which the evidence showed him to be entitled. The court directed that one-half of that particular piece or parcel be allotted to the plaintiff and the defendant Smith, and, in our opinion, the evidence warrants and sustains such allotment. True, the contract between plaintiff and the defendant Smith, dated April 1, 1906, provided for a distribution in the proportion of one-third to two-thirds, respectively, to the plaintiff and the defendant Smith, of any and all the profits arising from the sale of the "Wienke tract"; but this contract was not conclusive evidence of the interest actually owned by each cotenant in that particular tract. There is other evidence upon this phase of the case to the effect that, some time after the making of the contract referred to, a deed to the "Wienke tract" was executed to the plaintiff and the defendant Smith by Wienke, which did not designate the portions conveyed to each grantee. Other evidence was to the effect that the plaintiff consented to the making and acceptance of such deed only after an understanding with the defendant Smith that they and each of them were to receive and own an undivided one-half of the tract conveyed by the deed. The latter evidence fortifies the presumption arising from the execution of the deed that, nothing to the contrary appearing therein, the plaintiff and the defendant Smith took the particular tract in question as tenants in common to the extent of an undivided one-half interest therein. 13 Cyc. 664, subd. "g." Therefore it cannot be said that the finding and award of the court with reference to the Wienke tract is not supported by any evidence.

[11] The contention that the trial court should not have made provision for charging the defendant Smith's share of the common property to be awarded to him upon partition, with a lien for the payment of the sums found to be due to the plaintiff for and on account of advancements made for the common benefit of the joint property, is answered, we think, by the opinion in the case of Willmon v. Koyer, 168 Cal. 369, 143 Pac. 694, where, in disposing of practically the same contention, the court said:

"The rule is that when one tenant in common has paid a debt or obligation for the benefit of the joint property, or has discharged a lien or assessment imposed upon it as a common burden, he is entitled, as a matter of right, to have his cotenant, who has received the benefit of it, refund to him his proportionate share of the amount paid. * * * The court decreed a partition and found that plaintiff had paid the expenditures claimed * * * that defendant was liable for one-half thereof, * * * gave judgment in favor of plaintiff therefor, and established the lien as prayed for. * * * It was an appropriate judgment to enter under the pleadings. In fact, it is always appropriate to do so in partition as the only effectual way to secure a cotenant making advances and obtaining judgment therefor."

See, also, Ventre v. Tiscornia, 23 Cal. App. 598, 138 Pac. 954.

[12] It is finally contended that there is no evidence upon which the court could base any conclusion as to the amount of the advances made by Rich over Smith. In this behalf the record shows the admission in evidence of two separate sets of books covering advances and expenditures made by each of the cotenants for the improvement of certain portions of the common property and the extinguishment of liens existing thereon. But it is asserted that these books were never balanced, and that therefore it could not be ascertained therefrom, with any degree of accuracy, the amount of the plaintiff's payments and advances over those of the defendant Smith.

Conceding that these books were never formally and finally balanced, nevertheless their contents were disclosed as a matter of evidence to the trial court, from which it will be presumed, nothing to the contrary appearing, that a balance of the account existing between the plaintiff and said defendant might be readily and rightfully made which would suffice as a foundation for a finding fixing the sum due to plaintiff for advancements made for the benefit of the common property over and above the advancements found to have been made by said defendant for the same purpose. Although stipulated to be a part of the record on appeal, the books did not accompany the record, and as a consequence are not before us. The books having been admitted in evidence upon the trial, the lower court presumably investigated them, and based its findings, in part at least, upon the result of its investigation. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed upon appeal that the contents of the books referred to justified and fully supported the findings of the trial court. Fay v. Fay, 165 Cal. 469, 132 Pac. 1040; Whitaker v. Moran, 23 Cal. App. 758, 139 Pac. 901.

But, even if it be conceded that a formal balancing of the books was necessary to an accurate understanding of the account existing between plaintiff and said defendant, the record shows that the books had been experted, and that the report of the expert, with the exception of certain designated items, was admitted in evidence, and that subsequently the plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, gave testimony which tended to establish the existence of certain disputed items in the account which the trial court held were not established by the report of the expert. Upon the whole, we are satisfied that the evidence sufficiently supports the finding last complained of.

This disposes of all the points made in support of the appeal, and, for the reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by John Fairbairn, by J. T. Fairbairn, guardian ad litem, against the American River Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. A. Redman and Chickering & Gregory, all of San Francisco (Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. Stanley Moore, of San Francisco, and Gibson & Woolner, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment for damages in an action for bodily injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The appeals are from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The alleged negligence of the defendant was the maintaining of a power line carrying a heavy current of electricity along a public road with the wires too close to the surface of the ground, and without covering the wires with insulating material, in consequence whereof the boom of a hay derrick, which the plaintiffs and others were passing under said wires to enter said road from a lane leading into it, came into close proximity to the wires and electricity therefrom passed down the boom cable into the body of the plaintiff, causing the injuries complained of. The defendant answered, denying the alleged negligence, and alleging that the injuries were caused by the plaintiff's negligence. We are of the opinion that the plaintiff failed to prove the alleged negligence of the defendant.

No evidence was offered to show that the power wires should or could have been insulated by a covering for that purpose. The only evidence on the subject of insulation was given in behalf of the defendant, to the effect that wires carrying over 20,000 volts of electricity could not be successfully insulated by any known covering; that if the wire

FAIRBAIRN v. AMERICAN RIVER ELECTRIC CO. (Sac. 2132.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 29, 1915
Rehearing Denied May 27, 1915.)

1. ELECTRICITY ¶14—INJURIES INCIDENT TO PRODUCTION AND USE—CARE REQUIRED.

One maintaining an electric power transmission line along or over a public or private carried more than 10,000 volts it was preferable to use bare wires; and that such was the invariable custom of electrical power companies. The defendant's line consisted of three wires carrying, at the time of the accident, 44,000 volts in all. This, according to the evidence, was the equivalent of a little over 25,000 volts to each wire.

[1] Owing to the highly destructive power of electricity when carried in quantities sufficient for power purposes, and to the fact that it is not visible to the eye or apparent to the other senses, a person or company maintaining an electric power transmission line along or over a public or private road is required to exercise a high degree of care in placing the wires so as not to interfere with traffic on the ordinary highway and so as to avoid contact with and injury to any person or object which may reasonably be expected to pass under the wires. Giraudi v. Electric I. Co., 107 Cal. 124, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114; Perham v. Portland E. Co., 33 Or. 478, 53 Pac. 14, 24, 40 L. R. A. 799, 72 Am. St. Rep. 730; Fitzgerald v. Edison, et al., Co., 200 Pa. 543, 50 Atl. 161, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732; Crosswell on Electricity, § 234.

"The companies are not insurers of the safety of the public against all dangers arising from the lawful placing in the street of appliances pertaining to the business carried on by them, but they are bound to know the danger which may naturally be caused by such use of the streets, and to guard against them by the exercise of all the foresight and caution which can be reasonably expected of prudent men, under the circumstances." 1 Joyce on Electricity, § 438; Denver v. Sherret, 88 Fed. 233, 31 C. C. A. 499.

"The degree of care required of such companies, under the rule that they must exercise reasonable care, varies according to the facts and circumstances of the case, having in view the serious results which may ensue as a consequence of negligence." 1 Joyce on Electricity, § 438a.

The standard to be attained is that of ordinary and reasonable care, and this means such care as a reasonably careful and prudent person, having in view the dangers to be avoided and the likelihood of injury therefrom, would exercise, under the circumstances, in order to prevent injury. Where death may be caused by an agency lawfully in use, ordinary care requires that every means known, or that with reasonable inquiry would be known, must be used to prevent it.

[2] There is some evidence to the effect that it is not a proper construction of such a power line to place the supporting poles 264 feet apart, and that aluminum wire is not as suitable for the purpose as copper wire. The span between the poles at the place of the accident was 264 feet and the wire was of aluminum. But the accident was not caused directly or indirectly by the length of the span, and there is no evidence that electricity escapes more readily from aluminum than from copper. Neither the length of the span, nor the kind of metal composing the wires, had any causal relation to the accident. The wires were in plain sight, the plaintiff and those with him at the time saw them, guessed at their height above ground, and were endeavoring to bring the top of the derrick boom under the wires without coming in contact with them. "The sole cause of the accident, according to the undisputed evidence, was the fact that the derrick boom, with the cable attached and connected therewith, came in contact with, or in close proximity to, the wires. The lowest wire at that point was only 27 feet 8¼ inches above the surface of the ground; the derrick boom, in place as it was when the accident happened, being but 2¾ inches lower. The defendant cannot be charged with negligence, therefore, unless, under the circumstances, the placing or maintaining of its wires at that height was negligence.

The defendant's power line was completed in 1906. It carried electricity from its water power plant in the mountains, eight miles from Placerville, to Stockton and other places in the San Joaquin county for distribution to public use. As above stated, the duty of the defendant, with respect to the height of the wires, where the line ran along or over a roadway, was to suspend them high enough to permit safe and unobstructed passage under them of all persons and things which could reasonably be expected to pass. In determining this question, it was required to make careful inquiry into the conditions and customs of the country penetrated by its lines and ascertain the height of objects which it could reasonably be expected might be transported into, along, or across the road over which its lines ran. The height of existing wires throughout the country where the conditions were similar to the territory penetrated by its line was proper for its consideration.

The evidence shows that, both in the neighborhood of this power line and elsewhere throughout California, the country is webbed with telephone wires passing over the highways at heights varying from 20 to 25 feet. It was shown that a large number of other power companies, some 17 or more, were maintaining power lines in California, several of them in the neighborhood of this line, and that the usual height of the wires of such companies above the ground was practically the same as those of the defendant; many of them being lower. On the Folsom road, one mile north of the Jackson road, on which the accident occurred, a power line had been maintained for some years with wires lower than those of the defendant. In some instances wires were placed higher for special reasons, as to carry them above interfering lines, but there is no evidence that it was ever considered necessary to go above 27 feet and 8 inches to accommodate traffic below. It is apparent from all these facts that the defendant had no reasonable cause to apprehend that the objects passing along, into, or across this road would be high enough to come into dangerous proximity to its wires placed at the height of 27 feet and 8 inches above the ground. No such object could get into many of the roads without difficulty, for the telephone wires, which were much lower than the defendant's wires, would prevent. We cannot perceive any lack of caution by defendant in fixing the altitude of its wires.

The boom of the derrick which the plaintiff was endeavoring to pass under the power wires extended 30 feet and 4 inches above the ground. It is contended by the plaintiff that in the country through which this power line extended there were many of these hay derricks which the owners might at any time have occasion to transport along or across the roads, and that the defendant should have ascertained this fact and have placed its wires high enough to avoid all dangerous proximity thereto. The evidence, however, does not support this contention. The accident happened in June, 1910. The owner of the derrick testified that he had lived on the land from which it was being taken ever since the year 1889, and that he had never known of any vehicle more than 20 feet high passing along the road in question, and that this derrick was the only one of the kind he had ever seen in Sacramento county. It was brought onto his farm in pieces and put up after arrival, and it had never been taken on or across any road. The manufacturer of these derricks testified that until 1909, some three years after the construction of defendant's line, he had never sold a derrick of that description in Sacramento county, and that he had, up to the date of the trial, sold but two such derricks for use in that county; that they had now gone out of use because the boom could not be lowered, and a different derrick was manufactured having what is called a "drop boom," which may be easily lowered. Homemade derricks were in use, but it is not shown that they were as high as these wires. There is no evidence upon which to predicate the conclusion that the defendant, by making inquiries at the time it erected its power line, could have ascertained or foreseen that some three or four years later persons would want to transport along the road derricks extending 30 feet above the surface of the ground. The failure to foresee such event cannot be held to establish negligence. On this ground, therefore, we think the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

The defendant also claims that the evidence shows contributory negligence by the plaintiff. It is admitted that plaintiff and those engaged with him knew that electricity from power wires was dangerous to human life and that the wires in question carried electricity to be used for power. The evidence shows that the derrick boom was by the plaintiff allowed to swing around toward the wires with but slight care to prevent it from coming in close proximity to them. The claim, on the plaintiff's behalf, is that he and those with him did not know that electricity from a heavily charged wire would jump or arc across a short intervening space into an adjacent metal conductor, and that they believed there would be no danger unless the boom plate actually touched one of the wires. The evidence as to their knowledge on this point is not very clear. As we have concluded that defendant's alleged negligence was not proven, and as the evidence regarding plaintiff's knowledge may be clearer or different on a new trial, we deem it advisable not to consider the question of contributory negligence. It is also unnecessary to consider the rulings on evidence, and the instructions given and assigned as error.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PENNINGTON v. GEORGE W. PENNINGTON SONS et al. (S. F. 7213.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 28, 1915. Rehearing Denied May 27, 1915.)

CORPORATIONS $\Leftrightarrow$ 194—ANNUAL MEETINGS—BY-LAWS.

The by-laws of a corporation, which provide that the annual meeting of stockholders may be held in the first week of a month in each year, and shall be called as the directors may direct, or, by notice by the president, delivered or mailed to each stockholder, provides for alternative methods for the calling of an annual meeting, but both are mandatory; and, where the directors fail to call an annual meeting, the president must do so.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by George W. Pennington against the George W. Pennington Sons and another, as president, and another, as secretary, of defendant named. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin L. Forster and Robert R. Moody, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The complaint in this action charged, and the court found, that George W. Pennington Sons is a corporation; that the number of directors of this corporation is five; that by death there is a vacancy on the board, and this vacancy has never been filled; that Thomas Pennington is the president of the corporation, and, though requested so to do by a majority of the stockholders, he has refused to call any meeting of the board of directors for the purpose of filling this vacancy, and he has also refused to call any meeting of the stockholders, though the written request of the holders of the majority of the issued and authorized capital stock has been made upon him, in conformity with the by-laws of the corporation. The by-laws in this respect provide:

"The annual meeting of the stockholders may be held in the first week of December in each year and shall be called as the directors may direct, or by a notice in writing by the president, delivered or mailed to each stockholder personally."

The judgment of the trial court directed the president to call a meeting of the stockholders as contemplated in this by-law.

Upon appeal it is argued that the by-laws do not enjoin the duty of calling such a meeting upon the president; that a mere permissive power so to do is vested with him; that the mandatory provision applies to the directors only. With this we cannot agree. Both the alternative methods provided are equally mandatory. It is in contemplation that there shall be an annual meeting of stockholders and that it shall be called. If the directors for any reason fail to do this, then it becomes the duty of the president so to do.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Suit by Lewis F. Byington and others against the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company and others. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for appellants. Stanley Moore, of San Francisco, and Ernest Weyand, of Colusa (A. A. Moore and Lewis F. Byington, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment by all of the defendants except those sued by fictitious names.

Plaintiffs are the owners of agricultural lands located within the boundaries of Central irrigation district, and, as they assert in their complaint, their property is susceptible of irrigation from the common source and system of irrigation controlled by certain of the defendants, particularly Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company and Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company, although they admit that it will take more than a year to extend the canal of the former corporation from Maxwell, its present terminus, to and beyond the town of Williams, so that the water will be brought into proximity to their lands. Williams is about 10 miles south of Maxwell.

After trial the court made elaborate findings and decreed that the waters taken by defendants from the Sacramento river were and are appropriated to a public use; that the area for the benefit of which said waters are appropriated is the land within Central irrigation district; that the farms of plaintiffs are within that area; that plaintiffs own an estate and interest in said appropriation, and their lands are entitled to water for irrigation either at a rate voluntarily agreed upon by the parties or fixed by the Board of Supervisors of Colusa county; that defendants are not entitled to convey water outside of the place of intended use and area for which said water was appropriated and (to quote from the decree itself):

"They are not entitled to irrigate lands outside said area, or furnish water for the irrigation thereof, until the requirements for the irrigation of the lands of plaintiffs have been fully met and provided for, and the defendants, and neither of them, are entitled to sell water rights upon lands inside or outside said area or place of intended use, until plaintiffs' requirements are fully met and provided for."

The findings contain a history of the attempt to furnish a system of irrigation for the west side of the Sacramento Valley beginning with the formation of the Central irrigation district in 1887. The district contains 156,000 acres of land. The towns of Williams and Maxwell and the surrounding territory, including the holdings of plaintiffs, are within this acreage. The purpose and plan of the district was to irrigate the lands therein by water to be taken from the Sacramento river and conveyed through a canal to be something more than 61 miles in length. In 1890 and the two following years the canal was dug for a distance of about 40 miles, the section excavated commencing near the point of intended diversion on the Sacramento river in Glenn county, about a quarter of a mile from the intersection of the river by the boundary line between Glenn and Tehama counties, and running thence southerly through the lands of the district to Maxwell. No further excavation was done until after January, 1903. In December, 1902, the board of directors of the Central irrigation district, claiming to be proceeding in accordance with the Irrigation District Act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 815), amendatory of the act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254), decided to lease the properties of the district; and in the early part of 1903 a lease was executed between the Central irrigation district and Willard M. Sheldon, by the terms of which the lessee agreed to complete the canal for its entire length, together with all distributing canals, and to acquire all necessary water rights, and to sell and distribute water to the owners of all of the lands in said district for the irrigation of said lands. The term of the lease was 50 years, and the rental was $50 per year. Sheldon assigned this lease to Central Canal & Irrigation Company in February, 1903, and in the following years, to and including 1908, considerable work was done by that corporation, including the extension of the canal to the Sacramento river. In 1906, Central Canal & Irrigation Company obtained from Congress the right to divert and appropriate 900 cubic feet of water per second from the Sacramento river at the point of intake of the Central canal for the irrigation of all the lands of Central irrigation district. The court found also that the right to divert and appropriate this water from a navigable stream was obtained by the corporation "in pursuance with the covenants and conditions" of the lease "and for the purpose of enabling it to distribute, sell and supply water to all the lands within said district." There was also a finding that:

"Said right was granted by Congress for the public purpose and use of selling and distributing water for irrigating purposes to all the landowners and lands within the district."

In 1909, Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company obtained an assignment of the lease, and in July of that year transferred it to Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, a subsidiary corporation, a majority of the stock of which is owned by the irrigation company.

The lease is set out in the findings, and the court finds that under it the West Side Company is obligated to sell water for the lands of plaintiffs; that defendants are estopped from denying the de facto existence of the Central irrigation district; and that they are estopped also from denying the operative portions of the lease. It is also found that the two allied corporations are successors of the original appropriation of water for the Central irrigation district; that said original appropriation was for a public use; that the Central canal is dedicated to a public use; and that the lease was intended to carry out the public use of selling and distributing water for irrigation to the lands in Central irrigation district.

The findings further recite that Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company owns more than 80,000 acres of land in Central irrigation district; that the corporation entertains the purpose of buying substantially all of the land in the district and reselling it with "water rights" exclusively attached thereto. It is found that in pursuance of this plan the two companies have agreed and announced that the West Side Company will not sell water for irrigation of any lands within the district not now owned or hereafter acquired by the irrigation company, except that the West Side Company further states it will not irrigate any other lands whatsoever unless a water right is purchased for such tracts at a rate to be fixed by it at not less than $75 per acre; that the West Side Company also asserts that it intends to make use of all the water available from the Sacramento river for the irrigation of the land owned by the Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company, or to be acquired by that corporation within or outside of the Central irrigation district. And it is also found that:

"The Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company is now delivering to the purchasers of lands from the Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company alleged water rights to the entire exclusion of the plaintiffs and which water rights purport to vest in the purchasers of said lands a right to the proportion of all of said water to be derived from said river measured and divided only by the rights of other purchasers of land from said Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company and purchasers of water rights, if any, from said Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, at not less than $75 per acre."

Appellants insist that plaintiffs have no estate in the water by derangement through the lease, and that they are therefore entitled to no decree quieting their title or providing injunctive relief. In this behalf they assert that the irrigation district had no existence, either de jure or de facto, when the lease was executed in 1903. Respondents admit this claim to be correct so far as the formal organization of the district was concerned, because it was held by this court (In re Central Irrigation District, 117 Cal. 382, 49 Pac. 354) that the proceedings by which it was sought to organize the district were illegal and void; but respondents say that the district had a very substantial de facto existence. Appellants call our attention to the fact that, after the decision of this court cited above, the matter went back to the superior court for hearing, and that a judgment, in which the Central district and its officers acquiesced, was entered, pronouncing all proceedings in the formation of the said district void. This was in the year before the lease to Sheldon was executed, and it is argued that having acquiesced, by failure to appeal, in the judgment that its organization was a nullity, the district might not later assume any functions of an irrigation district, and that in the execution of the lease the district was acting without color of law. Consequently, say appellants, the lessor was not a corporation de facto. The appellants also are of the opinion that the alleged officers of the district being bound by a judgment in rem might not presume to act in an official capacity in making the lease, and that therefore all of their acts in the premises were void. In support of this view they cite People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Cal. 482, 61 Pac. 86. That case did not determine so much as appellants attribute to it. This court there held that a decree under the proceeding prescribed by the confirmatory act would be conclusive evidence against an attempt by the state to relitigate the question of the regular formation of the district by a proceeding in quo warranto.

[1] A judgment in such a proceeding, declaring that the district was not legally organized, may be conclusive of that question and dissolve it as a de jure corporation; but it does not preclude the subsequent existence of a de facto district assuming to exercise the same powers. Persons may thereafter transact the ordinary business theretofore done by the supposed district, acting in the same manner and under the same name, even after a decree, final in its force, declaring the previous proceedings for the formation of a district to have been irregular and of no legal effect, and, if they do so, the organization so carried on may have the status of a de facto corporation. This was decided in Haese v. Heitzeg, 159 Cal. 574, 114 Pac. 816, where it was held that, notwithstanding a decree in confirmation proceedings under the irrigation act, declaring a district illegally organized and its bonds void, if persons assuming to be the officers of such district continue in good faith to close up its affairs, they would thereby constitute themselves a de facto irrigation district for that purpose. This de facto Central irrigation district, constituted in a similar manner, was sufficiently vital to transfer and deliver to Sheldon property worth many thousands of dollars, which had been acquired for the very public use of which the plaintiffs would have been beneficiaries if the district had been legally organized in the first place, and this property has since been used by the Sacramento West Side Canal Company, as Sheldon's successor, in the development of the irrigation system in the benefits of which the plaintiffs are here claiming the right to participate.

[2] Under these circumstances, we think the acts of said company should be held to be a continuance of the original dedication, that the water rights acquired in pursuance of the lease of the so-called district to Sheldon should be deemed a part of the system, that the lands within the bounds of the original Central irrigation district constitute the primary territory to which the original public use extends and continues, and, that, when demanded, such lands must be served with water from the system, before it can lawfully be taken for use upon outside lands.

[3] Occupying, as it does, the relation of tenant under the assigned lease, the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company is estopped from denying the validity of the title under which it took possession of the demised premises. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 682. While admitting the rule that ordinarily a tenant is estopped from denying the title of the lessor, the appellants insist that they are not bound by the contract of lease, and that plaintiffs may enjoy no rights thereunder because the act of the Legislature authorizing such leases was unconstitutional and the lease was ultra vires as against public policy and void.

[4] While it is true that a quasi public corporation—one, for example, engaged in supplying water for a public use—may not, without legislative sanction, transfer all of its property to another (Visalia Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Sims, 104 Cal. 328, 37 Pac. 1042, 43 Am. St. Rep. 105; Central Transportation Co. v. Pullman P. P. Co., 139 U. S. 59, 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55; Anglo American Land Co. v. Lombard, 132 Fed. 737, 68 C. C. A. 89), under legislative authority such a corporation may transfer its property and its franchises, subject to the right of all persons to whose use the water is appropriated or dedicated, to have the supply continued by the transferee or lessee (South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 587, 93 Pac. 490).

[5] We see no reason why the enabling statute of 1901, permitting the board of directors of an irrigation district to lease the system of canals and works, should be held unconstitutional. The act provides that:

"Such lease shall in no way interfere with any rights that may have been established by law at the time such lease was made."

Manifestly any lease would carry that burden to the lessee, for the statute would be read into the lease. The enabling act does not conflict with section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution, because it does not purport to delegate to any private corporation any municipal function. The right to the use of water appropriated to the public may be enforced by one of the community or class entitled to its enjoyment, regardless of the title. The delivery of water dedicated to public use is not necessarily a municipal function. Such use may be administered by a natural person, or by a private corporation. Being therefore the successor of the irrigation district and being a public service corporation, the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company is bound by the terms of the original lease and may not question the power of the lessor to enter into that agreement. Fellows v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 64, 90 Pac. 137.

[6] Part of the consideration for the lease was the promise of the lessee to complete the canal. Plaintiffs assert that they are entitled to protect themselves by resort to a court of equity from the dissipation of their rights before the water shall be conducted to a place near their property; from the sale of water outside the district for which it was appropriated; and from the creation of preferential classes who will dispute with them their title to the water which they have as residents of the district. Appellants, on the contrary, take the position that the owners of land near Williams must wait until the extension of the canal and then enforce their rights, if any they have, by mandamus. They cite in support of that contention such cases as Cozzens v. North Fork Ditch Co., 2 Cal. App. 405, 84 Pac. 342; South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., supra; and Orcutt v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 600, 93 Pac. 497. Unquestionably in those cases it was held that a right to take water may be exercised only by one whose lands are within the flow of the ditches of the person or corporation bound to supply it, and that mandamus is the proper method of enforcing the demand of those who have been denied their rights. But a court of equity may entertain an action to quiet title to water not immediately available and may grant appropriate relief. Code Civ. Proc., § 738; Wiel on Water Rights (3d Ed.) § 654; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 120, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35. In the case of Inyo Consolidated Water Co. v. Jess, 161 Cal. 520, 119 Pac. 934, it is declared that one may protect his "incipient right" to water against hostile invasions and claims of others. And the same doctrine is announced in the later case of Merritt v. City of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 50, 120 Pac. 1064. So here the plaintiffs may safeguard their rights, although no water has, as yet, been brought into close proximity to their lands.

[7] Appellants try to bring themselves within the rules and principles declared in Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 125, 128 Pac. 21. In that case it was held that the water right which a person gains by diversion from a stream for a beneficial use is a private right and the water may not be demanded by the general public on payment of the legal fees until some act of dedication establishes the public use. Under the facts of that case, it was held that the California Development Company had not dedicated the water in its irrigating system to a public use and that it might select and sell water to a class of consumers to the exclusion of others not belonging to that class. The facts in this case are altogether different. The properties of the district leased to Sheldon had been held by a quasi public corporation for public use. Sheldon took them subject to that use. He assigned to the Central Canal & Irrigation Company, a public service corporation (admittedly such because it is so alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer). The Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company (bound by similar admission) is a public service corporation. Both companies by their articles of incorporation are permitted to engage in the business of purveying water. At the trial it was proven that the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company in developing the system of irrigation canals and ditches had prosecuted suits in eminent domain. This shows that it was a public service corporation. Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 138, 128 Pac. 21; State ex rel. Wood v. Consumers Gas Trust Co., 157 Ind. 345, 61 N. E. 674, 55 L. R. A. 245; Morawetz on Private Corporations (2d Ed.) § 1129. Such a company may not confer such preferential rights as the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company and the Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company are seeking to bestow upon purchasers of land from the latter, because, as was said in Leavitt v. Lassen Irrig-

"The fundamental and all-important proposition, then, is this: That a public service water company which is appropriating water under the Constitution of 1879, for purposes of rental, distribution, and sale, cannot confer upon a consumer any preferential right to the use of any part of its water."

Appellants introduced in evidence several notices of appropriation. It is argued that any violation of the promised development outlined in these notices and any failure to comply with the rules of diligent construction merely entails upon the failing appropriators a forfeiture of their right as against a subsequent claimant (section 1419, Civil Code), and that the decree of the superior court imposing a much greater penalty was beyond its power. But the plaintiffs were not by their bill asking for relief because of a mere failure to extend the irrigation system in conformity with any notice of appropriation. They were trying to prevent the defendants from subverting water intended for a public use to private and extraterritorial purposes. It is evident that the West Side Canal Company was relying on the permission given by Congress to take water from the river and not upon the various notices introduced in evidence, because in its condemnation complaints it is alleged to be the owner of "the right to take and divert from the waters of said Sacramento river, nine hundred cubic feet per second at all seasons of the year."

Plaintiffs are not seeking to compel a spreading out of an insufficient supply of water over a large territory merely because it is mentioned in any notice of appropriation. Therefore the discussion in Palmer v. Railroad Commission, 167 Cal. 174, 138 Pac. 997, cited by appellants, is of no value here. The quantum of water available to the West Side Canal Company was not an issue in the case. The plaintiffs were seeking to prevent the creation of adverse claims to water which would embarrass and disadvantage them when the successors of Sheldon, under their contract and in accordance therewith should (as the court found they intended to do) extend their canal and laterals to a place convenient for serving water to the complaining farmers. This is all that the decree seeks to accomplish.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte CAPLES. (Cr. 379.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 18, 1915.)

ARREST $\S$ 29—CIVIL ACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 479, authorizing an arrest on civil process where the defendant is about to depart from the state with intent to defraud his creditors, and section 481, providing that the order for arrest may be made when it appears by affidavit that a sufficient cause of action exists, and that the affidavit must be either positive or upon information and belief, an affidavit, following the statute, alleging fraud in obtaining money on a note, that defendant had no fixed place of business in the state, and was about to leave with the intent to defraud his creditors, was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 64-68; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 29.]

In the matter of the application of William J. Caples for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Earl Rogers, W. H. Dehm, and Milton M. Cohen, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Avery & French, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner herein was arrested on civil process. One Gamage brought suit against him, based upon an alleged indebtedness in the sum of $650, evidenced by a promissory note. Upon the commencement of that action the plaintiff filed in the superior court an affidavit setting forth facts upon which he claimed the right to have an order made for the arrest of the defendant, this petitioner. That affidavit first set out facts showing the cause of action existing in behalf of the affiant, and then contained this recitation:

"That said defendant obtained this sum of $650 from this payee mentioned in said note upon the false and fraudulent representation that he had an interest in an estate in Texas and would send for and obtain said money to pay said note; that he has never done so, and has not paid said note, or any portion thereof, either principal or interest; that defendant has no fixed place of business in California, and is temporarily here, and is about to leave the state of California, and with the intent to defraud his creditors in this state, and to return to Texas."

The contention of petitioner is that, as arrests may be made on civil process only in cases of fraud, such fraud is not shown by the recitations in this affidavit. Section 479, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an arrest may be made in such a case "when the defendant it about to depart from the state with intent to defraud his creditors." Section 481 of the same Code provides that the order may be made whenever it appears to the judge, by the affidavit of the plaintiff or some other person, that a sufficient cause of action exists, and that the case comes within the provisions of section 479, above cited. It is then provided that:

"The affidavit must be either positive or upon information and belief; and when upon information and belief, it must state the facts upon which the information and belief are founded."

If it appears from the affidavit that the defendant is about to depart from the state with intent to defraud his creditors, a sufficient case is made out to warrant his arrest.

As to whether the facts constituting the evidence from which the conclusion is to be deduced as to the intent of the defendant in that regard need be stated, we think our Supreme Court has answered that question very plainly. A careful consideration of Ex parte Fukumoto, 120 Cal. 316, 52 Pac. 726, and Fukumoto v. Marsh, 130 Cal. 66, 62 Pac. 303, 509, 80 Am. St. Rep. 73, requires that the affidavit in this matter be held sufficient in substance. The effect of the decisions cited is to hold that the party making the affidavit upon which an order of arrest in a civil action is asked may follow the statute and declare in positive terms that the defendant is about to depart from the state with intent to defraud his creditors, or he may set up the facts which will warrant the judge in concluding such to be the intent of the defendant. In either case the affidavit will be held sufficient.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by R. D. List against the La Verne Irrigating Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Fregean, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Lloyd, Hunt, Cheney & Geibel and Lloyd, Cheney & Geibel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to quiet title. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The defendant admits that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to possession of the real property described in the complaint, save and except as to a certain strip of land 20 feet in width extending across plaintiff's land. The defendant claims that it is, and ever since the month of May, 1906, has been, the owner of said strip of land for the purpose of maintaining thereon a pipe line connected with its system of irrigation. This claim of the defendant is based upon the alleged fact that, with full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff and his then co-owner of said land, the defendant entered thereon under a license given by the owners for that purpose, and expended large sums of money or the equivalent thereof in labor in execution of its rights under said license.

[1,2] No written permission, license, or easement is claimed to have been given. Two witnesses for the defendant testified that in May, 1906, they had conversations with Mr. List and his co-owner, Mr. Gafford, in regard to obtaining a right of way across the land for this pipe line; that permission was given therefor; that after obtaining such permission they proceeded to expend upon the construction of the pipe line across plaintiff's land the sum of about $300, and several thousand dollars more upon other and connected portions of the system. The witness Gafford in his deposition denies that he made any such statements as those attributed to him by defendant's witnesses, and the plaintiff in his testimony makes the same denial, and further testifies that he had no knowledge of the existence of this pipe line across his premises until some time after its construction, when certain leakages therein led to his discovery that the pipe line was there. The court having found with the plaintiff as to these controverted facts, we must take it as a fact in the case that no license was given, and that no expenditures were made in reliance thereon. This being so, the decisions relied upon in the brief of defendant's counsel have no application to this case, and the defendant is left without any foundation for its claim.

No other ground for reversal than that above stated has been argued in appellant's brief.

The judgment and the order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

HENRY COWELL LIME & CEMENT CO.
v. FIGEL et al. (Civ. 1316.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨71—ORDERS APPEALABLE—ORDER DENYING SALE OF ATTACHED PROPERTY.

An order denying a motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 548, by plaintiff in attachment for a sale of attached perishable property, is not appealable within section 939, enumerating appealable orders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 386-401; Dec. Dig. ⇨71.]

2. ATTACHMENT ⇨198—SALE OF PERISHABLE PROPERTY ATTACHED—PROCEEDINGS TO OBTAIN SALE.

A party, desiring the sale of perishable property attached, may proceed under Code Civ. Proc. § 548, providing that when property has been taken under an attachment, the court to subserve the interests of the parties, may order a sale, though section 547 requires the sheriff without order to sell perishable property so seized, and though, where the officer fails to sell, he may be compelled, by proper process, to sell.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company against Fred H. Figel and another. From an order denying an application of plaintiff for the sale of perishable attached property, he appeals. Dismissed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. Will M. Beggs, R. C. McComish, and Arthur M. Free, all of San Jose, for respondents.

HART, J. The court below denied the motion of the plaintiff for an order directing the sale, by virtue of the provisions of section 547 of the Code of Civil Procedure, of certain personal property, which the sheriff had levied upon and seized under a writ of attachment issued in this action. This appeal is from the order denying the application for the sale of the property.

The motion was made upon the affidavit by one of the attorneys for the plaintiff and upon the testimony of 11 witnesses taken and heard on behalf of the plaintiff. No part of the testimony so taken is presented in the record on this appeal.

The affidavit above mentioned states, however: That a writ of attachment was "duly and regularly issued in the above-entitled cause," and the same delivered to the sheriff of Santa Clara county. That thereupon said sheriff—

"duly and regularly levied said attachment upon certain goods situated in a certain warehouse. * * * That said goods, wares, and merchandise, among other things, consist of certain cement * * * and certain lime and plaster. That the said cement is in sacks in said warehouse, and that said cement is perishable in this: That when said cement is kept in sacks the cement absorbs moisture from the air and becomes hard and unfit for use. * * * That said lime is in sacks in said warehouse, and that when the same is kept in sacks for any considerable length of time, the same slakes and becomes unfit for use, and that therefore all of said cement, lime, and plaster is perishable property."

The following facts were admitted at the hearing: That the plaintiff commenced this action on the 31st day of March, 1911, and on the same day the sheriff levied a writ of attachment upon 1,616 sacks of Mt. Diablo cement, which were stored in the warehouse of the defendant, Figel; that said Figel was a dealer in lime and cement in the city of San Jose, and maintained said warehouse, to which his patrons had access and in which were stored, "at the time herein mentioned," various bags of cement belonging to other persons, the patrons of said Figel; that previous to the issuance and levy of said writ of attachment, the county of Santa Clara had purchased from the said Figel 1,138 sacks of the said Mt. Diablo cement, "and at the time of the levy of said attachment the said last-named sacks of cement had been segregated from the remainder thereof, and that there had been placed thereon a placard bearing the words, 'Property of the county of Santa Clara.'"

It appears that one of the issues presented at the hearing of the motion was whether the purported sale of certain of the cement levied upon by the sheriff to the county of Santa Clara constituted an actual sale, or a sale that would stand as against the creditors of the vendor, it being made to appear that, although the county of Santa Clara claimed to have purchased said cement and had it segregated or set apart from other lots of cement contained in the warehouse of the defendant, Figel, said lot of cement so purchased remained in said warehouse and was never removed therefrom by the purchaser. Section 3440, Civ. Code. And this is the only question discussed in the opening brief of counsel for the plaintiff; their contention being that the admitted facts show that there was no actual and immediate delivery of the cement by the vendor to the vendee, followed by an actual and continued change of possession thereof.

[1, 2] Counsel for Figel, in their reply brief, besides urging the contention that the facts disclose an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of the possession of the cement, make the further point that the appellant is not a person entitled to challenge the transfer. But in their oral argument, which has been printed and filed herein in the form of a brief, they, for the first time, raise the point that the order from which this appeal is taken is not appealable. This proposition appears to be sound, and this court is therefore without jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. The proceeding in which the order appealed from was made is based upon section 548 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in part, provides:

"Whenever property has been taken by an officer under a writ of attachment, and it is made to appear satisfactorily to the court or judge thereof that the interest of the parties to the action will be subserved by a sale thereof, the court or judge may order such property to be sold in the same manner as property is sold under an execution, and the proceeds to be deposited in the court to abide the judgment in the action."

Although section 547 of the same Code makes it the duty of the sheriff, without an order from the court or judge, to sell property of a perishable character, which has been levied upon and seized by him under a writ of attachment, and that officer could, if he failed in that duty, be compelled by proper process to perform it, yet it is doubtless the correct practice for the parties to proceed, if they so desire, under section 548 in a case where the property attached may be shown to be of a perishable nature, and upon such showing be entitled to an order directing its sale, since, obviously the sale of property of that character would certainly be to subserve the interest of the parties to the action. But in providing the mode sanctioned by section 548 for procuring the sale of attached property in cases where it may be shown that such sale will subserve the interest of the parties to the action, the Legislature seems to have conceived it to be proper to make the decision of the trial court or judge upon the question of the propriety of ordering such sale final and conclusive, for no appeal from such an order has been provided for.

The order appealed from here was made before final judgment, and, indeed, it is not one which it is contemplated should be made after final judgment, for, if the plaintiff should prevail in the action, the property attached, if not already sold by the sheriff, would necessarily have to be sold to satisfy the judgment; and, on the other hand, if the defendant should prevail in the action, then there would be no necessity and, indeed, no authority for the sale of the property. And the order is not among the appealable orders enumerated in section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It certainly cannot be treated or regarded as a final judgment in the sense that an appeal will lie therefrom, for the proceeding in which it is applied for and made is merely ancillary to or in aid of the main relief sought to be enforced in an action for the recovery of a money judgment. It is merely a summary proceeding designed for the preservation of the efficacy of the attachment, and in authorizing it the Legislature proceeded upon the theory that the court or judge below will adopt such a course in such case as will make the lien of the attachment effective in the event that its enforcement becomes necessary.

It may be remarked that the manifest inutility of an appeal from such an order when made in a proceeding involving, as here (according to the allegations of the plaintiff's affidavit), property of a perishable nature would be a sufficient reason for the denial by the Legislature of an appeal from such order; for obviously in such case the questions involved would become moot long before the appeal could be heard and disposed of because of the destruction, practically, of the subject-matter of the controversy. However, the right of appeal is statutory, and where, as is plainly true here, no appeal is expressly authorized in any case, then obviously none will lie therein.

The appeal from the order is dismissed.

SPINKS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 1701.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 18, 1915.)

COSTS ⇨48—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, provides that an action may be dismissed by the plaintiff, by written request to the clerk at any time before trial, upon payment of his costs, provided no counterclaim has been set up. Section 1024 gives to a defendant the right to collect costs as a matter of course upon judgment in his favor. Held, that a defendant is entitled to costs where before trial plaintiff dismissed the action; the dismissal being a judgment in his favor.

Petition by M. E. Spinks for writ of mandate against the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Hon. J. P. Wood, Judge thereof. Petition granted.

G. Harold Janeway and Hunsaker & Britt, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Oliver O. Clark and George M. Pierson, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Petition for mandate to compel the superior court to proceed with a hearing on contempt. The petition shows: That an action was commenced in November, 1913, by a corporation, against the plaintiff, wherein damages were claimed in the sum of $1,600,000. That thereafter a second amended complaint was filed and petitioner made his verified answer thereto, and September 22, 1914, was set as the day for the trial of the issues thus made up. That on the day immediately preceding the day set for trial the plaintiff in that action filed with the clerk a direction that the suit be dismissed, and the clerk made an entry in the register of actions, noting that the action was dismissed and the order filed. That within five days thereafter petitioner, as the defendant in that action, filed his memorandum of costs, which amounted to $69, and the court thereafter gave judgment in his favor for the amount of said costs. Execution for the collection of the amount of this judgment having been returned unsatisfied, the petitioner had proceedings instituted to have the matter of the ability of the corporation to pay investigated, and for that purpose obtained an order for the examination of the president and secretary thereof. That these persons appeared before the court and gave testimony, and thereupon the court made an order requiring said persons, as president and secretary of the judgment debtor corporation, to permit petitioner or his attorney or agent to examine the corporate books and records; that the president and secretary refused to comply with this order, and thereupon a citation was secured requiring them to appear in court and show cause why they should not be held answerable as for a contempt. That upon the latter hearing being had, objection was made on the part of the corporation debtor that the judgment of the court was void upon its face, in that there was no authority in the court after dismissal made by the clerk to enter any judgment for costs. That this contention was sustained and the contempt proceedings dismissed. By the writ here sought petitioner asks that the superior court be required to proceed and consider the charge of contempt against the president and secretary of the corporation mentioned. A demurrer was interposed to the petition and the matter has been submitted upon the issue of law thus raised. The sole question involved is as to whether, where plaintiff in an action exercises his right to dismiss, in those cases where the Code provides that he may do so by filing a request with the clerk, the opposite party is entitled to recover the costs that he may have incurred. Section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an action may be dismissed:

"1. By the plaintiff himself, by written request to the clerk, filed with the papers in the case, at any time before the trial, upon payment of his costs; provided a counterclaim has not been set up, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant. * * *

Section 1024 of the same Code gives to a defendant the right to collect costs incurred by him, as of course, "upon a judgment in his favor," in certain classes of actions of which that here involved was one. It has been held that the costs, referred to in section 581 as being required to be paid by the plaintiff when he files his dismissal with the clerk, are only the costs of entering the order of dismissal. Kaufman v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 152, 46 Pac. 904; Todhunter v. Klemmer, 134 Cal. 60, 66 Pac. 75. This provision of the section so construed, respondent insists, furnishes the whole measure of its liability upon the dismissal of the action. On the other hand, the petitioner asserts that a dismissal so made does not interfere at all with his right to have a judgment following it entered, as he did, which would secure to him the expenses incurred in the action, and which were in their nature proper costs. We are in complete accord with this contention, and think that it proposes but a fair and reasonable construction for the statute. The dismissal as entered by the clerk upon the application of a plaintiff in such cases determines that action in favor of the opposite party; that suit is then forever ended. While the matter of the recovery of costs is one which rests wholly upon the authority of the statutes, it cannot be contemplated that the Legislature, having provided authority and means for the securing of costs to litigants, intended to leave a defendant remediless against a plaintiff who chose to bring an action and put a defendant to great costs in preparing to meet the same and then dismiss the suit. This case is a typical illustration of the hardship which might result. Here the plaintiff filed several complaints, defendant made his verified answer, and proceedings were had to set the case for trial. Then, on the day before the trial was to take place, plaintiff appears at the clerk's office and dismisses its action. The defendant presumably prepared himself for the trial and subpoenaed his witnesses on the assumption that the plaintiff would proceed at the time regularly set. A construction of the statute which will allow the recovery of costs in such cases is one that will appeal to the sense of fairness and justice of every one, and is the one which we will assume the Legislature intended should be given to its declarations upon that subject. While the language may be taken as dictum, our Supreme Court, in the case of Hopkins v. Superior Court, 136 Cal. 552, 69 Pac. 299, has given an intimation in favor of a defendant's right to recover costs in this kind of a case. It is there said that the clerk in entering a dismissal cannot settle a cost bill, and this language follows:

"The utmost of a defendant's right under the circumstances is to present his cost bill in due time after dismissal to have it settled, and take judgment for his costs against plaintiff accordingly."

We are of the opinion that the writ should issue.

Peremptory writ of mandate is ordered to be issued in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION §117 — FINDINGS OF ADVERSE POSSESSION.

A finding, in an action for the recovery of land and damages for use and detention thereof, that plaintiff had peaceable, adverse, and uninterrupted possession of the property from 1903 to 1911, paying taxes thereon during the eight years mentioned, is not a finding of title by adverse possession, within Code Civ. Proc. § 325, defining the elements of adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. A. Nichols, otherwise known as Luthera Nichols, against B. F. Wolf and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hammack & Hammack, of Los Angeles, for appellants. R. F. Cook, of Ft. Worth, Tex., and Morton, Hollzer & Morton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is a controversy over the title to a strip of land on the southerly side of a larger tract described in the complaint. The complaint alleged that on March 1, 1912, while the plaintiff was seised and in possession and entitled to the possession of the entire parcel described, the defendants, without right or title, entered upon that portion thereof constituting the premises demanded herein and ousted and ejected plaintiff therefrom and now unlawfully withhold the possession from plaintiff, to her damage in the sum of $150. By their answer defendants denied plaintiff's alleged title, possession, and right of possession, denied that, while plaintiff was seised of said land, the defendants without right or title entered into possession of the demanded premises, and denied that they ousted plaintiff therefrom, denied that they unlawfully withhold possession from plaintiff, and denied that plaintiff has been damaged thereby. In other words, by their answer defendants admit that they have taken and hold possession of the strip of land, and claim that they did so lawfully, and that plaintiff is without title or right of possession.

Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff awarding to plaintiff possession as demanded and damages for the use and detention thereof in the sum of $75. The record on appeal consists of the judgment roll. It is claimed by appellants that the judgment should be reversed because the findings of fact do not show that plaintiff was ever seised of the property or had title thereto, and do not show that there was any ouster of the plaintiff; that the facts that were found are not such as entitled plaintiff to a judgment for possession or for damages.

[1-3] The findings of fact, exclusive of the formal recitals, are in the following words:

"(1) That the plaintiff had peaceful, adverse, and uninterrupted possession of the property described in plaintiff's second amended complaint from 1903 to 1911, paying taxes on same during the eight years above mentioned.

"(2) That about April 1, 1911, defendants commenced claiming right and title to a portion of said above-mentioned property, to wit, about 61.9 feet off the southern portion of said land, running the full length of said land."

The second of these two findings is of no effect whatever. The mere fact that defendants commenced claiming right and title to the land was not an interference with plaintiff's possession. As to the first finding, it deals with material evidentiary facts which are not alone a sufficient equivalent to the ultimate fact of ownership, and does not find this ultimate fact. Where a finding is of the evidence and not of the fact in issue, it will not aid the judgment, unless the evidentiary facts thus determined carry with them, by necessary implication, the ultimate fact which should have been determined. It nowhere appears in the record that the adverse possession was under claim of title or that it was founded upon a written instrument. Even assuming that the adverse possession so found was under a claim of title, the facts as found do not meet the requirements of section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, by which the finding must be tested. It is not found that the property, while in the possession of plaintiff, was protected by a substantial inclosure, nor that it was usually cultivated or improved, nor that the plaintiff, while so occupying, has paid all the taxes which have been levied and assessed upon the land. The payment of some of those taxes would not alone meet the requirement. The court further neglected to find that the plaintiff was in possession of the property at the time of entry by the defendants.

These findings are not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the plaintiff was seised or possessed of the strip of land in question at the time of entry by the defendants. They do not support a judgment for possession, and particularly they do not support the judgment against the defendants for damages.

The judgment is reversed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞626 — ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

A municipal ordinance prohibiting any person from constructing or occupying any building to be used as a planing mill, etc., if planers, stickers, or jointers are used, and run by power, without obtaining a permit from the board of supervisors, is unconstitutional, because of discrimination between individuals similarly situated; that is, those already operating such mills and those desiring thereafter to operate them.

Application by one Kordoulis for release on habeas corpus. Writ issued.

Timothy Healy and Robert M. Reid, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. M. T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application of the petitioner for release on habeas corpus. The proceedings show that the petitioner was arrested and charged with the violation of the provisions of section 194 of Ordinance 2741 (New Series) of the ordinances of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, which reads in part as follows:

"No person, firm or corporation shall construct or cause to be constructed, maintain or cause to be maintained, occupy or cause to be occupied, any structure or building hereafter used, or intended to be used as a planing mill, saw mill, sash or door factory, furniture or cabinet factory, or for any other woodworking purpose, if planers, stickers or jointers are used, and run by power, without first obtaining a permit so to do from the board of supervisors."

The sole question before the court is the legality of the foregoing section of the ordinance.

Practically the same question was before this court in Ex parte Dondero, 19 Cal. App. 66, 124 Pac. 884, wherein a similar section of the same general ordinance was held by this court to be invalid because of discrimination in its operation between individuals similarly situated, in that it permitted those already in possession or ownership of buildings or premises being used for stables to continue to put these structures to such use without a permit, while requiring all persons thereafter wishing to construct any building or premises to be used as a stable to first obtain a permit from the board of supervisors so to do. The reasoning and conclusion of this court in the Dondero Case apply to the case at bar, and impel us to hold the section of the ordinance in question here to be invalid.

Our attention has been called to the case of In re Stoltenberg, 165 Cal. 789, 134 Pac. 971, which, it is claimed by the respondent, announced a different rule than that declared, in Ex parte Dondero, and in Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cem. Ass'n, 124 Cal. 344, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, and Ex parte Bohen, 115 Cal. 372, 47 Pac. 55, 36 L. R. A. 618, upon the authority of which two latter cases the Dondero Case was decided. After a careful reading of the Stoltenberg Case we are of the opinion not only that its reasoning does not apply to an ordinance of the character of that under review in this case, but also that the Stoltenberg Case recognizes and refers to the distinction between the state tenement law upheld in that case and the section of the ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco declared invalid in the Dondero Case, and hence that the reasoning and conclusions of the Stoltenberg Case have no application to the case at bar.

As to the other question presented by the petitioner, the court deems it unnecessary to express an opinion.

It is ordered that the petitioner be discharged and his bail exonerated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Maude E. Pierson against J. F. Smith. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel and E. J. Dennison, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Smith, Miller & Phelps, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

The complaint stated a cause of action for quieting the title to a certain lot or parcel of land in the county of Los Angeles. It was alleged that the defendant claims an estate, interest, or lien thereon adverse to the plaintiff. By the answer, and also by a cross-complaint, the defendant admits plaintiff's ownership of the land; alleges that plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal contract whereby defendant was to purchase the material and employ the labor and superintend the construction of a certain apartment building upon the premises described, according to plans to be furnished by the plaintiff from time to time; that the plaintiff was to pay to the defendant for said services the sum of $5 per day, together with any money advanced by defendant for the reasonable value of the materials and labor used in the construction of the building; that pursuant to said contract defendant did superintend the construction of the building and purchase and furnish the materials and labor; that the total amount and value of the labor and materials so furnished was a certain sum in excess of $8,000, which sum, including said sum of $5 per day for the services of defendant, was the reasonable value of all materials furnished and labor performed upon said building; that the sum of $8,000 and no more was paid to defendant by the plaintiff; that after completion of the building, and within 30 days after the filing by plaintiff of a notice of completion of the building, the defendant filed a notice of claim of lien in accordance with the statute relating to mechanics' liens. Defendant and cross-complainant demanded judgment for the unpaid balance of his demand and for foreclosure of the lien claimed by him. The plaintiff filed her answer to the cross-complaint, yet made no objection to the sufficiency of the cross-complaint as a pleading in the action or to the right of defendant to file the same. The findings of fact and conclusions of law filed by the court contain a recital that the case was submitted upon said pleadings—

"and upon the stipulation made by counsel for plaintiff and defendant in open court that all of the issues presented by the pleadings might be submitted to the court for trial and decision herein."

The court determined that the plaintiff is the owner of the described premises; that the value of the labor and materials and the amount that had been paid by plaintiff were as alleged in the cross-complaint; that the defendant and cross-complainant was not entitled to any lien upon the premises of plaintiff. A decree was entered granting to defendant and cross-complainant a personal judgment against the plaintiff for the amount of his demand, and adjudging and decreeing that the lien claimed by the defendant was invalid and that the property described in the complaint be adjudged clear and free therefrom.

[1] Assuming without deciding that the cross-complaint was an improper pleading in the case and could have been eliminated from the case if the plaintiff had taken proper steps therefor, it does not follow that the judgment should be reversed. The stipulation made by the parties in the presence of the court at the commencement of the trial was properly accepted by the court as an agreement that the issues tendered by the cross-complaint, as well as those tendered by the complaint, were all to be determined in this action. Accordingly the court received evidence relating to these issues, found the facts, and entered its judgment thereon. The subject-matter of the cross-complaint included, not only a claim of lien, but also a money demand for an amount of which the superior court is authorized to entertain jurisdiction.

[2] As said by the Supreme Court in McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 160, 64 Pac. 278, 280:

"The party, having tried the case in the court below upon the theory that the pleadings are sufficient, cannot for the first time raise the question here."

The decision in Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 74 Pac. 40, which is the principal case relied upon by appellant, is not applicable here. In that case the defendant had attempted to plead a counterclaim, as well as a cause of action stated in a cross-complaint. These pleadings were improper because the action was one to determine adverse claims to real property and the matters alleged by the defendant did not show that the defendant had any interest in the land in question. The plaintiff objected to the evidence offered in support of this affirmative answer and cross-complaint. Held, that the objection was properly sustained. If in that case the parties had stipulated that the court might proceed to try and determine the claim of defendant as well as that of the plaintiff in the action, we think that it would not have been reversed merely for the reason that it was not a proper case for counterclaim or cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUMBURG v. BOARD OF POLICE AND FIRE COMRS OF CITY OF SAN JOSE et al. (Civ. 1313.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1915. Rehearing Denied April 19, 1915. Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇐186 — POLICEMEN—PAY—POSSESSION OF OFFICE—ACTIONS.

A police patrol driver was suspended from duty without pay, following charges proved against him by the chief of police. Subsequently the board of police and fire commissioners made an order that thereafter the police department should consist of certain persons designated by name, but plaintiff was not included in the list. All the persons so designated continuously discharged their respective duties, and received salaries therefor. After this reorganization order, plaintiff gave up records belonging to the city and performed no further duty as a member of the police force, but sought a mandate to compel the board to pay his salary, and to restore him to office as policeman. Held, that he was out of possession of the office, and that it was occupied by another incumbent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 510-517; Dec. Dig. ⇐186.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇐186—POLICEMEN—DE FACTO OFFICERS—RIGHT TO RECOVER SALARY.

A police officer suspended from duty and out of possession of the office and performing no duties thereof cannot enforce the payment of his salary until his right to the office had been adjudicated in an appropriate action to which the person in possession is a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 510-517; Dec. Dig. ⇐186.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Wm. A. Beasley, Judges.

Mandamus by John Humburg against the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners of the City of San Jose and others, to compel the payment of salary, and to restore petitioner to office of policeman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John W. Sullivan; of San Jose, for appellants. J. C. Black, of San Jose, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is one of three cases which were tried together, as they involve practically the same facts and principles. Each was a special proceeding to obtain a writ of mandate to compel defendants to pay respondent a certain salary claimed to be due him as police officer of said city and also to restore him to office as said policeman. The three cases have been argued here together and will be treated in one opinion.

Humburg was employed as a member of the police department in 1891, De Carli in 1904, and Narvaez in 1905. They continued to discharge their duties as such until July 22, 1908, when charges were preferred against them by the chief of police for "interfering in politics," in violation of section 13 of article 10 of the city charter. They were thereupon suspended from duty without further pay. Thereafter they sought a writ of prohibition to restrain the board of police and fire commissioners from hearing or trying the charge so made against them. While this application was pending, said board, on August 26, 1908, made an order declaring that, in order to keep within the allowance made for the maintenance of the police and fire department, the police department should thereafter consist of a certain number of officers and men and designating the persons who should constitute the police force. None of the plaintiffs herein was among the list. Thereby the force was reduced from 24 to 19 men. This was set up in answer to said petition for writ of prohibition, and it was alleged that the petitioners therein had ceased to be members of the police force. Upon the issue so raised, the superior court directed the writ to issue, declaring in the judgment that, by reason of said order reorganizing said police department, said police and fire commissioners had estopped themselves from "trying plaintiffs on said charges and on that ground"; findings having been waived.

The proceedings herein were begun on December 24, 1909, for the payment of salaries from July 22, 1908, to December, 1909. Defendants in their answer set forth said suspension, the order of August 26th reorganizing the police department and discharging and removing petitioners therefrom, the incumbency of their successors, and the fact that they have held and enjoyed such offices and alleging estoppel of further litigation of plaintiffs' claim to said offices by reason of said decision as to the writ of prohibition. The findings were all against defendants, and a peremptory writ was issued by the court requiring the board of police and fire commissioners to pay the salaries of petitioners, as prayed for, and to restore them to office.

[1] Among the findings of the court was this:

"That it is not true that ever since the said 26th day of August, 1908, there is now or has been an incumbent in the offices claimed by the petitioner herein; that no one has been named by any order or certificate issued by the board of police and fire commissioners nor by the city clerk of the city of San Jose to take the place and office of plaintiff, and no one holds any color of right to the office of this plaintiff, and that it is not true that any person holds as an incumbent or enjoys or performs or now performs the duties of said office, and no one asks for nor receives or claims from the public treasury of the said city of San Jose any salary of the petitioner."

This finding seems to be entirely contrary to the evidence. In fact, there is no conflict in that regard. The evidence is undisputed that in said order reorganizing the police department the officers were named who should fill all the places. Whether the order was legal or not, it certainly had the effect to put incumbents in the places formerly occupied by plaintiffs. Afterwards some additional places were created and filled, but plaintiffs were left out. Furthermore, the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Lahan, the secretary of the board, is as follows:

"There has never been any order made restoring the petitioners to police duty. Immediately upon the making of the order of August 26th, I think the petitioner gave up property that belonged to the city that was there in his possession; I think he gave up records. Since the 22d day of July the plaintiff has not performed any services for the city of San Jose that I know of. Upon and immediately after the order of the 26th day of August, 1908, which designated the persons who should remain upon the police force, the persons named in that order, and each of them, immediately entered upon the discharge of their duties, as fixed in that order. They and each of them have continued, after that time, to discharge their respective duties, except I think that Patrolman Walthers resigned and his place was filled about December 1, 1909, by the appointment of Mr. Charles Hertel. * * * All the persons named in the order of the 26th day of August, 1908, and Mr. Hertel, and all the persons then or since then upon the police force, have regularly asked for and received their salary for the respective positions for which they claim to be appointed. From the 1st day of September, 1908, continuously and up to and including the 1st day of January, 1910, each and all of such persons have regularly performed their duties and regularly received their salaries as members of the police force. They each and all have claimed and now claim to hold their positions by virtue of a legal appointment by the board, claiming to hold upon a legal order. * * * I knew the petitioner, D. P. Narvaez, prior to the 22d day of July, 1908. He was a patrol driver. I am acquainted with Louis Sepulveda and Charles Pfau. Between the 22d day of July, the date of the suspension of the plaintiff, and August 26, 1908, the date of the order of removal, the petitioner did not perform any duties as patrol driver in the police department. Immediately upon the order of August 26, 1908, both Charles Pfau and Louis Sepulveda entered upon the duties of the position of patrol driver for the police department of the city of San Jose, and have ever since continued and are now discharging the duties."

And he furthermore stated that they had received the salaries for such services and claimed to occupy the positions by virtue of said order of August 26, 1908. We have quoted the evidence given in the Narvaez case, but it was substantially the same in the other two; Mr. Humburg having also been a patrol driver and Mr. De Carli a patrolman.

It is difficult to understand how it could be more clearly shown that there were incumbents in the positions formerly occupied by the plaintiffs herein; said incumbents claiming to be de jure officers, and who actually received the salaries attached to the positions.

[2] We have, then, exactly the condition presented by Black v. Board of Police Commissioners, 17 Cal. App. 310, 119 Pac. 674. Indeed, Mr. Black was removed from the same police force at the time petitioners were removed. Therein the court says:

"But in the case at bar petitioner was not in possession of the office, and performed no duties thereof during the time for which he claimed his salary, but another person was in possession of the office, under claim and color of right, and had performed, and was still performing, all the duties thereof, under such claim and color of right, and had claimed and been paid the salary therefor. Under such circumstances, the authorities cited in our former opinion expressly and pointedly hold that one out of possession of the office and performing no duties thereof cannot enforce the payment of his salary until he has had his right to the office adjudicated in an appropriate action, to which the person in possession must be a party. See, to the same effect, Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 831."

Respondents herein claim that Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 Pac. 732, and some other cases following it, hold to the contrary. But a rehearing was granted in the Black Case for the purpose of considering the Bannerman decision, and, upon the rehearing, the appellate court for the first district said:

"Unlike the case at bar, in Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 Pac. 732, the petitioner for the writ of mandate was in exclusive possession of the office as a de facto officer, and performed all the duties of the office during the time for which he claimed his salary. At the very outset of the opinion it is stated that this was conceded."

The Supreme Court denied a petition for hearing of the Black Case in that court, and the decision therein would seem to be authoritative and binding here. The other cases cited by respondents to this point are Barendt v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 685, 118 Pac. 223; Welch v. Ware, 161 Cal. 646, 119 Pac. 1080; Ross v. Board of Education, 18 Cal. App. 223, 122 Pac. 967.

The Barendt Case, supra, was an injunction to restrain defendants "from removing or attempting to remove plaintiff from actual possession of his office as a member of the board of health of the city and county of San Francisco," and the vital point determined was that, "pending a litigation in the nature of a quo warranto to determine the title to the office," plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction "restoring him to and protecting him in the actual possession of the office."

In the Welch Case, supra, the "petitioner continued to perform and discharge the duties of fire, fish, and game warden for said county," and in the Ross Case an office was not involved, nor does it appear that another incumbent was occupying the position from which the plaintiff was ousted.

Other points are discussed by counsel, but it seems hardly necessary to consider them.

It may be said in conclusion that after the decision in the Black Case, supra, Mr. Black brought an action in quo warranto to try the title to the office, and that action is now on appeal in the Supreme Court. It involves the merits of these proceedings, and, no doubt, if the decision should be favorable to Black, defendants will no longer refuse to allow petitioners' claims for the salaries that may be due them.

For the reason stated, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. FLESHMAN. (Cr. 369.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 18, 1915.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES 6—WRITTEN TOKEN—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Pen. Code, § 1110, declares that defendant cannot be convicted of false pretenses for having obtained from any person any labor, money, property, or valuable thing, if the false pretense was expressed in language unaccompanied by a false token or writing, unless the pretense or some note or memorandum thereof is proven by the testimony of two witnesses. Accused presented a purported copy of a fictitious advertising medium and a forged contract bearing the genuine signature of a bank cashier, and claimed payment. Held, that the contract and bill constituted a false token or writing sufficient to justify a conviction, when accompanied by a false pretense implied from the language or conduct of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. 6.]

2. FALSE PRETENSES 38—PROOF — VARIANCE.

In such case, testimony by the bank cashier that he was induced to pay the money by reason of the demand based upon the false contract was not a variance between the averments of the information that accused, with intent to cheat and defraud, presented to the bank a contract which he represented it had made with a publishing concern, and demanded payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. 38.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW 814—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal of an instruction that accused is presumed to have a reasonably good moral character unless the contrary is shown was proper, where there was no evidence on the question of accused's character.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 734—TRIAL—JURY QUESTIONS.

It is improper to submit to the jury the question: What are the material averments of the information with which the proof must correspond to sustain a conviction?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1697-1699; Dec. Dig. 734.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW 1172—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

A charge that the proof must correspond with the material allegations of the information, while erroneous in submitting to the jury the question, What are the material allegations? is harmless because permitting the jury to find that all allegations of the complaint are material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154-3157, 3159-3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. 1172.]

6. FALSE PRETENSES 49—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence held to establish accused's guilty knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. 49.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

M. H. Fleshman was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses, and from the judgment and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Morganstern and Morganstern, McGee, Henning & Hendee, all of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty.-Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The material allegations of the information are that defendant, with intent to cheat and defraud it, represented to the American National Bank that it had theretofore made and executed a certain contract with the Parker Company, which he represented to be a corporation engaged in publishing a directory, designated as the Western States Business Gazetteer, which contract was in words and figures as follows:

"Publishers' Regular Authorized Advertising Contract. Our advertisement and display classification being inserted by the publishers in this publication, and appearing in the manner and form as hereby authorized by us, it is understood that our obligations cease with the payment of this amount, the same being the sum of $250, two hundred and fifty dollars. Copy of book not included in this charge. City of San Diego Canv. for 1914. Firm name, American National Bank. Ordered by L. J. Rice, Assistant Cashier" —and that by reason of said contract said bank was indebted to the Parker Company in the sum of $250; that defendant represented himself to be an agent of said Parker Company authorized to collect and receive said $250 so due from said bank, all of which representations were false and untrue, and by defendant known to be false and untrue; that said bank believed said representations to be true, and, relying upon the same, and deceived thereby, delivered to defendant said sum of $250.

The evidence tended to prove that the alleged contract to which was attached the genuine signature of L. J. Rice, assistant cashier of the bank, was nevertheless forged over his signature, or otherwise wrongfully obtained, in that neither Rice nor the bank ever at any time signed or executed such contract, and that there was, in truth and in fact, no such publication as the Western States Business Gazetteer, or firm of "Parker Company" engaged in the publication thereof. Nevertheless appellant insists that, conceding a public offense committed in so wrongfully obtaining such contract, the evidence fails to connect him therewith or show his participation in any crime based thereon; and, further, that his acts as established by the evidence cannot be construed as the public offense of obtaining money under false pretenses.

It appears from the evidence of Mr. Rice, the assistant cashier of the bank, that defendant called upon him at the bank on June 25, 1914, and, taking from a leather case which he carried a purported copy of the Western States Business Gazetteer, exhibited the same to him as containing a full-page advertisement of the bank, and presented a bill for $250, made out against the bank, to which was attached the alleged contract over his signature as such assistant cashier, and stated to Mr. Rice that he had come to collect the bill. Mr. Rice, who says he was very busy at the time, examined the papers, remarking that he did not see how anybody ever hypnotized him into signing a contract for an advertisement of that kind, and asked defendant if he was Mr. Parker, in reply to which defendant said: "No; but a relative of his." The bill presented was as follows:

Make Checks Payable to Herbert Parker.
Publishers	City San Diego, Cal. 6/ 1914
Printers	M American National Bank
Booksellers	To the Parker Company, Dr.
Lithographers	Publisher of
Importers	Western States Business
Blank Book Manufacturers	Gazetteer
	Branch Head Office Branch
	New Orleans New York St. Louis
To Insertion in "The Western States Business Gazetteer," $250. Received Payment for the Publisher.

Rice indorsed upon the bill, "O. K. L. J. R.," handed it back to defendant, telling him to present it to the bank teller, whom he directed to pay it. Defendant, before presenting the bill to the teller for payment, detached therefrom the contract, which he retained, and, upon receipting the bill as follows: "H. F. Coll, 6/26/14,"—the teller gave him the sum of $250. Mr. Rice, after testifying to the substance of the contract so retained by defendant, was asked why he paid the money to defendant, to which he replied:

"The reason I paid it was that he presented this bill to me and said he had come to collect the money, and showed me this advertisement in the book, and presented the bill for the $250, with the contract pasted on the back of it which had my signature on it."

And again, in reply to a similar question, he stated:

"First, because he asked me for it; second, because he showed me a copy of this advertisement; third, because I had a bill for it, and had my name signed to a piece of paper [the contract] there that I knew was my signature."

[1] The false statements made by defendant to Rice, though meager, taken in connection with his conduct in presenting the purported copy of the gazetteer and advertisement therein, together with the forged contract pursuant to and in accordance with which he, as agent of the Parker Company, presented the bill for $250, which, in reliance upon the representations so made and implied from such conduct, the bank paid, were sufficient to constitute the offense with which he was charged. It was the false contract to which the genuine signature of Rice was attached that induced him to pay the bill. This contract constituted a "false token or writing" within the meaning of section 1110, Penal Code, which, in order to justify a conviction, must accompany the false pretense when expressed or implied from the language and conduct of one charged with the offense.

[2] Another alleged ground for reversal is that there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the information and the evidence given by Rice. In support of this contention defendant cites the case of People v. Lapique, 10 Cal. App. 669, 103 Pac. 164. It clearly appeared in that case, as stated in the opinion of the late Mr. Justice Taggart, that the representations made and upon which the prosecuting witness relied were not those alleged in the information. The facts in the case at bar bear no analogy to those in the case cited. The evidence of Rice shows that he was induced to pay the money by reason of the demand based upon the false and forged obligation of the bank to pay for the fictitious advertisement in the purported directory. There was no variance between his evidence and the allegations of the information.

[3] Defendant complains that the court modified instruction No. 3 by striking out the words "he [the defendant] is presumed to have a reasonably good moral character unless the contrary be shown to your satisfaction by testimony in that regard," citing People v. Gleason, 122 Cal. 370, 55 Pac. 123. There was no testimony given touching the subject of defendant's character; and, as said in the case cited, "instructions upon abstract rules of law which have no application to the evidence in a case tend to confuse rather than enlighten a jury, and ought not to be given." To the same effect is People v. Griffith, 146 Cal. 339, 80 Pac. 68.

[4, 5] Defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that "in every criminal case the proof must correspond with the allegations of the information, and, unless the proof does substantially correspond with the allegations of the information, it will be your duty to acquit the defendant," which instruction the court, after inserting the word "material" before the word "allegations," gave. While it was error to submit to the jury the question as to what constituted "the material allegations of the information," since as to what is a material allegation of a pleading is a question of law for the court to decide, nevertheless such instruction was in favor of, rather than against, defendant. If the jury considered all the allegations material, then, under the instruction, a greater burden would be imposed upon the prosecution than if they deemed only a portion of such allegations material. Obviously the substantial rights of defendant could not have been prejudiced by the giving of such instruction.

[6] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the evidence fails to show that he had guilty knowledge of the fraud being perpetrated by him as a means of procuring the money. Much evidence was offered tending to prove a number of other like offenses perpetrated by him, the purpose of which was to establish guilty intent and knowledge. The evidence taken as a whole, together with his acts in connection with those of an associate who was apparently an accomplice, both before and after the commission of the offense charged, as well as acts of defendant occurring on the train after departure from San Diego, is wholly inconsistent with any theory other than knowledge on the part of defendant that he was perpetrating the fraud of which he was accused and obtaining the money by presenting the purported contract to the prosecuting witness, knowing at the time it was a forgery.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SELBY. (Cr. 272.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1915.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE $\hookrightarrow$ 304—ABANDONMENT—DESTITUTE CONDITION—EVIDENCE.

Pen. Code, § 270a, provides that every husband having sufficient ability to provide for his wife's support who willfully abandons and leaves her in a destitute condition, unless by her misconduct he was justified in abandoning her, is punishable by imprisonment, etc. A husband whose wife confessed her improper relations with other men, and then recanted, induced her to enter into an agreement to separate, requiring him to pay $15 per month for the support of herself and two children, which agreement she entered into without coercion, and with knowledge of his impecunious condition, herself declaring that she would not live with him. After the separation she was received into the family of a relative and cared for, and had her own credit at a general merchandise store, and was not at any time deprived of the necessities of life. Held, that the statute was intended to cover cases where the husband without just cause abandons his wife, leaving her in a condition of absolute want, and that defendant was not guilty, because there was neither an abandonment nor a leaving in a destitute condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1102; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 304.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

J. C. Selby was convicted of unlawfully abandoning his wife in a destitute condition and failing to provide for her support, and he appeals. Reversed.

Grover C. Julian and A. F. Shartel, both of Alturas, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. By information filed in the superior court of Modoc county the defendant was accused of the crime of unlawfully abandoning and leaving his wife in a destitute condition and failing to provide for her support, as defined by section 270a of the Penal Code. Upon being tried for said offense before a jury, he was convicted thereof, and thereafter, and within legal time, the court sentenced him to imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom for the term of two years. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from the judgment, and is supported by a transcript of the testimony.

Section 270a of the Penal Code reads:

"Every husband having sufficient ability to provide for his wife's support, or who is able to earn the means of such wife's support, who willfully abandons and leaves his wife in a destitute condition, or who refuses or neglects to provide such wife with necessary food, clothing, shelter or medical attendance, unless by her misconduct he was justified in abandoning her, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or in the county jail, not exceeding two years, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or * * * both."

The important facts are undisputed, and may thus be briefly stated:

The defendant and his wife had been married for a period of nearly four years at the time of the trial of this case. To them, during that time, were born two children, the younger still nursing at its mother's breast when the trial took place. It appears that a short time before his arrest, the defendant conceived a suspicion that his wife was unfaithful to him; that she was holding clandestine meetings with other men and sustaining immoral relations with them. He finally revealed to his wife his suspicions, and directly accused her of misconduct with other men. She admitted to him the truth of the accusation, confessing that two different men had, on divers occasions, had sexual relations with her. This occurred on the night of the 27th day of March, 1914. On the following morning the wife contradicted her story of wrongdoing, declaring to her husband that there was no truth in it, and explaining that, he having been so persistent in his asseverations of her guilt, she merely told him the story to pacify him for the time. He, however, insisted that she had done wrong, and persisted in expressing the belief that her confession of the night before was founded upon the truth. He then persuaded her to accompany him to the office of the justice of the peace of the town of Alturas, where they then, and had during the major part of their married life, resided, and, upon appearing before that officer, related to the latter their domestic differences, and stated that his wife was in need of medical treatment, and that she ought to be committed to a hospital. The justice attempted to effect a reconciliation between the parties, but without avail. Both positively stated in the presence of that officer that they would not live together in the future. The couple then departed together from the office of the justice of the peace, and immediately repaired to the office of the district attorney of Modoc county. There they met the district attorney, and to him related the story of their domestic difficulties. The testimony of that officer was not contradicted in any important particular, and therefore in his language may best be told what transpired between the parties at his office.

"Mr. Selby was relating quite a good deal of their difficulties to me, and Mrs. Selby was also adding words of explanation here and there, and they were giving me quite a detailed account of the troubles they had been having, and one thing and another, and it appeared to me that their affairs had reached a state where they could no longer live together with any satisfaction to each other; and I made a remark to that effect to them. My remembrance is that Mrs. Selby was the first to speak, and she said, in substance, that she did not expect to ever live with Mr. Selby again, and Mr. Selby, as I remember it, acquiesced to this statement, that their affairs had reached a state where they could be no longer together with any satisfaction to each other as husband and wife, and that they might as well separate. This was merely the substance of it. I would not attempt to repeat a verbatim account of it. I then made the remark to Mr. Selby that he would have to make some provision for Mrs. Selby and the children. First I asked if they had any property. They said, 'No.' I then remarked to Mr. Selby that he would have to make some provision for Mrs. Selby and the children; and then there was some considerable discussion followed, and it was finally agreed that Mr. Selby should pay Mrs. Selby $15 a month, and my remembrance is that I turned to Mrs. Selby and asked her if that was satisfactory to her. She expressed herself as being satisfied; and Mr. Selby then attempted to interpose a condition that Mrs. Selby should keep away from the Ed. Dorris home. I told him that as long as they agreed to separate, and he was going his way without restrictions, he had no right to interpose any conditions upon her, that the Dorrises were relatives of hers, and it was but natural that she should want to go to those interested in her, and it was a restriction he had no right to interpose, and he urged the point no further."

The defendant and his wife, after having made the agreement above mentioned, departed from the district attorney's office, the latter going to her mother's home, and later to the home of her uncle, a Mr. Dorris, with whose family she lived up to the time of the trial. It appears, however, that before she left her mother's home, the defendant called on her and stated that he intended to sell their household goods. He then went to their former home, and she followed a short time thereafter; her purpose in doing so being to secure possession of certain articles of clothing belonging to her and the children. Upon her arrival at their home a quarrel between her and the defendant ensued. There is some conflict between the defendant and his wife with respect to what transpired between them at that time. She testified that after placing certain articles of her own in a trunk he ejected her from the house and locked the doors thereto, and thus prevented her from again entering the house and obtaining what belonged to her. The defendant testified that the reason he did not desire that she should remain in the house was because he had often heard her threaten self-destruction; that he knew that there were several different kinds of poison in the house; and that, although he believed she was merely "bluffing" when threatening to take her own life, he nevertheless felt some apprehension that she might do so if she found the poison. He further testified that after he had put her out of the house she broke a window, and through it re-entered, after which he again ejected her, and again locked the doors. He said that he did not prevent her from obtaining possession of her own wearing apparel.

Nothing further occurred between the parties until the 30th day of March, 1914—two days after the agreement of separation was entered into between them—when the defendant was arrested upon the charge of which he was convicted in this case and placed in the county jail, and thus in the custody of the sheriff of the county, and there remained up to the time of the trial, and, so far as we are advised to the contrary, is still in said jail. His wife and children during that time lived at the home of her uncle, the Mr. Dorris heretofore referred to.

At the time of his arrest the defendant was without means. Mrs. Selby testified that, in her opinion, he could not have had in his possession an amount of money exceeding $1. The defendant testified that all the money he had at that time was the sum of 25 cents. Both the defendant and his wife testified that he owned no property of any kind. It appears, however, that prior to his arrest and incarceration in the county jail on the present charge his credit was good at a general merchandising store owned and conducted by a Mr. Thomas, who testified that the defendant had maintained an account with him, and that Mrs. Selby often came to the store and bought various articles of merchandise on his account. He further said that the arrangement whereby the defendant's wife was enabled to purchase goods at his store on her husband's credit had never been revoked, although (he continued to say) he would not let her have merchandise on her husband's account so long as he remained in jail and was thus deprived of the opportunity to earn money with which to pay his debts. He declared, however, that Mrs. Selby could, notwithstanding that her husband was in jail, secure merchandise at his store on her own account.

The defendant testified that at the time Mrs. Selby left their home there was "a good supply of provisions in that house," and "is at present, if they have not been removed," and that she could have gone to the house if she had desired to. Mrs. Selby, although giving testimony in rebuttal, did not contradict this statement.

It may be added that the testimony shows without contradiction that the defendant, who was a common laborer, had always been a hard-working, industrious man, and had, prior to his arrest, provided well for his family.

The foregoing embraces an accurate statement of the facts which were established at the trial and upon which the jury founded their verdict of conviction in this case.

Our conclusion is that the verdict is wholly without justification under the proofs, and that to sustain and execute it would result in manifest injustice.

The statute upon which the information is based was obviously intended to cover those cases where the husband, without just cause, has willfully abandoned his wife and left her without means or resources and in a condition of absolute want—a condition in which she is unable to procure for herself the ordinary or common necessities essential to the sustenance of life. This is, indeed, the natural meaning of the word "destitute" or "destitution," and the sense in which it is undoubtedly used in the statute. The uncontradicted evidence clearly shows that the wife in this case was not left in a "destitute condition" by the defendant. Immediately upon the separation between herself and husband taking place, she was received into the family of a relative, and there taken care of. Moreover, she had credit at a general merchandising store, where, according to the owner of the store, she was privileged to obtain merchandise on her own credit. She did not, nor did any other witness, testify that after the separation she was at any time deprived of the necessities of life. The only proof upon that matter was that the defendant did not provide those necessities. While it was, of course, his duty to furnish her with such necessities, it was no crime for him not to do so if she was not actually in want of them, even though he might have abandoned her within the meaning of the statute. See State v. Thornton, 232 Mo. Sup. 298, 134 S. W. 519, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 841, 844.

But the above is not the only important consideration which stamps the verdict as an unjustifiable and erroneous conclusion from the evidence. We fail to see wherein the act of the defendant constituted an abandonment of his wife within the meaning of section 270a of the Penal Code. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the separation was the result of the mutual agreement of the parties. So far as the record discloses, there was no duress or coercion practiced by the defendant to bring about the separation. He evidently believed his wife's confession that she had sustained immoral relations with other men, notwithstanding that she subsequently asseverated that the story was a pure invention. Because of that confession, he insisted upon a separation, and, if he still honestly believed, after her recantation of her confession, that she had been unfaithful in her marital obligations, he had the legal, even if not the moral, right to insist upon a separation, and such insistence would not of itself involve duress or coercion. But she, too, declared that she could and would no longer live with the defendant, and was, equally with the latter, not only agreeable to the fact and act of separation, but also to the terms of the agreement. In brief, the agreement to separate was the culmination of the mutual, free, and voluntary acts of both parties. Under these circumstances, there could be no abandonment of the wife by the defendant.

There can be no claim that the wife was in any manner or degree misled as to the defendant's financial condition before and at the time the agreement to separate was made. She knew, and, indeed, testified that she knew, when the agreement was entered into, that the defendant had neither money nor property of any other character. She therefore knew, when she made the agreement to separate upon the terms indicated, that the defendant, in order to carry out his part of the agreement, would be required to secure employment whereby he would be enabled to earn money. It was doubtless for this reason that no particular time for the payment of the initial and other monthly installments which he was to make to her was specified or agreed upon in the agreement. Thus it clearly appears that she entered into the agreement freely and voluntarily and with full and complete knowledge of the defendant's impecunious condition. And, so far as anything to the contrary is shown by this record, the defendant entered into the agreement in good faith and with the intention of carrying it out, if given a reasonable opportunity to do so. This was denied him; for, as has been shown, on the third day after the agreement was made, he was placed under arrest upon the charge of which he here stands convicted.

At all events, we are firmly of the conviction that, under the conceded facts, the defendant neither abandoned his wife nor left her in a destitute condition within the true meaning or contemplation of section 270a of the Penal Code.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CASSOU. (Cr. 503.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 22, 1915.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES $\Leftrightarrow$ 13—OFFENSE—"EVIDENCE OF DEBT"—"PERSONAL PROPERTY."

Under Pen. Code, § 532, declaring that every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds another of real or personal property, shall be punishable as for larceny, and section 7, subd. 12, declaring that an evidence of debt is "personal property," the making of a note and the procuring of its indorsement by false pretenses was not an offense, since the indorsement was not an "evidence of debt" while the note remained in the hands of defendant; though a note in the hands of the payee or any other person than the maker is an evidence of debt, and, as such, is "personal property" which may be the subject-matter of the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Basile Cassou was charged with the felonious obtaining of personal property by false pretenses. Demurrer to information sustained, and the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Halsey Rixford, of San Francisco, of counsel), for the People. E. L. Webber and Fitzpatrick & Greeley, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant in this case, in an information filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, was charged with the felonious obtaining of personal property by false pretenses. The defendant's demurrer was allowed upon the ground that the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. A judgment of dismissal was thereupon entered, from which the people have appealed.

The information charged the defendant with having induced one G. F. Vella, by means of false pretenses, to make and deliver to the defendant the following promissory note:

"$600. San Francisco, Cal., May 4, 1912.

"One day after date, 1912, at 3 o'clock p. m. of that date (no grace), for value received in gold coin of the government of the United States, I promise to pay to the order of Bank of Italy in this city six hundred dollars, with interest from date at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum until paid, payable monthly, both principal and interest payable in like gold coin.

"[Signed] Basile Cassou."

This note was indorsed by Vella, and following his signature as indorser appears the following:

"For value received * * * hereby waive presentation, due protest, notice of protest, and notice of nonpayment.

"[Signed] G. F. Vella."

[1, 2] The information alleged that the note was of the value of $600 in gold coin of the United States, and that it was the personal property of Vella.

Section 532 of the Penal Code defines the offense of obtaining money, property, etc., by false pretenses, and that section, in so far as it is pertinent to the facts of the present case, reads as follows:

"Every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representations or pretense, defrauds any other person of * * * property, whether real or personal, * * * is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for the larceny of the * * * property so obtained."

An evidence of debt is personal property. Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 12.

Admittedly a promissory note in the hands of the payee or any other person than the maker is an evidence of debt, and, as such, is personal property which may be the subject-matter of the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses. People v. Summers, 115 Mich. 537, 73 N. W. 819; People v. Skidmore, 123 Cal. 267, 55 Pac. 934; People v. Reed, 70 Cal. 529, 11 Pac. 676. While the information in the present case avers that Vella, the complaining witness, was induced by certain false pretenses to make and deliver to the defendant the promissory note set out in the information, nevertheless it is apparent from an inspection of the note itself that the defendant alone was the maker, and that Vella was merely an indorser. Therefore, in so far as ownership was concerned, Vella, had no interest in the note, and, when read and construed in its entirety, it is apparent that the information charges the defendant with nothing more than procuring Vella's indorsement of the note by false pretenses. That this was the purpose and intent of the information was admitted by the Attorney General upon the oral argument of the case here. Neither the note nor the indorsement thereon had any legal existence until delivered to and accepted by the payee. Randolph on Commercial Paper, § 216, p. 397; Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511; Dann v. Norris, 24 Conn. 332; Mott v. Smith, 2 Cranch, C. C. 33, Fed. Cas. No. 9,882; Cook v. Litchfield, 9 N. Y. 279. Consequently, Vella's indorsement of the note was not an evidence of debt while the note remained in the hands of the defendant. This being so, it is apparent upon the face of the information that the subject-matter of the alleged false pretenses, viz., Vella's indorsement, was not property within the meaning of section 532 of the Penal Code.

The case of People v. Nesbitt, 102 Cal. 327, 36 Pac. 654, neither holds nor hints that a promissory note which has not passed from the hands of the maker may be the basis of a charge of obtaining property by false pretenses. In that case the information charged that the complaining witness was induced by the false pretenses of the defendant to execute and deliver jointly with the defendant to the Bank of Chico, as payee, a promissory note, and thereupon the bank paid to the defendant the sum called for in the same. The Supreme Court, in commenting upon the sufficiency of the indictment, stated, in effect, that in view of the complicated nature of the facts of the transaction out of which the charge of obtaining property by false pretenses arose, the alleged ambiguities and uncertainties of the information would have been avoided by "a direct allegation in the information charging the defendant with having defrauded Merry [the complainant] of his note, and then the statute defining the offense here charged would have been literally followed." Nothing that the court said in the case last cited was inconsistent with the conclusion reached here. There the court evidently was dealing only with alleged uncertainties of the information, and not with the sufficiency of the facts, and therefore it cannot be said that the case is authority for the proposition that the information would have been sufficient without an allegation that the note involved in the transaction had been delivered to and accepted by the payee.

The case of People v. Stone, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 183, is strongly relied upon to support the people's contention that it was not necessary for the information in the present case to allege that the note in question with Vella's indorsement thereon had been actually negotiated. That case, in so far as the principal point there decided is concerned, has no application to the facts of the present case. There, under a statute which made it a crime "to obtain the signature of any person to any written instrument," the defendant was charged in an indictment containing three counts with obtaining the promissory note of one Filley, and his indorsement to three other promissory notes. The court, in discussing objections to the indictment, said:

"The first and second counts of the indictment expressly aver that Filley was charged as indorser upon the notes mentioned therein, and which it is alleged he was induced to indorse by the false pretenses of the defendant, and that he had been obliged to pay, and had actually paid, the same. Filley could not have been charged as indorser, unless the notes had been negotiated [italics are ours], and their payment by him, whoever was the holder at the time, must have been for the use and benefit of the defendant, for whose accommodation they were indorsed. The third count does not show that Filley ever paid the notes mentioned therein, or that Stone [the defendant] ever parted with them or put them in circulation, or that Filley ever suffered inconvenience or loss in consequence of having signed them. For aught that appears, they may have been immediately destroyed by Stone, or restored to Filley, or may now be in the hands of Stone, where they are incapable of being used to the prejudice of any of the parties to them. Our Revised Statutes * * * make it an offense in express terms to obtain the signature of any person to any written instrument by any false pretense, with intent to cheat or defraud another. Under this statute, the offense is complete when the signature is obtained, if it were obtained by false pretenses and with a fraudulent intent, although it may never be used to the prejudice of any person. But whether a note, where no use of it has been made, * * * can be considered either money, or goods or chattels, or a valuable thing, may be questionable. It is not, however, important in this case, as the objection has been shown not to exist in relation to the other two counts; and, if any one count is good, it is sufficient. That a note obtained by false pretenses and with a fraudulent intent, and which a party has actually used for his own benefit, is embraced within the spirit of the act as it stood before the Revised Statutes, I have no doubt."

It will thus be seen that in the case last cited the court doubted that a promissory note not used could be considered as within the category of money, goods, chattels, or valuable things, and inferentially held that an indorser of a promissory note could not be charged as such unless the note had been actually negotiated. To this extent at least the case under discussion frustrates, rather than fortifies, the contention of the people here. That the point upon which the indictment in the case last cited was held to be good can have no application to the statute of this state under which the information in the present case was drawn is made manifest by the recital in the opinion that the indictment was founded upon a statute making "it an offense in express terms to obtain the signature of any person to any written instrument by any false pretense with intent to cheat or defraud another." If there be any doubt as to the scope and effect of the opinion in the case last referred to, that doubt is relieved by a consideration of the case of People v. Genung, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 19, 25 Am. Dec. 594, where the same court, in an opinion by the same justice, said:

"It was suggested upon the argument that the indictment was bad in not charging loss or prejudice to have been sustained by Conly [the signer of the note]. This was not necessary. This is a new offense, created by the Revised Statutes. * * * They have added to the statute, as it stood before, * * * the obtaining by false pretenses the signature of any person to any written instrument. The offense is complete when the signature is obtained by false pretenses, with intent to cheat or defraud another. It is not essential to the offense that actual loss or injury should be sustained. This was held in the case of People v. Stone, 9 Wend. [N. Y.] 190. That case arose before the Revised Statutes. * * * The offense charged was the obtaining the indorsement of one Filley upon several notes by false pretenses. It was held that such indorsement, where the note was actually passed and made productive, was to be considered as money, goods, or chattels, or other effects, within the meaning of the act. But I expressed a doubt whether a note thus obtained, where no use had been made of it, would be considered either money, goods, or chattels, or a valuable thing; but I also observed that under the Revised Statutes the offense was complete when the signature was obtained."

The case of Bargie v. U. S., Fed. Cas. No. 18,229, cannot be considered as an authority to support the sufficiency of the information in the present case. There the offense charged was founded upon an act of Congress which penalized the procurement by false pretenses of any instrument in writing for the payment of money or other valuable thing. In that case the second count of the indictment charged that the defendant by false pretenses procured the indorsement of the complainant of a sight draft drawn by the defendant upon a third party, and the court held that such an indorsement was an instrument in writing within the meaning of the statute under which the indictment was drawn, and that therefore it was immaterial to the completion of the offense charged whether or not the indorser was ever called upon to meet the obligation of the indorsement. This conclusion and the reasoning upon which it is based cannot, in our opinion, be applied to section 532 of the Penal Code, which limits the subject-matters of the offense charged against the defendant to "money, labor or property."

Our examination of the remaining cases cited in support of the information discloses the fact that the decision in each instance was based upon the interpretation and application of statutes which, in defining the offense of fraud by false pretenses, cover and control the procurement of a signature to an instrument in writing or a valuable thing.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KILFOIL. (Cr. 356.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 1162 — APPEAL — REVIEW — VERDICT — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where there is evidence which, though contradicted by other evidence, is sufficient to establish every essential element of the offense, a conviction cannot be disturbed except for errors which prevented the defendant from having a fair trial.

2. GRAND JURY — 2 — CHALLENGES — STATUTES — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Pen. Code, § 895, as amended by St. 1911, p. 434, providing that no challenge shall be made or allowed to the panel from which the grand jury is drawn, nor to an individual grand juror unless when made by the court for want of qualification, as prescribed in the next preceding section, is not unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Grand Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 17; Dec. Dig. — 2.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 603 — CONTINUANCE — ABSENT WITNESSES.

It was not an abuse of the court's discretion to refuse a continuance to the accused to procure evidence, where the affidavits were based on anonymous communications indicating that unnamed persons, while passing the home of prosecutrix, had heard her exclaim that it wasn't the defendant, where the affidavits gave no assurances that the witnesses could or would be produced if the continuance were granted, and did not establish sufficient diligence in searching for the witnesses.

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 1170½ — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

5. CRIMINAL LAW — 404 — EVIDENCE — DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE — IDENTIFICATION.

Where the prosecutrix identified capsules shown her by the district attorney as being the ones given her by defendant, and testified that defendant had given them to her in an envelope, that she had taken some, and that those shown her in court had been given by her to the district attorney, the capsules were sufficiently identified to be admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 873, 891-893, 1457; Dec. Dig. — 404.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW — 730 — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTOR.

The district attorney in cross-examining the defendant after securing an admission from him that he had urged prosecutrix to tell her mother of her condition, stated, "but you were too cowardly to tell her yourself." On defendant assigning the question as misconduct, the prosecutor withdrew the statement and the court cautioned him not to make any more remarks of that kind, and instructed the jury to disregard it or any similar remarks. Later the district attorney, after reading to the defendant his testimony before the grand jury, stated "Now that is all the nastiness you repeated in the grand jury, isn't it?" but on objection substituted "That is all the corruption you could think of," and on the court sustaining an objection to that, asked, "That is all the unlawful doing or immoral acts that you could think of at the time you were before the grand jury?" to which objection was again sustained by the court on the ground that the question was an improper and prejudicial characterization of the subject-matter that had been read to the jury. Held, that the conduct of the prosecutor, while improper, does not require a reversal where the evidence was such that in view of the court's action in regard thereto, it cannot be reasonably held that a different verdict might have been reached except for such misconduct.

7. RAPE — 40 — EVIDENCE — OTHER OFFENSES.

In a prosecution for rape where the fact that prosecutrix had borne a child was first brought out by defendant on cross-examination of her, he could not thereafter introduce evidence of another intercourse between her, and as he could have done if her pregnancy had been proved by the prosecution as a circumstance corroborating her story.

8. CRIMINAL LAW — 785 — REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES — POLICE OFFICERS AND DETECTIVES.

It was not error to refuse a requested instruction separately designating the testimony of police officers and detectives, who testified on behalf of the state, and stating a rule of greater strictness in weighing their testimony than in weighing the testimony of other witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1774, 1776-1781, 1889-1894; Dec. Dig. ☞785.]

9. CRIMINAL LAW ☞829—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION OF GIVEN INSTRUCTIONS.

It was not error to refuse a requested instruction on defendant's theory that the prosecution was a trumped-up charge, which instruction stated no rule of law, other than that the evidence concerning his claim should be considered as part of the evidence in the case, and that the burden of proof as to defendant's guilt remains with the prosecution through the case, where that law was entirely covered by the court's instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. ☞829.]

10. CRIMINAL LAW ☞939—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE DISCOVERED AT TRIAL.

Newly discovered evidence consisting of a statement made by prosecutrix to the district attorney inconsistent with portions of her testimony, which became known to the defendant's attorney after the prosecution had rested, does not require a new trial where no request was made for leave to recall the prosecutrix for further cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2318-2323; Dec. Dig. ☞939.]

11. CRIMINAL LAW ☞911, 1156—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—NEW TRIAL.

Motions for a new trial in a criminal case are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling thereon will not be disturbed unless the record shows an abuse of the discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Philip A. Kilfoil was convicted of a rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jennings & Horton and Walter V. Dysert, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape and sentenced to serve a term in the state prison at San Quentin. From the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The indictment charged that the crime was committed by the defendant on an unmarried female person, whom we shall call the prosecutrix, and whose age was under 16 years. The story as contained in the record is a long one, covering three years' acquaintance between these two persons. The prosecutrix testified to facts which, if truly related, are sufficient, together with the abundant corroborating evidence, to sustain the verdict rendered by the jury. The testimony of the defendant and much other evidence was in strong conflict with that relied on by the prosecution. Every fact implied in the verdict and essential to the crime is supported by evidence which the jury might reasonably have believed to be true. Therefore, the verdict must not be disturbed unless the record shows errors which have prevented the defendant from having a fair trial and have thus produced an unjust conviction. The errors assigned and discussed in the principal brief of appellant's counsel and the main points involved therein are hereinafter set forth.

[2] The court did not err in refusing to set aside the indictment. Whatever merits the motion for that purpose might have had, in view of Penal Code rules formerly in force, were eliminated by the legislation of 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 435, 434) amending sections 995 and 895, and repealing sections, 164, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900 and 901 of that Code. We do not find in the decision in People v. Anthony, 20 Cal. App. 586, 129 Pac. 968, anything to support appellant's claim that section 895 of the Penal Code as amended in 1911 should be held to be unconstitutional.

[3] The defendant moved for a continuance of the trial for the purpose of procuring evidence, and the motion was denied. The affidavits on which the motion was based referred to anonymous communications intimating that sundry unnamed persons, while passing the home of the prosecutrix, had heard her crying and declaring that "it wasn't Phil," etc. One of the affidavits is by one Leila Jones, who, five days before the trial, informed defendant's attorney that a similar hearsay statement had been made to her by a girl whose name she did not remember. The affidavits did not state facts which furnished any definite and satisfactory assurance that such witnesses could or would be produced at a later time if the continuance were granted. There was no abuse of discretion in denying this motion. The court was authorized, on the showing made, to find that defendant had not shown sufficient diligence in searching for these witnesses.

[4] The prosecutrix, on her cross-examination, admitted that she had told another girl that she, the prosecutrix, had had improper relations with one Albert Hall, but with no one else. Thereupon a series of questions followed designed to compel admissions that on certain specified occasions the witness had been questioned about her alleged illicit relations with defendant, and that on those occasions she had made statements inconsistent with her testimony on the direct examination at this trial as to the time when she first had any illicit relations with the defendant. It is earnestly contended in the brief for appellant that the defendant was entitled to a cross-examination of the witness on her testimony concerning the time or times when such relations existed, and that such cross-examination was excluded. The record shows, however, that although the objections to the questions as first put to the witness by defendant's counsel were sustained, the witness was later permitted to answer other questions whereby virtually she admitted that she had made the statements referred to in the questions which had first been excluded. Taking the cross-examination in its entirety, it does not seem that any prejudicial error occurred.

[5] On cross-examination of prosecutrix the fact was brought into the record that in March, 1914, she gave birth to a child. The fact of the girl's pregnancy did not become known to her mother until the mother's return in January from a visit in the Eastern states. On redirect examination, being asked about things done by defendant to assist in concealing her condition from the mother, prosecutrix said that he gave her medicine and told her that it would keep her from having a baby. The district attorney exhibited to the witness certain pellets or capsules and asked her whether they were the things called medicine to which she had referred. She said they were; that the defendant had given them to her in an envelope to take home, and she had taken some of them; and that those which were produced in court had been given by her to the district attorney. It is contended that the court erred in admitting these capsules as exhibits, over defendant's objection that no foundation had been laid to authorize their reception as evidence. We think that the identification was sufficient.

[6] During the course of defendant's testimony in his own behalf, he denied that he had given any capsules or pellets to the prosecutrix, or any medicine for the purposes mentioned, and denied that he had ever had any improper relations with her. Also, he testified that at the time when he learned from prosecutrix the fact of her pregnant condition, shortly before her mother's return from the East, she told him that one Ed Hall had given her some medicine and had told her not to worry; that that would bring her out of her trouble all right. On cross-examination of defendant, the district attorney questioned the defendant about the testimony that had been given by him as a voluntary statement before the grand jury, and obtained from him the admission that in that statement before the grand jury defendant had not mentioned the fact now testified to by him concerning the medicine which he said that the prosecutrix claimed to have received from Ed Hall. Defendant said that he did not know why he did not mention this matter to the grand jury, other than that it did not occur to him to tell them. It is complained by his counsel that the mode of cross-examination and statements of the district attorney in conducting this cross-examination were improper. The cross-examination was a long one and at times, was tinged with bitterness of language used by counsel on both sides, as well as by the witness. Appellant's counsel in their brief have directed our attention to 47 pages selected from the transcript, wherein they claim that improper questions and remarks by the district attorney are shown, and we have examined those pages with these criticisms particularly in view. For the most part the charges of misconduct are not sustained, but in some instances they are established. Perhaps the most flagrant example is found at page 299. There, having first obtained an admission from defendant that he had urged the prosecutrix to tell her mother the truth about her condition and had refused to go and help break the news to her mother, the district attorney inquired, "But you were too cowardly to tell her yourself?" Defendant's counsel at once assigned this as misconduct, whereupon the district attorney said, "I withdraw the statement;" and the judge said, "Don't make any more remarks of that kind; the jury are instructed to disregard that remark or any other similar remark of counsel."

Again the district attorney propounded to the defendant a question designed to draw from him the admission that he had given certain testimony before the grand jury. After reading the testimony, of which there were several pages, the district attorney said "Now, that is all the nastiness you repeated in the grand jury, isn't it?" On objection made, the district attorney substituted the words, "That is all the corruption you could think of." The court having sustained an objection, the district attorney modified his question again by saying, "That is all of the unlawful doing or immoral acts that you could think of at the time you were before the grand jury, to tell the grand jury?" The objection was renewed on the same ground, that the question was improper and a prejudicial characterization of the subject-matter that had been read to the witness, and the objection was sustained.

There is no doubt that in these instances, and in some others less pronounced, the district attorney gave examples of conduct very different from that which should characterize the conduct of a prosecuting officer toward the defendant in trying an action of this kind, or in any criminal case. The correct rule of conduct has been insisted upon many times by the Supreme Court and by the district courts of appeal and some verdicts have been set aside on account of flagrant violations of duty in this respect. People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 Pac. 78; People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 136 Pac. 291. In the Fleming case, 166 Cal. 381, 136 Pac. 301, the court said:

"In view of the very grave doubt as to the guilt of the defendant of the crime charged against him, and in view of the nature of the acts charged against defendant as shown by the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution, we are of the opinion that, despite the general instructions of the court to the jury to the effect that they must base their verdict exclusively on the evidence, the conduct of the special prosecutor in the matters we have been discussing, which clearly constitute misconduct on his part, contributed materially to the verdict that was rendered. See People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592 [102 Pac. 266]. So believing, under the circumstances we have heretofore stated, we consider the case one in which section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution contemplates a reversal on account of an error or erroneous procedure resulting in a 'miscarriage of justice.'"

The principle set forth in the foregoing statement is applicable here and the question presented is whether or not there is, upon the whole record including the evidence, such a doubt of the guilt of the defendant, and whether the misconduct complained of bears such an important relation to the entire case that it contributed materially to the verdict that was rendered. Can we say from our examination of the entire case that the errors complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice? Our opinion is that in this case the effect of the misconduct that we have referred to was materially reduced by the rulings of the court, and the instructions then and thereafter given to the jury; and that it cannot reasonably be held that without these actions of the district attorney the verdict would have been different from that which was returned by the jury. It is to be regretted, however, that prosecuting officers should ever so conduct themselves toward a defendant as to give an excuse for raising these questions.

[7] As already noted, the fact that prosecutrix gave birth to a child was first shown by evidence brought out at the instance of the defendant. This was followed by an offer to prove by testimony of the witness Mrs. Frasier that in May or June, 1913, she saw the prosecutrix have intercourse with Albert Hall in a hammock. This testimony was excluded. The ruling was correct. If the fact of pregnancy occurring at the period of time in question had been shown by evidence introduced into the record at the instance of the prosecution, this testimony offered by defendant would have been admissible. The rule is stated in People v. Currie, 14 Cal. App. 67, 111 Pac. 108, as follows:

"It is well settled that in cases of this character, where the prosecutrix is under the age of consent, her relations with other men as tending to show want of chastity are immaterial. Here, however, the district attorney had brought out the fact in chief that she was found to be pregnant after defendant's intercourse with her as she testified, the object being to corroborate her testimony by that important fact. * * * Defendant had a clear right to discredit her testimony by showing on cross-examination whether her pregnancy was due to her relations with defendant, or might not have been caused by some other person."

The defendant could have no better right to show that the prosecutrix became pregnant, and that some other person than defendant was responsible for such pregnancy, than to have shown the mere fact of her intercourse with other men if there had been no subsequent pregnancy.

It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by the defendant. Several of these instructions, though not in the precise words requested, were included in other instructions given by the court. When, under these circumstances, counsel impose upon this court the duty of considering alleged error in the refusal of an instruction, the argument should not be urged without reference to the instructions given on the same proposition, nor as if no such instructions had been given. This is a difficulty that we have to meet in our consideration of many of the appeals presented here in criminal cases, where a little more industry and candor would aid in the proper disposition of cases, and many of the objections that we have to consider as to the refusal of instructions would not be presented at all. For example, it was stipulated that the defendant's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community where he resides, is good. Defendant's counsel complain because the court refused a certain proposed instruction that this fact stipulated must be found as true. After considering this point, and the authority cited, we at last discover among the many instructions given, one wherein the court instructed the jury directly with respect to that stipulation, and did so in language more strongly favorable to the defendant than was asked for by him.

[8] The court did not err in refusing to give an instruction separately designating the testimony of police officers and detectives who testified "on behalf of the state," and stating a rule of greater strictness in weighing their testimony than in weighing the testimony of other witnesses.

[9] The court did not err in refusing a proffered instruction setting forth defendant's theory that the prosecution was a trumped-up charge, the outgrowth of a conspiracy against him. The proposed instruction stated no rule of law other than that the evidence concerning this claim should be considered as part of the evidence in the case, and that the burden of proof as to defendant's guilt remains with the prosecution all through the case. The law on this question was entirely covered by the instructions given by the court to the jury.

[10] It is contended that the court should have granted defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. This newly discovered evidence is set forth in an affidavit of the defendant, and has reference to a statement made by the prosecutrix to the district attorney about one month before the case was tried. Affiant says that this typewritten statement came to his hands on May 27, 1914, which was nine days after rendition of the verdict. He says that "not until after the trial of said cause had been concluded did affiant ever see said statement or know its contents, nor did affiant have access thereto during said trial or before said trial." So far as this shows, defendant may have known that a written statement had been made by the prosecutrix at the time mentioned. If he or his counsel had that knowledge during or before the trial, they had the same right then to have it produced for use in court as they would have for the purposes of a second trial. In their reply brief, counsel for defendant admit that they procured this statement after the prosecution had rested its case. This implies that they had it during the remainder of the trial; yet they did not ask permission to recall the prosecutrix for further cross-examination. Looking at the contents of the statement, we find that the principal use that could have been made of it would have been to show thereby that prosecutrix said that her first act of sexual intercourse with defendant was after the death of his sister Lucy, which death occurred in February, 1913, and that this was inconsistent with her testimony at the trial wherein she said that her illicit relations with the defendant first occurred nearly two years before that time.

[11] Motions for new trial are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed unless the record shows an abuse of this discretion, the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised. "The question as to whether the evidence produced on the motion is such as to render a different result probable is one peculiarly addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, who, in the light of the knowledge afforded by presiding at the trial, is especially qualified to determine as to the probable effect of such evidence." People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 474, 86 Pac. 1100, 1103. In the trial of this case it was shown that there were some inconsistencies between the testimony given by the prosecutrix at the trial and some statements previously made by her. Connected with these same matters, the court might well have been of the opinion that the additional circumstance referred to in this affidavit on motion for new trial would not be sufficient to materially affect the weight that would be given to her testimony by the jury; in other words, that the jury was authorized to believe the essential facts to have been as she stated them to be, and that the inconsistent statement made by her in her statement to Mr. Ford was not likely to throw any new light upon her character and reliability as a witness. However this may be, the failure of appellant to avail himself of his opportunity to use the statement when he discovered it, while the case was still open for evidence, is alone a sufficient reason for denying a new trial, so far as that ground of the motion (and no other was presented) is concerned.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

MINGES v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF MERCED et al.
(Civ. 1374.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1915.)

1. ELECTIONS — 97 — QUALIFICATIONS — REGISTRATION — "ELECTOR."

Under Const. art. 2, § 1, defining "electors" as persons entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law, registration is not a qualification of an elector, and cannot be added to the qualifications fixed by the Constitution, but is to be regarded as a reasonable regulation to ascertain who are qualified electors in order to prevent illegal voting.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Elector.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 108 — ELECTIONS — "ELECTOR" — "QUALIFIED ELECTOR" — "REGISTERED QUALIFIED ELECTOR."

Const. art. 2, § 1, defines electors as persons entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law. Initiative Act 1911 (St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 131) § 1, provides that the petition by which any proposed ordinance may be submitted to the legislative body of a city shall be signed by a certain percentage of the qualified electors, and that within ten days from the filing of such petition the clerk shall ascertain from the records of registration whether the petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and attach a certificate of examination. Pol. Code, § 1083a, as added by St. 1913, p. 225, provides that wherever, by the Constitution or laws, any initiative petition is required to be signed by qualified electors, only a registered qualified elector shall be entitled to sign it. On a petition submitting a proposed ordinance, the city clerk certified, that he had examined the records of registration, and had ascertained that it was signed by the requisite number of qualified electors. Held, that a "qualified elector" was one whose qualifications measured up to the constitutional standard; that a "registered qualified elector" was one possessing the constitutional qualifications, and registered under the registration statute; and that the additional qualification that the signers be registered qualified electors, when ascertained and duly certified, complied with the law.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 108 — ORDINANCES — INITIATIVE — TIME WHEN EFFECTIVE — CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 4, § 1, provides that in the submission of any question to the electors the general laws of the state shall apply, but makes no provision as to when initiative measures proposed by the electors of a city shall take effect. Pol. Code, § 323, declares that every statute, unless a different time is prescribed therein, takes effect on the sixtieth day after its passage. Initiative Act 1911 (St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 131) provides that, if a petition accompanying a proposed ordinance be signed by the requisite number of electors, and contains a request that, if such ordinance be not adopted, it be submitted at a special election, the legislative body shall pass such ordinance within 10 days after it is presented, or call a special election, that on a majority vote it shall go into effect 10 days thereafter, and by section 1 that an election shall be called not less than 30 nor more than 60 days after the presentation of the proposed ordinance. Held, that the fact that the time fixed for a proposed ordinance to take effect was April 1, 1915, and that the result of an election thereon could not be known until after that date, would not prevent its submission to an election, and, if they adopted the ordinance the Initiative Act would determine when the ordinance should be effective.

Mandamus by G. W. Minges against the Board of Trustees of the City of Merced and E. L. Alvord and others, constituting the Board of Trustees of the City of Merced. Peremptory writ to issue.

A. R. Schottky, of Merced, for petitioner.
F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. It is sought by plaintiff to compel defendants by writ of mandamus either to adopt and pass a certain ordinance, or to call a special election at which said ordinance should be submitted to a vote of the electors of said city. No question arises as to the sufficiency of the petition in respect of its form or the number of petitioners, or that they had the right, under the initiative and referendum statute approved January 2, 1912 (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 131), to propose the said ordinance as an initiative measure.

The objections arise on a general demurrer and are: First, that it nowhere appears that the signers of the petition submitting the proposed ordinance were registered qualified electors of the city of Merced at the time they signed said petition; second, that section 10 of the proposed ordinance is in conflict with the initiative and referendum act of 1911, supra.

1. Section 1083a of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 225) provides:

"Wherever, by the Constitution or laws of this state, any initiative, referendum, recall or nominating petition is required to be signed by qualified electors, only an elector who is a registered qualified elector at the time he signs such petition, shall be entitled to sign the same."

In the petition to the board of trustees it is declared that:

"The undersigned, each of whom is a resident and qualified elector of and in the city of Merced, respectfully propose," etc.

The certificate of the city clerk reads as follows:

"State of California, County of Merced, City of Merced—ss.:

"I, J. D. Wood, city clerk of the city of Merced, do hereby certify that the foregoing petition was presented to me on the 19th day of December, 1914; that I have examined the same and from the records of registration, to wit, the great register of said county of Merced, have ascertained that said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors.

"I do further certify that the entire vote cast within said city of Merced for all candidates for Governor of said state at the last preceding general election at which such Governor was voted for was 1,373; that said petition is signed by more than 280 electors, the number of which is not less than 20 per cent. of said entire vote.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said city this 28th day of December, 1914.

"[Seal of Said City.]

"[Signed] J. D. Wood,

"City Clerk of Said City of Merced."

[1] Except certain persons especially mentioned, the Constitution (article 2, § 1) prescribes who are electors; i. e., persons "entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law." The Constitution thus determines the qualifications of an elector, and it was held, in Bergevin v. Curtz, 127 Cal. 86, 59 Pac. 312, that registration is not a qualification of an elector, and cannot add to the qualifications fixed by the Constitution; but it is to be regarded as a reasonable regulation by the Legislature for the purpose of ascertaining who are qualified electors in order to prevent illegal voting.

[2] A qualified elector, then, is a person whose qualifications measure up to the constitutional standard. A registered qualified elector, we take it, is a person who possesses the constitutional qualifications and is registered in accordance with the registration statute.

If the signers of the petition, when they signed the petition, were, in fact, qualified electors as above defined, and if that fact appears by the certificate of the city clerk showing that they are registered, it seems to us the requirements of the statute are fully met. The registered qualified elector entitled to sign the petition and to vote in the city of Merced is a qualified elector whose name appears upon the records of registration, to wit, upon the great register of the county of Merced, at the time he signed the petition. Now, this is precisely what the clerk certified to be the fact, and we cannot see what more should be required to show that the persons signing the petition were at the time "registered qualified electors." It is true the certificate of the clerk might have stated, and perhaps it would have been better if he had so stated, that the great register examined by him was the then and only existing great register of the county. But the petition shows that all the signatures were attached thereto on or subsequent to November 17, 1914, and prior to December 19, 1914, when the petition was presented to the clerk. We must assume that in the discharge of official duty he examined the great register on which the petitioners' names appeared, and that it was the great register then in force.

The initiative act of 1911, supra, in section 1, provides that the petition by which "any proposed ordinance may be submitted to the legislative body of such city or town" shall be "signed by qualified electors of the city or town not less in number than the percentages hereinafter required." The affidavit which the statute provides shall be made respecting each signer must show that he is "a qualified elector of the city or town." The act then provides:

"That within ten days from the date of filing such petition the clerk shall examine, and from the records of registration, ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors and he shall attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination."

It will be observed that the act deals with qualified electors, and says nothing about registered qualified electors. It is only in section 1083a of the Political Code that mention is made of registered qualified electors. This section was added to the Political Code in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 225). It adds nothing to the procedure prescribed by the act of 1911, and only requires that it appear by the certificate of the clerk that the signers to the petition are registered qualified electors. This additional qualification can only be ascertained from the records of registration, to wit, the great register, and, when thus ascertained and duly certified to, the law is, in our opinion, fully complied with. There is nothing in Davenport v. City of Los Angeles, 146 Cal. 508, 80 Pac. 684, casting any doubt upon our conclusion. In that case (which was one of recall of an officer) the law required the clerk to ascertain the number of electors by an inspection of the great register. His certificate failed to show that he ascertained the requisite facts from the great register.

In the view we have taken of the question we are but following the injunction found in the initiative act that:

"All the provisions of this statute are to be liberally construed for the purpose of ascertaining and enforcing the will of the electors."

[3] 2. The proposed ordinance had for its object the regulation, sale, and distribution of alcoholic liquors within the city of Merced and to provide penalties for its violation. Section 10 provides as follows:

"This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on the first day of April, 1915, and any money that shall have been paid to the city of Merced before said date as license money for the sale of alcoholic liquors in said city of Merced after said first day of April, 1915, shall be refunded and repaid to the person or persons who have paid the same."

The initiative act provides that, if the petition accompanying the proposed ordinance be signed by the requisite number of electors, and contains a request that if such ordinance be not adopted it be submitted forthwith to a vote of the people at a special election (the petition made such request), "then the legislative body shall either: (a) Pass such ordinance without alteration at the regular session at which it is presented and within ten days after it is presented; or (b) forthwith the legislative body shall proceed to call a special election at which such ordinance, without alteration, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the city or town."

The alleged conflict between section 10 of the proposed ordinance and the initiative act is claimed to exist in this: That, should the ordinance be submitted to a vote of the people, the initiative act provides, among other things, that:

"If a majority of the qualified electors voting on said proposed ordinance shall vote in favor thereof, such ordinance shall thereupon become a valid and binding ordinance of the city or town, and be considered adopted upon the date that the vote is canvassed and declared by the canvassing board, and go into effect ten days thereafter."

Section 1 of the act provides that:

"When a special election is to be called under the terms of this section, it shall be held not less than thirty nor more than sixty days after the date of the presentation of the proposed ordinance to the legislative body, and shall be held as nearly as may be in accordance with the election laws of the state."

Respondent points out that, if the election had been called within the shortest time possible, the election would have been called on February 4, 1915; that, "under section 1278 of the Political Code, the canvassing board would have met on the 8th day of February, 1915, and the ordinance would have gone into effect on the 18th day of February, 1915; such a result," continues the brief, "would be in direct conflict with the provisions of the ordinance, which are to the effect that the ordinance shall not take effect until the 1st day of April, 1915." Hence the invalidity of the ordinance, for the reason that neither the municipality has power, nor have the people by initiative, to pass an ordinance in conflict with the general law. The conclusion reached by respondents is that in all cases where ordinances are proposed under the powers reserved to the electors through the initiative by section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution, the proposed ordinance should be silent as to when it is to take effect, leaving the initiative act to fix the date; in short, that the electors have no power to say when the proposed ordinance shall take effect, and in doing so the ordinance would be invalid.

The Constitution makes no provision as to the time when acts of the Legislature shall go into effect. Undoubtedly the Legislature may designate the time. When it fails to do so, the Political Code (section 323) declares:

"Every statute, unless a different time is prescribed therein, takes effect on the sixtieth day after its passage."

The Constitution (section 1, art. 4) reads:

"The legislative power of this state shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly which shall be designated 'the Legislature of the state of California,' but the people reserve to themselves the power to propose laws and amendments to the Constitution, and to adopt or reject the same, at the polls independent of the Legislature, and also reserve the power, at their * * * option, to * * * adopt or reject any act, or section or part of any act, passed by the Legislature. 'The enacting clause of every law shall be 'the people of the state of California do enact as follows.' The first power reserved to the people shall be known as the initiative."

Then follow provisions prescribing the mode of exercising this power, reserved to the people generally, in respect of enacting general laws to be voted upon by the qualified electors of the state. The Constitution then reads:

"The initiative and referendum powers of the people are hereby further reserved to the electors of each county, city and county, city and town of the state, to be exercised under such procedure as may be provided by law. * * * In the submission to the electors of any measure under this section, all officers shall be guided by the general laws of this state, except as is herein otherwise provided. This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the powers herein reserved."

The Legislature, by the act of 1911, supra, provided for the procedure for the exercise of the power to initiate measures by counties, cities, and towns, but nothing in the act was intended to limit or restrict the power given by the Constitution, and the Constitution expressly forbids any limitation or restriction on the power by the enactment of legislation. The power to initiate legislative measures reserved to the electors of counties, cities, and towns (except in cities or cities and counties having charters adopted under the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution) is as comprehensive as the power residing in the Legislature. The Constitution makes no provision as to when initiative measures proposed by the people of the state or by the electors of a county, city, or town, shall take effect.

The power to initiate a measure for the government of the people of a county, city, or town carries with it the power to prescribe when it shall go into effect, the same as the power to enact a law by the Legislature implies the power to fix the time when it shall take effect. The statute, as we have seen (Pol. Code, § 323), fixes the time when the Legislature has failed to do so. The initiative act of 1911, supra, in our opinion, was intended to accomplish a like object in cases where an ordinance proposed by the electors of a county, city, or town fails to prescribe the time when it is to take effect. The act does not, in words, as does the Political Code, provide that the ordinance shall go into effect at a specified time "unless a different time is prescribed therein," but, fairly construed, we think this is its meaning. The suggestion of respondent that, if the time can be fixed by the proposed ordinance for it to take effect, the date might be postponed to some remote period a decade hence, presupposes that the electors may incorporate an unreasonable or absurd provision on this subject. The power is not to be measured by the possibility of its being abused. We must assume a reasonable exercise of it by the electors.

The power residing in the Legislature to declare when its acts shall take effect is open to the same objection now urged respecting the power to initiate measures, but no one could question its exercise by the Legislature. As the power to initiate legislative measures is as comprehensive as the power residing in the Legislature, the power to say when an act shall take effect resides alike in both the Legislature and in the electors when proceeding by the initiative.

In the present case the time fixed for the ordinance to take effect is April 1, 1915. Obviously, should respondents refuse to adopt the proposed ordinance and resort to the alternative of submitting it "forthwith" to the electors, the result cannot be known until after April 1, 1915. But this, we think, should not prevent its submission to a vote at the polls. The provision as to its taking effect would be inoperative, and the statute would fix the time. The main object to be achieved by the electors in proposing the ordinance was to bring about the regulation of the liquor traffic, and that object may not be thwarted by obstructions which it is within the power of the board of trustees or by the electors resorting to the referendum or otherwise to interpose, and thus making inoperative the provision fixing the time when the ordinance shall take effect. The reasonable view to take of such a situation, and one warranted, we think, by canons of construction, is that resort must be had to the initiative act itself to determine when, if adopted by the board of trustees or by the electors at the polls, the ordinance shall take effect. Any other construction would make easy the defeat of every measure proposed by the initiative in which the time is fixed for it to take effect.

Our conclusion is that the peremptory writ should issue as prayed for, and that respondents should either adopt the ordinance or forthwith submit it to a vote of the electors of the city of Merced in accordance with the requirements of the initiative act; and it is so ordered.

In an action to recover a deposit by the purchaser on a land contract which the vendor's agent had returned to the purchaser, a finding that the objections of the purchaser to the title were not good or valid, and that the title to the property was good and merchantable, was equivalent to a finding that the objections, even if sufficient on their face to warrant the refusal of the property, were not true in fact, since the word "merchantable," though ordinarily used in connection with mercantile contracts to signify the salability of goods, was used in such finding as synonymous with "marketable," and a "marketable title" to real property is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as a matter of law or fact, a good and perfect title, and a "good and perfect title" has been defined to be one which is apparently and in fact free from any reasonable objections.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Jessie B. Agnew and another against J. M. Nelson and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert R. Syer, C. L. Witten, and Owen D. Richardson, all of San Jose, and P. A. Bergerot, of San Francisco, for appellants. Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted by the plaintiffs against the defendant Nelson to recover the sum of $1,000. The plaintiffs' cause of action rested upon a common count for moneys had and received. The defendant Nelson by his answer denied having received any money for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs, and pleaded as a further defense the execution of a contract by himself, as the agent of the plaintiffs, with one B. Cassou for the purchase and sale of certain real estate for an agreed price, under the terms of which the defendant received from Cassou the sum of $1,000 as a deposit and as part payment on the purchase price of the property. The defendant's answer further alleged that the contract of purchase and sale provided that, if the plaintiffs' title to the property which was the subject-matter of the contract did not prove good, the deposit and part payment of $1,000 was to be returned to Cassou, that the plaintiffs' title to the property was found to be defective, and that therefore Cassou demanded of the said defendant the return of the $1,000. Because of these facts the answer of the defendant Nelson averred that the rights of all of the parties to the transaction in suit could not be fully and rightfully determined without the presence of Cassou as a party to the action. Accordingly Cassou was made a party defendant.

The defendant Nelson counterclaimed against Cassou in the sum of $1,000 for services alleged to have been rendered the latter. Cassou, answering the plaintiffs' complaint and the cross-complaint of the defendant Nelson, averred that under the terms and conditions of the contract of purchase and sale he was entitled to a return of the $1,000 paid by him to the defendant Nelson, because of certain defects in the plaintiffs' title to the property, which defects, it was alleged, had been in writing specifically called to the attention of the plaintiffs. Incidentally Cassou counterclaimed against the defendant Nelson; but, inasmuch as the issues raised as between these defendants by their respective pleadings are not involved upon this appeal, they need not be narrated. It will be noted that, of the several objections alleged to have been originally made to the plaintiffs' title to the property by Cassou, only two were alleged in his answer to be in actual existence and not removed at the time of the commencement of the action.

The trial court found that these two objections were not "good or valid" and that the said title to said property was good and merchantable." Judgment was entered for the plaintiffs and against the defendant Nelson for the sum of $1,000. The judgment declared that:

"The claim of the defendant Cassou was without right, and that he had forfeited to the plaintiffs the $1,000 deposited with and paid to the defendant Nelson under the terms of the contract."

Both defendants have appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] The only point made in support of the appeals is that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment because the court failed in so many words to find whether or not the two alleged unremoved and existing objections finally interposed by the defendant Cassou to the plaintiffs' title to the real property involved in the transaction were true and well founded at the time the plaintiffs tendered and the defendant Cassou refused to accept a deed to the property. The evidence upon which the findings are based not being before us, we are unable to say whether or not the objections made to plaintiffs' title were good or valid, and in the absence of the evidence the finding that such objections were not good or valid will be deemed to be correct. But, conceding that the objections to plaintiffs' title finally interposed and relied upon by the defendant Cassou would have been, if true in fact, sufficient to have warranted him in refusing to conclude the purchase of the property, still we are of the opinion that the findings as a whole are to the effect that such objections had no foundation in fact.

The finding that those objections were not "good or valid" must be considered and construed in connection with the further finding that "the said title to said property was good and merchantable." The word "merchantable" is usually, if not exclusively, employed in mercantile contracts, and, strictly speaking, signifies the salability of merchandise with regard to "quality or medium quality of goodness." Pacific Elevator Co. v. Bravinder, 14 Wash. 315, 44 Pac. 544; Riggs v. Armstrong, 23 W. Va. 760. We have no doubt, however, that the word "merchantable," as used in the findings of the trial court, was, under the circumstances of the present case, intended to be, and may fairly be said to be, synonymous with the word "marketable" as usually applied and ordinarily understood when used with reference to the title to real property. A "marketable title" to real property is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as a matter of law or of fact. Herman v. Somers, 158 Pa. 424, 27 Atl. 1050, 38 Am. St. Rep. 851. In other words, a "marketable title" is a "good and perfect title"; and a good and perfect title has been defined to be one which is apparently and in fact free from any reasonable objection. Peckham v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 147, 31 Pac. 928. The nonexistence in point of fact of the two objections interposed to the plaintiffs' title would be not only consistent with, but follow as a necessary inference from, the findings as made. This being so, we may construe the findings as a whole to mean that the plaintiffs' title was in fact free from valid existing objections. Emmal v. Webb, 36 Cal. 197.

[3] The issue as to the actual existence of valid objections to plaintiffs' title was made by the answer of the defendant Cassou, which among other things alleged "that some of the said defects were still in existence on or about May 27, 1912"; and the burden was upon the defendant Cassou to show, not only valid, but subsisting, objections to plaintiffs' title. Maupin's Marketable Title, 784.

[4] The appeals having been taken upon the judgment roll, we must assume that, if an express finding as to the existence of the alleged defects in plaintiffs' title was necessary, the trial court failed to so find because of the absence of any evidence upon that issue of the case. Shirey's Estate, 167 Cal. 193, 138 Pac. 994; Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 150 Cal. 734, 89 Pac. 1108.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re McCAUSLAND'S ESTATE.
(S. F. 6987.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1915.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 17—PERSONS ENTITLED TO LETTERS—DISQUALIFICATION—ADVERSE INTEREST.

The fact that a sister of an intestate decedent who had, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, a preferential right, over the niece, to letters of administration was not seeking the appointment in good faith to preserve the assets, which consisted principally of a claim against the sister's daughter, does not show a want of integrity on her part, which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1369, would disqualify her, especially where no direct issue was raised by opposition to her petition, and the court cannot add to the disqualifications prescribed by that section, but must grant the letters to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 43-59; Dec. Dig. 17.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Separate applications by Anna W. Grayson and another for appointment as administratrix of the estate of William McCausland, deceased. From an order denying the petition of Anna W. Grayson and appointing the other, the petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Elmer W. Kilgore, of Santa Rosa, and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, amici curiæ, for appellant. Phil Ware and W. F. Cowan, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. William McCausland died intestate in Sonoma county in May, 1912. On January 15, 1914, his niece filed a petition for letters of administration upon the estate of her uncle. She declared the character and value of this estate to be a claim against Rebecca M. Caughey for $6,500. About 10 days thereafter a sister of the deceased, Anna W. Grayson, who was also the mother of Rebecca M. Caughey, filed her written opposition to the petition. She denied that the deceased had left any estate whatever, "except a few practically worthless effects," and she also filed her petition to be appointed administratrix. The petitions were heard at the same time, and the court made its order appointing the niece administratrix, dismissing the opposition of Anna W. Grayson and denying her petition.

Under section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure the sister of the deceased had a preferential statutory right to this appointment (subdivision 5) over the niece (subdivision 7). No formal opposition to the petition of the sister was filed. No finding is made by the court upon which its order denying the petition of the sister is based. This court, reading the evidence, reached the conclusion and expressed it in its former opinion upon this appeal, that the application of the sister was not made in good faith and for the best interest of the estate, the showing in this regard being partly evidentiary and partly argumentative. In brief, the niece's testimony was to the effect that shortly before his death her uncle had $6,500 in the Cloverdale bank; that he drew $3,000 of this money and loaned it to one Pinschower—

"and the result of the transaction was that Rebecca M. Caughey got the mortgage from Pinschower executed to her in her own name for the amount of $3,000, which was loaned by my uncle to Pinschower. Rebecca M. Caughey never turned this money over to my uncle. My uncle was old and feeble and a man of very frugal habits, and spent very little money. He was unable to attend to business and had great trust in my cousin Rebecca M. Caughey, and in her mother, Anna W. Grayson, and they always claimed that they would care for him and advise him."

Upon this evidence the contention and argument of the niece's attorney was as follows:

"We claim that Rebecca Caughey and her mother, Mrs. Grayson, conspired to get William McCausland's money, and that Mrs. Grayson is now seeking to be appointed administratrix solely for the purpose of denying the petitioner, Amy McCausland Bower, an adequate remedy against Rebecca Caughey and Anna W. Grayson, and that Mrs. Grayson is lacking in integrity, and is not competent for that reason to serve as administratrix in this estate."

The view of this court first expressed was to the effect that the judge in probate was justified, under the facts and circumstances shown, in denying the petition of the sister, upon the ground that she was not seeking in good faith to preserve and administer the estate of her deceased brother. The petition for rehearing was granted for the consideration of the argument advanced that the Code of Civil Procedure itself, in section 1369, has specifically defined all of the acts and facts justifying a refusal to issue letters to one otherwise entitled to receive them under section 1365; that it was not permissible for the court in probate, nor yet for this court, to add any grounds of incompetency or disqualification other than those expressed in the statute; that this had repeatedly been declared, and specifically in Estate of Brundage, 141 Cal. 538, 75 Pac. 175, where it is said, "Our statute prescribes the grounds of disqualification, and the courts have no right to add to the disqualifications prescribed by statute;" that to the same effect are the decisions of this court in Re Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. 178, 532, and in Re Carmody, 88 Cal. 616, 26 Pac. 373; that in the last-mentioned case the specific finding of the court was to the effect that the husband, seeking letters upon the estate of his wife, was incompetent because "the said application of said John Carmody is made, not in good faith, but for the purpose of obtaining possession of the estate of deceased for his own, and to deprive the heirs and creditors of said estate from any participation therein, and that said John Carmody is wanting in integrity in that regard"; that notwithstanding this finding, this court declared that the fact that the court in probate found that the application was not made in good faith, in that the husband claimed all the estate for his own, did not show such a lack of integrity as to disqualify the petitioner under section 1365, Code of Civil Procedure. And, finally, it is argued, that under the Estate of Gordon, 142 Cal. 125, 75 Pac. 672, neither the trial court nor this court, in the absence of a direct issue raised upon the question of incompetency, is entitled to find and pass upon the matter merely because of the appearance in the record of such evidence as is here presented, tending to reflect upon the bona fides of petitioner's application.

We are of the opinion that this reasoning, under our statutes and decisions, is unanswerable; that the court in probate therefore erroneously granted letters to the niece, and erroneously denied the petition of the sister. In conclusion it may be added that the law affords ample remedies to all parties interested in the estate against the acts of any administrator who may be found not to have the best interests of the estate at heart. In the first instance, they will be protected by an adequate bond exacted of the administrator, and in the next, he is subject to prompt removal for any unwarranted failure to recover and preserve the estate's assets.

The decree appealed from is reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by S. G. Sparks against M. V. Mauk and another, and M. V. Mauk and another, jointly and severally, doing business under the name and style of the Santa Clara Grain & Fuel Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant M. V. Mauk appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal and Wm. F. James, both of San Jose, for appellant. H. C. Jones, of San Jose, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, who had been the owner of a fuel and feed business in the town of Santa Clara, sold that business to F. P. Mauk and son. Mauk and son, in turn, sold it to Mrs. M. V. Mauk. Plaintiff held the note of defendant F. P. Mauk and F. V. Foster for the sum of $1,000, and began suit upon this note, attaching the business of appellant. Negotiations followed this suit, and the parties entered into an agreement, by the terms of which plaintiff was to repurchase the business, paying therefor $1,085, and the value of the stock on hand. The note in suit was to be received as payment upon this $1,085 to the extent of $1,027.50. M. V. Mauk and F. P. Mauk both agreed to refrain from engaging in like business for the period of five years. The plaintiff tendered the note and the small sum of money sufficient to make the $1,085. He dismissed the attachment, and would have dismissed the suit, saving that it was allowed to linger at the instance of Mauk while the matter of the costs of the suit were being adjusted with Foster, comaker of the note with Mauk. Plaintiff took possession of and conducted the business, had a valuation put upon the stock on hand, grain, fuel, etc., and tendered this amount, which was rejected. He then began this action to enforce the contract, and was awarded a temporary injunction. From this judgment M. V. Mauk appeals.

[1] It is asserted that there is a variance between the allegations and the proofs. The variance is immaterial, in no way affecting any of the substantial matters in controversy, and is susceptible of correction by an amendment to the complaint.

[2] It is next asserted that the contract contemplated a signing by both parties; that plaintiff did not sign; that the contract is not complete, and therefore unenforceable. It is the undoubted rule that, where the contract contemplates the execution of it by signing, either party has the right to insist upon the condition, and mere acts of performance upon the part of one who has not signed will not validate the contract. Tewsbury v. O'Connell, 21 Cal. 60; Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797.

[3] But in this case plaintiff had changed his condition by the abandonment of his action, and by the dismissal of the attachment, and by the surrender of the promissory note, and appellant had accepted these benefits. Plaintiff, moreover, had taken possession of the property, and was conducting the business; and this case, therefore, is brought within the exception to the rule above mentioned. There is here shown not a mere voluntary compliance with the conditions of the contract by one who has not previously assented to it. There is distinctly shown part performance under it by both parties, and an accession to its terms by both parties. Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 670, 41 Pac. 797; Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 26 Pac. 515; Lowber v. Connit, 36 Wis. 183. Such an accession to the terms of the contract and such a performance under it as is here shown would make it inequitable to permit appellant to avail herself of this defense, and she is estopped from doing so under familiar principles. Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 408; White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 104, 77 Pac. 828; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Fresno Flume Co., 161 Cal. 466, 119 Pac. 646, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322.

Appellant's apparent reason for refusing to proceed with the contract was that the amount tendered for the stock of grain, fuel, etc., on hand was not sufficient. Plaintiff produced evidence, however, establishing that the amount which he tendered was not alone the full market value, but in excess of the market value of the stock.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Where the driver of an automobile was intoxicated at the time plaintiff was riding with him and injured in a collision with defendant's automobile, and plaintiff knew of the driver's intoxication, error in admitting evidence of the driver's intemperate habits, and of his having frequently driven in an intoxicated condition, unable to control the machine, was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Thomas Lynn against J. W. Goodwin. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rogers, Bloomingdale & Free, of San Jose, for appellant. Wright & Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco, and Louis Oneal and James P. Sex, both of San Jose, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sought damages for personal injuries to himself arising out of an automobile collision. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the findings of the court were that P. W. Metcalf was driving the car in which plaintiff was seated; that Metcalf approached a wagon with a large load of brush; that the load of brush was nine feet or more in width and obstructed the view of Metcalf and plaintiff and prevented them from seeing the roadway in front; that they turned to the left to pass this load of brush and collided with defendant's automobile. This automobile was in all respects being carefully and prudently handled, saving that it was being driven at a speed of about 25 miles an hour. Metcalf was driving his automobile at about 20 miles an hour. The collision would probably have taken place if defendant's automobile had been traveling at a rate of speed of 20 miles an hour. The collision would not have taken place if Metcalf had not driven his automobile to the extreme westerly side of the road and across the pathway which was being followed by the automobile of defendant. The automobile of defendant was at the extreme right-hand part of the road, where it should have been. Metcalf's recklessness in driving was the direct, proximate, and primary cause of the collision, and Metcalf, when so driving, and when the accident occurred, was under the influence of liquor and was drunk. Plaintiff, his companion, knew this, and a reasonably prudent person would not have ridden in the automobile with Metcalf in his condition of inebriety.

[1] Evidence of Metcalf's intemperate habits was admitted, and also evidence that in times past he had frequently driven in an intoxicated condition and had been subject to seizures when at the wheel which temporarily made him helpless and unable to control his machine. It is argued that the admission of this evidence was incompetent. Without passing upon this question, suffice it to say that it was not injurious, for the evidence was abundant that, at the time of the accident, Metcalf was under the influence of liquor, and plaintiff must have known it.

[2] While it is true that in general the negligence of the driver of a vehicle is not imputable to a passenger so as to bar that passenger's right of recovery (Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction, 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1059), yet the conduct of the plaintiff in riding and in continuing to ride in an automobile when he must have known that the driver was intoxicated established independent negligence upon the plaintiff's part, apart from the driver's negligence, barring the right of recovery (Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction, supra, 149 Cal. 137, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1059; Meenagh v. Buckmaster, 26 App. Div. 451, 50 N. Y. Supp. 85; *Read v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Error, if any, in failing to admonish the jury in the manner prescribed for each adjournment by Pen. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Glenn Witt was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from the judgment and denial of his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Clyde E. Cate and Hocker, Morris & Austin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clark, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Appellant, Glenn Witt, and one Oxnam were jointly informed against for the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed December 22, 1914. They were tried separately, and appellant, having been convicted of murder in the first degree, was, on January 21, 1915, adjudged to suffer death. This is an appeal from such judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is not claimed that appellant is not guilty of the offense of which he has been convicted. In view of the record, such a claim would be without warrant. According to his own admissions made shortly after his arrest, and his own testimony given on the trial, appellant and Oxnam burglariously entered the house of deceased, William M. Alexander, in Los Angeles, at about 2 o'clock on the morning of December 22, 1914, for the purpose of committing larceny therein. They obtained access to the house through a window on the ground floor, and, having gone upstairs, went into the room occupied by deceased and his wife. The attention of Mrs. Alexander was attracted by some noise made by them, and she awakened her husband. Upon the flashing on of the electric light by the latter, appellant and Oxnam were discovered. Even then the two men persisted in their efforts to take and carry away the valuables of deceased; Oxnam attempting to hold Alexander at bay with a revolver which he had brought with him, while appellant was searching for articles of value. In the struggle which ensued between Alexander and members of his family, on the one hand, and appellant and Oxnam, on the other, Oxnam shot and killed the deceased. The appellant himself did not have a pistol. Both men escaped from the house, but were shortly after apprehended in a room where they had taken refuge. They were identified beyond question as the two burglars, and the case is one where guilt is shown beyond the question of a doubt, even without the admissions and testimony of appellant. But, as we have said, the testimony of appellant himself convicts him of murder in the first degree. Although he did not himself fire the fatal shot, he was at the time engaged with Oxnam in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate the burglary, was a principal therein, and was equally guilty with Oxnam in the eyes of the law of any act committed by the latter in and about the prosecution of the burglarious scheme of himself and Oxnam. Our statute expressly providing that any murder "which is committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary or mayhem, is murder of the first degree" (section 189, Pen. Code) makes this a case where no other verdict than that of guilty of murder of the first degree could properly have been rendered. As said by this court in People v. Milton, 145 Cal. 169, 78 Pac. 549, the law in such cases as this has declared to the malefactor:

"If in your perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem you shall take the life of a fellow being, intentionally or unintentionally, your crime is murder of the first degree. The killing may be willful, deliberate, and premeditated, or it may be absolutely accidental. In either case, you are equally guilty. The elements of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation are not indispensable to your crime. The murder, under section 187 of the Penal Code, is established, in that the killing is unlawful, it having been perpetrated in the performance or attempt to perform one of these felonies, and the malice of the abandoned and malignant heart is shown from the very nature of the crime you are attempting to commit."

A review of the record shows that there was in the proceedings no error affecting any substantial right of the appellant. In the light of the admitted facts, the various points made by counsel for appellant appear trivial and inconsequential.

[2] The information charged the defendants with the crime of murder, committed as follows:

"That the said Glenn Witt and Charles E. T. Oxnam, on the 22d day of December, 1914, at and in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought kill and murder one William M. Alexander, a human being," contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute, etc.

Concededly, this describes the offense of murder in the language of our statute, and is in accord with a form approved over and over again by this court. It is claimed, however, that it does not sufficiently allege the kind of murder proved in this case, viz., one committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, one of the felonies specified in section 189, Penal Code. Whatever may be the rule declared by some cases from other jurisdictions, it must be accepted as the settled law of this state that it is sufficient to charge the offense of murder in the language of the statute defining it, whatever the circumstances of the particular case. As said in People v. Soto, 63 Cal. 165:

"The information is in the language of the statute defining murder, which is: 'Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought.' Pen. Code, § 187. Murder, thus defined, includes murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree. It has many times been decided by this court that it is sufficient to charge the offense committed in the language of the statute defining it. As the offense charged in this case includes both degrees of murder, the defendant could be legally convicted of either degree warranted by the evidence."

Under our decisions there is no ground for distinction in this regard between the class of murder in the first degree here involved and any other class. People v. Hyndmann, 99 Cal. 1, 33 Pac. 782, does not decide otherwise. Our simplified system of pleading in criminal cases has been in use for many years, and we think it may safely be said that it has not been found that defendants have, in fact, been without sufficient notice of the nature of the charge against them to enable them to make such defense as they had. It is certain that in the case at bar no such claim could be made, in view of the fact that the facts proved against appellant were precisely those which he had admitted before the trial and to which he testified on the trial. Of course, if it should appear in any case that a defendant was, in fact, surprised by the theory of the prosecution as developed on the trial, a trial court would undoubtedly grant him such time as was reasonably necessary to make his defense.

In view of what has already been said, it is clear that the trial court did not err in instructing the jury substantially that, where the killing is done in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate one of the felonies specified in section 189, Penal Code, the jury has no option but to find the killing to be murder in the first degree. We find no substantial error in any of the other instructions.

[3] The record shows that during the examination of one of the witnesses a juror asked to be excused for a minute, and the court answered, "Yes," whereupon the juror went "into the anteroom, and returned in two or three minutes," whereupon the court directed the trial to proceed. Apparently, while no adjournment was taken, no proceedings were had during the absence of the juror. It is admitted that, when the juror was thus allowed to absent himself, no admonition was given to him or to the other jurors, and that no officer accompanied said juror. There is no pretense that any objection was made by defendant at the time. It is urged on these facts that the jury was allowed to separate during the trial of the case, and that such separation must be held to have been prejudicial to appellant. It is not claimed that the trial court had placed the jury in charge of an officer, and under our statute (section 1121, Pen. Code) the jury are permitted to separate at adjournments and recesses until the case is submitted to them for decision, unless the court, in its discretion, orders them kept together in charge of an officer during the progress of the trial. Of course, a separation would be improper after the jury has been placed in charge of an officer or after submission of the cause to the jury, or at any time while evidence was actually being received, and the cases cited by appellant from this state are all cases of this character. There was no forbidden separation here. See People v. Coyne, 116 Cal. 297, 48 Pac. 218.

[4] The only possible error here was the failure of the court to admonish the jurors when one was allowed to retire for a moment, in the manner prescribed for each adjournment by section 1122, Penal Code, as to not talking about the case or allowing any one else to talk to them about it, etc. Under the circumstances, no one probably thought of the necessity of such an admonition for this brief retirement of one of the jurors into another room. If error was committed here, it must be said of it, as was said in People v. Coyne, supra, of the failure of the court to so admonish the jury upon an adjournment, that the error is technical, and not of the importance to demand a reversal of the judgment and a new trial. Especially is this true in view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. It would be most unreasonable to assume that any prejudice was suffered by appellant by reason thereof.

[5] Appellant was personally present when judgment of death was pronounced on January 21, 1915, the judgment decreeing substantially that he suffer the penalty of death; that he be delivered into the custody of the warden of the state prison at Folsom; and that the sentence be executed by said warden on a date to be thereafter fixed by the court. Subsequently, the judge, as required by section 1217, Penal Code, signed a warrant, appointing a day on which the judgment was to be executed, and directing the sheriff to deliver the defendant to the warden of the state prison for execution. Appellant was not present at the time the judge so appointed the day for execution. It is now claimed that appellant was entitled to be present when the day of execution was fixed. Under our statute, the fixing of the time for the execution of the judgment is no part of the judgment. That is to be done in the warrant signed by the judge and attested by the clerk after the judgment is given. The judgment here was complete and valid without any appointment of such time, and, of course, could not be reversed for the reasons urged, even if appellant's contention that he was entitled to be present, at the fixing of the time be well based. But we think there is no force in the contention. It has been substantially held that under our statutes his presence at the signing and attesting of the warrant is not contemplated or required (People v. Flannelly, 128 Cal. 94, 60 Pac. 670), and we see no reason to doubt the correctness of this view. The question here is probably, however, of no practical importance, for the reason that the time fixed has passed without the execution of the judgment by reason of this appeal. An order for the execution of the judgment at a specified time must be made by the court under section 1227, Penal Code, before it can now be executed, and by express provision of that section appellant is entitled to be present at the time of the making of any such order. See People v. Chew Lan Ong, 141 Cal. 553, 75 Pac. 186, 99 Am. St. Rep. 88.

[6] Finally it is urged that the trial court erred in refusing to permit testimony to be given by appellant and his mother with reference to his character and previous habits. It is not claimed that the offered testimony was relevant or material on the issue of either guilt or degree of crime, but simply that, inasmuch as the jury had the right to assess the punishment in the event of conviction at either death or life imprisonment, appellant was entitled to have admitted for their consideration evidence as to matters not otherwise relevant or material. We are of the opinion that our law does not contemplate any such independent inquiry on a trial for murder, and that the determination of the jury, under the provisions of section 190, Penal Code, as to death or life imprisonment, is necessarily to be based solely on such evidence as is admissible on the issues made by the indictment or information and the plea of the defendant. But, if we assume otherwise, we are nevertheless satisfied from an examination of the record that it cannot be held that defendant was denied the opportunity by any ruling of the trial court of showing any extenuating fact or circumstance that could have properly affected the verdict. So far as he himself was concerned, he fully testified as to his condition the evening of the homicide, said that he had no place to sleep, was "broke," out of work, had no supper that evening. His answers to the remaining two or three questions to which objections were sustained could not have added to the effect of this. The only other witness on this branch was appellant's mother, who testified as to her age, that of the appellant, and her own occupation. Objections were sustained to questions asking her how long has it been since appellant resided with her and his father, whether the father was still living, what occupation appellant has followed during the last year, what his education had been, when she herself came to Los Angeles. No statement was made as to the object of these questions, or what it was expected to show thereby. We cannot perceive that they had any legitimate bearing on any question to be determined by the jury, and can see no reason to assume that answers to the same could have affected the verdict in any way.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In re WASSERMAN'S ESTATE.

WASSERMAN v. JONES.

(S. F. 7172.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1915.)

1. WILLS $\hookrightarrow$ 34—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—UN SOUNDNESS OF MIND.

The rule of law is not that no person who is insane may make a valid will, but that the will of no person who, by reason of insanity, is incapable of making a valid testamentary disposition shall be upheld.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-73; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 34.]

2. WILLS $\hookrightarrow$ 55—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—JUDICIAL DUTY.

Whether a testator's unsoundness of mind amounts to incapacity to make a will must be determined by the court upon its own responsibility, though his whole neighborhood believes him to be of unsound mind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 137-158, 161; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 55.]

3. WILLS $\hookrightarrow$ 55—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On the trial of a will contest, where it appeared that there was insanity in the testator's family, and the testimony of witnesses and entries by the testator in his diary showed that he entertained strange beliefs, delusions, and hallucinations; that he thought waiters and saloon keepers were trying to poison him; that wireless electricity was shooting violet rays through him, instigated by his enemies; that a former employer, a railroad company, sought to destroy him, and had detectives pursuing him, who entered his house and stole articles; that the company instructed its engineer to blow steam as they passed the neighborhood where his property was situated; that the steam would be carried by electric waves and give him a shock; that a lemon given him by a neighbor was poisoned; and that he was visibly nervous, wild-eyed, distressed, and irrational—a verdict against the validity of the will was warranted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 137-158, 161; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 55.]

4. WILLS $\hookrightarrow$ 54—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—EVIDENCE.

On the issue of testamentary capacity, the jury might properly consider the facts that the testator, who was unmarried, committed suicide, and that he left his little property away from his aged mother and his brothers, from whom he had not been estranged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 131-134, 136; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 54.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Proceeding to prove the will of Victor H. Wasserman, deceased, contested by Sophia F. Wasserman. From a decree on a verdict against the validity of the will, and from an order denying a new trial, the proponent, Horace C. Jones, appeals. Affirmed.

Nowlin, Fassett & Little, of San Francisco, for appellant. Joseph P. Lucey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a contest over the admission to probate of the will of Victor H. Wasserman, deceased. At the time of his death he was 45 years of age. He had never married and left surviving him his mother, two brothers, and one sister. He had been employed as a railway freight clerk in the offices of the Southern Pacific Company, but some time prior to his death was obliged to cease his employment on account of ill health. He invested his savings in a six-acre tract of land in Santa Clara county, and devoted his time to planting this land to orchard trees. Before his death he was despondent over his lack of money. In March, 1914, he committed suicide by hanging. His body was found in a barren spot near the reservoir on Twin Peaks in the city and county of San Francisco. While his death was caused by the strangulation of hanging, he had also stabbed himself. In his hat, found alongside his body, was an olographic will in language as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal. Mar. 9 '14.

"Being of sound mind, I will my (6 1-5) six and one fifth acres in Santa Clara county to Horace C. Jones of Berkeley.

"Victor H. Wasserman."

Its date was the day preceding the testator's self-destruction. The beneficiary under his will and the proponent thereof, Horace C. Jones, was a friend of the deceased of several years' standing and had been engaged with him in the same general employment in the Southern Pacific Company, had interested himself in the deceased's affairs and made many week-end visits to the deceased's property in Santa Clara county. The deceased was not an infrequent guest at the home and at the table of the proponent. The contest of this will instituted by the mother of the deceased was based upon the mental incapacity of the deceased to execute a will by reason of his insanity. The issue was tried before a jury, which returned its verdict against the validity of the will upon the ground indicated. Form the decree which followed and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, Horace C. Jones, the proponent, appeals.

[1,2] In the consideration of this appeal we have in mind the principles of law and the decisions upon them governing the question of the mental capacity requisite to the making of a valid testamentary disposition of property, such principles as that declared in Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 168, 113 Pac. 133, where it is said:

"The rule of law is not that no person who is insane may make a valid will, but that the will of no person who, by reason of insanity, is incapable of making valid testamentary disposition shall be upheld"

—and the language of In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 655, 48 Pac. 799, where this court say:

"A man may be of unsound mind, and his whole neighborhood may declare him so. But whether that unsoundness amounts to incapacity for a discharge of the important duty of making a final disposal of his property is a question which the court must determine upon its own responsibility."

[3] The contention of the appellant is that while the deceased labored under certain delusions or hallucinations, they were not such, nor of such character, as to impair his capacity to make a will; that the evidence did not establish a general mental unsoundness (as distinguished from the mere indulgence in one or another form of delusion) which was sufficient to justify the jury in its conclusion that there was such a complete breakdown and destruction of the mental faculties as to preclude the idea that the will was the product of a disposing mind. The following was shown: There was insanity in the family. A sister had been confined in the state asylum for the insane at Agnews and had died there. From the year 1912 the deceased entertained strange beliefs, delusions, and hallucinations; the waiters in the restaurant were endeavoring to poison his coffee, the saloon keepers to poison his beer, wireless electricity was shooting violet rays through him, instigated by his enemies; the Southern Pacific Company, his former employer, sought to destroy him; it had detectives pursuing him; the detectives entered his house and stole a can of condensed milk and a can of corn; the Southern Pacific also instructed its engineers to blow off steam as they passed Cupertino (in the neighborhood of which his little property was situated) and "the steam would be carried by electric waves in the atmosphere and give him a shock"; a neighbor gave him a lemon, and he discovered that the skin was pierced and poison had been injected into it; he was visibly nervous, wild-eyed, distressed, and irrational. This, and much more, does not rest merely upon the oral evidence of witnesses, but is confirmed by a curious diary which the deceased kept in his own handwriting. Extracts from that diary are as follows:

"Mr. Redmond received two electric needles in his foot (ball). I got one while staking out." "Sunday night placed 2 rose bushes in the ground and the next morning one was gone and a piece of paper in its place." "About 15 years ago, a box of dynamite slid off a wagon on Larimer St. for no apparent reason whatever." "About 1 years ago I was walking across a field and stepped on an iron scraper and fell over unconscious. I felt a sharp pain back of my ear." "A half loaf of bread fell off the bar overhead in the old cabin on the 1 acre piece." "When the papers rain out of the windows in the City Hall when no wind was blowing. I got an awful shaking up in bed one night sometime before I went to the springs." "Detected a small hole in cheese. When I ate the cheese it cleaned my head out." "The Violet Rays in the Mirror." "The Violet Rays in the Pillow." "The electric needle pricks at Wilber Springs." "A flash of hot air passed between Mother and me."

[4] In addition to this the circumstance that he left his little property away from his aged mother and from his brothers from whom he had not been estranged was proper for the consideration of the jury (Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 671, 34 Pac. 504), as was also the fact that he met his death at his own hands (Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795). The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

The decree and order appealed from are affirmed.

OTIS v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6498.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1915.)

TAXATION — 543 — RECOVERY OF TAXES — MANDAMUS.

Under Pol. Code, § 3804, relieving taxpayers of the necessity of a protest at the time of payment, and declaring that moneys irregularly collected may, by order of the board of supervisors, be refunded by the county treasurer, six months' delay of the board of supervisors to take action on a claim for taxes illegally collected is tantamount to a denial, and will warrant a suit on the claim without any proceeding by mandamus to compel the board to consider and dispose of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1006-1016; Dec. Dig. 543.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by James Otis as surviving trustee under a trust created by the last will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant. J. R. Pringle and Rufus Hatch Kimball, both of San Francisco (Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to recover moneys paid on account of certain taxes assessed by the city and county of San Francisco, which taxes, it is alleged, were illegal. The taxes are the same as those whose validity was considered in Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco, 143 Pac. 705, where they were decreed to be illegal.

There is left for consideration in this case the sole remaining question of the remedy pursued by plaintiff. He brought his action against the city and county of San Francisco, basing it upon the provisions of section 3804 of the Political Code. That section in the case of the taxes therein described relieves from the necessity of a protest at the time of payment, and declares that moneys so irregularly collected on account of such taxes "may by order of the board of supervisors be refunded by the county treasurer."

The complaint here shows that seasonably after payment plaintiff made demand upon the board of supervisors by verified claim for an order for refund of the moneys so paid. Plaintiff followed this demand by many letters, repeating the same request, and appeared personally before the board and argued the merits of his demand. The result of all this was simply nonaction upon the part of the board. Formally, it neither allowed nor rejected the demand. Appellant contends, under the authority of such cases as Reed v. Omnibus Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 212, Smith v.

Omnibus Railroad Co., 32 Cal. 212, Id., 36 Cal. 281, Keller v. City of Corpus Christi, 50 Tex. 614, 32 Am. St. Rep. 613, and Heiser v. Mayor of New York, 104 N. Y. 72, 9 N. E. 866, that, as this is a remedy created by statute, the precise steps of the statute must be followed to obtain relief, that the treasurer is not entitled to act except on the order of the board of supervisors, and that the proper procedure for plaintiff to have adopted was that by mandate directed to the board of supervisors to compel them to make the proper order. Appellant recognizes that actions against counties upon claims such as this have frequently been sustained, as in Hayes v. County of Los Angeles, 99 Cal. 74, 33 Pac. 766, Pacific Coast Co. v. Wells, 134 Cal. 471, 66 Pac. 657, and Stewart, etc., Co. v. County of Alameda, 142 Cal. 660, 76 Pac. 481, but distinguishes these from the case at bar by pointing out that in each one of those, and in the other similar cases, the action was brought after the rejection by the board of the disputed claim. We have no disposition to criticize any of the cases cited by appellant. The principles enunciated in each and all of them are perfectly sound. Where a right is thus created by statute and the method of securing that right pointed out, in all essentials the legislative directions must be followed. But here, after repeated requests, demands, and arguments we have inaction upon the part of the board of supervisors for a period exceeding six months. This is certainly a reasonable time within which action should have been taken by the supervisors. If they may delay matters of this kind for this period, where would the line be drawn that demarks reasonable from unreasonable delay? We hold the delay in this case to be so unreasonable as to amount to a rejection by the supervisors of the claim, and thus to authorize the prosecution of this action in its present form.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

CREDIT CLEARANCE BUREAU v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6758.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1915.)

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Credit Clearance Bureau against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Edwin H. Williams and L. S. Melsted, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action the court sustained a general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, which complaint is, in all essentials, the same as that considered in Otis v. City and County of San Francisco, S. F. No. 6498, 148 Pac. 933.

For the reasons therein given, the court erred, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the trial court to overrule the defendant's demurrer.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; A. I. McSorley, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Ehrhart and another against D. R. Mahony and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Benj. F. Geis and Duard F. Geis, both of Willow, and Will A. Dower, of San Andreas, for appellants. Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. On September 27, 1910, the plaintiffs entered into a written contract with all of the defendants, except Clifton, whereby plaintiffs agreed to sell, and said defendants agreed to buy, three mining claims in Calaveras county for the sum of $3,000, of which $50 was paid on the execution of the writing, and the balance was payable in installments. The vendees agreed to do all assessment work.

The complaint set up the contract, alleged an assignment by the vendees to Clifton, alleged further, nonpayment of any part of the purchase price, except the $50, the failure to do the assessment work, for which plaintiffs had been compelled to pay $300, demand for the sums due, and a tender and continuous willingness and ability to convey a good title. The prayer was for judgment for the balance due and for the $300 paid by plaintiffs, for a decree that plaintiffs hold the legal title as security for the payment of the sums due, that they have a lien on said property to secure payment of such sums, that said liens be foreclosed, and that the property, or so much as might be necessary, be sold to satisfy the demand. The defendants denied some of the allegations of the complaint, and set up various affirmative defenses, based on alleged frauds and misrepresentations on the part of plaintiffs. On all these issues the court found for the plaintiffs, and judgment followed in their favor as prayed. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll.

The appellants present a number of points, but only one of them is, in our judgment, entitled to favorable consideration.

[1] Much stress is laid upon the fact that the descriptions of the mining claims in the contract vary from the descriptions found in the complaint and the findings. In each case the description is by name only, and the names, as given in the various papers, are not precisely the same. But the complaint embodies a copy of the contract, and alleges that the property agreed to be sold by said contract is described as set forth in the complaint. This allegation is not denied, and it establishes the identity of the apparently differing descriptions.

The argument based upon the claim of fraud is futile, in view of the fact that the evidence is not brought up, and the findings negative fraud.

[2] One of the defenses was that plaintiffs had waived their lien by commencing an action at law for the recovery of the purchase price. The court found that such action had been brought (and subsequently dismissed), but that there was no waiver. The conclusion was correct. Where the vendor retains the legal title, a proceeding at law for the purchase price is not a waiver of his right to proceed against the property. Longmaid v. Coulter, 123 Cal. 208, 55 Pac. 791.

[3] The appellants criticize the allegation of tender, but, since their answer showed that a conveyance would have been refused in any event, technical defects in the tender, or even a want of any tender, would be of no importance. Civ. Code, § 1440.

[4] But the appellants make a final contention which must, under the decisions of this court, be upheld. The complaint does not allege, nor does the court find, facts showing that there was an adequate consideration for the obligation sought to be enforced, or that the contract was just and reasonable as to the defendants. It is thoroughly established in this state that such facts must be alleged and proven in a suit for specific performance. Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 302; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193; Herzog v. A. T., etc., R. R. Co., 153 Cal. 496, 501, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, and cases cited. That the present action is one for specific performance cannot be questioned, in view of the decisions in White v. Sage, supra, and Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186.

For the reason stated, the judgment will have to be reversed. With nothing before us but the judgment roll, we have no basis for saying that the error was harmless. Nor would we be justified in modifying the judgment by striking out everything but the provision for recovery of the purchase price. An action for such purchase price is one at law, in which the parties are entitled to a jury trial, and it would hardly be fair for the appellate court to convert the character of the case after judgment, where no such change had been suggested below.

The judgment is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 1, 1915.)

1. DEEDS $\hookrightarrow$ 116—PROPERTY CONVEYED—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

Under the express provision of Civ. Code, § 1106, the subsequently acquired title of a grantor in a section, the whole of which he had purported to sell and convey, inured to the benefit of his grantees.

2. DEEDS $\hookrightarrow$ 114—CONSTRUCTION—QUANTITY CONVEYED—RECITALS.

In an action involving the title to land, evidence held to show that lots 1 to 4 of section 30-19-2 included all the land up to the west boundary of the section, as shown by the original government survey, and that there was no land to the west of such lots which could form lots 7 to 10 of the section as shown by a subsequent survey relied on by interveners.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Logan Cecil against Harry J. Gray and others, in which Louisa E. Boggs and others intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment and the denial of their motion for a new trial, the interveners appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of a tract of land in Glenn county, brought this action to enjoin the defendants from entering the land and constructing an irrigating canal thereon. The defendant Gray was about to proceed under authority derived from Louisa E. Boggs, Frank S. Boggs, Fred H. Boggs, and Alice J. Dutton, who, asserting title to the parcel which was to be occupied by the proposed canal, intervened, and asked that their title to the land claimed by them be quieted. Pending the action, the right to construct the canal was acquired by condemnation, and the present litigation has resolved itself into a contest between the plaintiff and the interveners over the title to the land claimed by the latter. Judgment went in favor of the plaintiff, quieting his title, subject to a right of way for the canal. The interveners appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The appellants describe the land which they claim to own as lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 of section 30 in township 19 north, range 2 west, M. D. B. & M., the said four lots containing 73.28 acres. The plaintiff asserts ownership to the whole of section 30. A government survey of township 19 was made, and the plat thereof approved on November 12, 1867. This plat was offered in evidence. It showed the easterly half of section 30, divided into two full quarter sections of 160 acres each, and the east half of the westerly quarter sections, each containing 80 acres. The west end of the section, bounded by the range line and by the two 80-acre subdivisions just mentioned, was divided into four lots, numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, and containing, respectively, 46.40, 46.20, 46, and 45.80 acres. The area of the entire section was 664.40 acres. A plat of a second survey, made by one Shackelford, was approved April 2, 1879. This plat shows lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, running along the westerly line of lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, and containing in the aggregate 73.28 acres. The land lying east of these lots is shown just as it was in the delineation of section 30 on the earlier plat. By the inclusion of lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 in section 30, on the face of the Shackelford plat, that section is made to contain 737.68 acres. Prior to the making of the second survey, the different subdivisions of section 30 (as delineated on the original survey) were patented to various persons. All of these parcels finally became vested in John Boggs, the last conveyance to him being dated August 10, 1875, on which date he was the owner of the record title to the whole of section 30. On August 16, 1879, John Boggs executed to John E. Crooks, Robert Balfour, and Robert Brodie Forman a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveying to them "all of section 30, township 19 N., R. 2 W., M. D. B. & M." This, it will be observed, was subsequent to the approval of the Shackelford survey and plat. The plaintiff has succeeded to the interest of the grantees under this deed. On July 23, 1880, the United States issued its patent to one Morris, conveying to him lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 of section 30. Morris conveyed such lots to John Boggs in December, 1885, and upon the death of Boggs the said lots were distributed to the interveners as successors to Boggs' title.

The plaintiff advances two distinct grounds for supporting the finding that he is the owner of the land in controversy. Either would suffice to justify an affirmation of the judgment and order. Both, we think, are sustained by the law and the evidence.

[1] In the first place, the plaintiff, as well as the interveners, claim under John Boggs. Under any view of the effect of the Shackelford survey, lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, as shown by that survey, were a part of section 30. Boggs made a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the whole of section 30 to plaintiff's predecessors in August, 1879. If he did not then own that part of the section included in lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, his title, subsequently acquired, inured to the benefit of his grantees. "Where a person purports by proper instrument to grant real property in fee simple, and subsequently acquires any title, or claim of title thereto, the same passes by operation of law to the grantee, or his successors." Civil Code, § 1106; Green v. Green, 103 Cal. 108, 37 Pac. 188; Merrill v. Clark, 103 Cal. 307, 37 Pac. 238. It makes no difference that Boggs, at the date of his deed to Crooks and others, may not have owned the whole of section 30. He purported to grant the entire section, and the effect of his deed was to estop him, as against the grantees, from asserting an after-acquired title to any part of the property which he had thus assumed to convey to them. Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, 629, 76 Am. Dec. 449.

[2] Some of the deeds in the chain of title from Crooks and his associates to the plaintiff contain statements of the number of acres, and these statements are relied on to limit the effect of the deeds. But the various instruments purported to convey "all of section 30," or "an undivided half of section 30," and these clear words of description are not to be cut down or modified by a recital of the quantity. 13 Cyc. 635. It will be remembered that all of the deeds in question were made after the approval of the Shackelford survey, and at a time, consequently, when lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 were, as appellants contend, a part of section 30.

[3] But, irrespective of the question just discussed, the respondent must be sustained in his contention that the appellants have failed to locate on the ground any land answering the description of lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, and outside of the boundaries of section 30, as that section was delineated on the original plat of 1867. The difference between the two plats is in the location of the range line forming the western boundary of the township and of section 30. The Shackelford plat locates this line further west than does the earlier plat, and lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 are placed in the strip bounded by the two lines. But there was ample evidence to justify the court in believing that no strip could be found within the township, and west of the range line as delineated upon the earlier plat. Testimony was given that the range line was in the center of the county road, and that the fence of respondent's inclosure was 27 feet east of the line. The fence had been in the same position since 1870. A surveyor who had surveyed section 30 shortly before the trial found that the entire section, as occupied by Cecil, measuring east from the center of the county road, had an area of 658 acres, less than the acreage of the section as shown by the original plat. The appellant's claim was that lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 were within the boundaries inclosed by plaintiff's fence. There was thus presented, at the least, a conflict of evidence, under which the court might find that the land inclosed and occupied by Cecil was only the original section 30 delineated on the plat of 1867. In other words, the evidence justified the inference that, notwithstanding the approval of the Shackelford survey, there was no tract of land corresponding to lots 7, 8, 9, and 10 as described in that survey. Harrington v. Boehmer, 134 Cal. 196, 199, 66 Pac. 214, 489.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF $\Rightarrow$ 50—AGREEMENT NOT TO BE PERFORMED DURING THE LIFETIME OF THE PROMISOR—MAINTENANCE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 7, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 7, providing that a contract shall be invalid unless it is in writing and signed by the party to be charged or his agent, where it is an agreement which by its terms is not to be performed during the lifetime of the promisor, an oral agreement whereby defendant's intestate offered to pay plaintiff $7,000 if she would furnish him a regular and permanent home for and during his natural life, although performed, was invalid; since plaintiff's agreement was not completed until the decedent's death and his part of the agreement could not be performed during his lifetime.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County.

Action by Maria Hagan against J. D. McNary, administrator of the estate of C. A. Kupper, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Seth Millington and U. W. Brown, both of Colusa, for appellant. J. W. Goad and Thomas Rutledge, both of Colusa, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant. It is alleged in the complaint that in January, 1912, Kupper offered and agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $7,000 if she would give and furnish him for and during the term of his natural life a regular, permanent, and established home; that plaintiff accepted said offer; and that thenceforth to the time of his death she furnished Kupper such permanent and established home. Kupper died on May 17, 1912, and thereafter the defendant, McNary, was appointed and qualified as administrator of his estate. Thereafter plaintiff presented for allowance a claim against the estate of deceased for the sum of $7,000, which claim was rejected by the administrator. Plaintiff then commenced this action to establish said claim.

The agreement was not in writing, and it was proven upon the trial by oral evidence. The objection is made that, the agreement being oral, it is within the statute of frauds, and therefore invalid. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 7. The provisions of these sections above referred to are as follows:

"The following contracts are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent: * * *

"7. An agreement which by its terms is not to be performed during the lifetime of the promisor, or an agreement to devise or bequeath any property, or to make any provision for any person by will."

The question is fairly presented whether or not the agreement falls within the language of these provisions.

Subdivision 7 aforesaid was added to these two sections in 1905 and 1907, and it has not heretofore been presented to this court for consideration. Plaintiff contends that its construction is controlled by a number of cases arising under subdivision 1 of the same sections. That subdivision provides that "an agreement that by its terms is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof" is invalid, unless it is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. The decisions referred to hold that an oral agreement is not invalid under this subdivision if its terms are such that it may be performed within a year, although it is not expressly so stipulated, and that before such a contract can be held void under subdivision 1 its terms must be such that performance within a year is impossible without a departure from such terms. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that the same principle of law will apply to subdivision 7. The agreement, as alleged and proven, states no time for the payment of the $7,000 which Kupper agreed to pay to plaintiff for the services to be rendered. The services consisted of furnishing Kupper a regular, permanent, and established home during the term of his natural life. This, of course, includes his whole life, and the service was not and could not be completed so long as breath remained in his body. The plaintiff's part of the agreement became completely executed upon his death, and not until then. The case comes under the somewhat familiar rule that, where services are to be performed for a given period for a stated sum, without any agreement as to when the payment is to be made, and the contract is entire, as it is here, the obligation to pay does not become matured, and payment is not due until the services are completely performed. Krump v. Campbell, 102 Cal. 375, 36 Pac. 664; 2 Pars. on Cont. (9th Ed.) 521; 2 Page on Cont. § 1157; 3 Elliott on Cont. § 2102. Complete performance of the service did not take place until the moment of Kupper's death. No obligation for immediate payment arose, therefore, until the moment after; that is, after the death of Kupper. His part of the agreement was not by its terms to be performed in his lifetime, but was by its terms to be performed immediately after his death; consequently it comes within the condemnation of the statute of frauds. It is invalid, and no action can be maintained upon it. The plaintiff's remedy, if any, is an action for the value of the services rendered, and not an action for the sum alleged to have been agreed to be paid therefor.

The judgment is affirmed.

DESIGNATION OF VALUATION—OMISSION OF DOLLAR MARK.

In an assessment book prepared by the assessor with appropriate headings, as required by Pol. Code, § 3650, no dollar mark was printed in the first column following the description of the property, headed "Value of Real Estate Other than City and Town Lots," but such mark was printed at the head of the following columns, intended for improvements, city and town lots, deductions, etc., and in the ninth column, headed "Total Value of All Property after Deductions." The columns were divided into perpendicular lines appropriate for the insertion of a figure between each line. In the first column appeared the figures "160," with nothing to indicate whether they represented dollars or cents, and, there being nothing in the intervening columns, the same figures appeared in the first three subdivision lines of the ninth column at the right-hand side thereof. Held that, from the book as an entirety, it sufficiently appeared that the assessed value of the property was $160, and the assessment was not invalid.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by F. Knobloch against the Associated Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edmund Tauszky, of San Francisco, for appellant. M. K. Harris and J. R. Webb, both of Fresno, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The complaint sets forth a cause of action to quiet the title of the plaintiff in a tract of land against the unfounded claim of the defendant. The answer denies the title of the plaintiff and alleges that the defendant is the owner of the land in controversy. The defendant's title is derived from a deed executed by the county tax collector on behalf of the state of California to William O. Maxwell, based upon a sale of the property for delinquent taxes levied and assessed for the year 1902. Maxwell thereafter conveyed the property to the defendant. The court made findings holding the alleged tax title of defendant invalid upon the ground that the property was not duly or legally assessed for the year 1902, the tax upon which the delinquent tax sale was based.

[1] The only defect urged against the validity of the assessment is the absence of the dollar mark at the head of the column in the assessment book headed "Value of Real Estate Other than City and Town Lots." The evidence shows that this defect existed. We think, however, that other parts of the assessment book completely cured the omission. The essentials required in an assessment book are set forth in section 3650 of the Political Code. That section provides that:

"The assessor must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings as directed by the state board of equalization, in which must be listed all property within the county, under the appropriate head."

The section then proceeds to state the matters that must be specified under appropriate headings. The evidence shows that the state board of equalization prepared the form of assessment book by requiring a number of columns with distinct headings. The column headed "Value of Real Estate Other than City and Town Lots" comes first after the columns provided for a description of the real property. In this column no dollar mark was printed. It is divided into perpendicular lines appropriate for the insertion of a figure between each line. In these lines were the figures "160," and the column, as it appears on the book, has nothing to indicate whether the figures represent dollars, cents, or mills. If this constituted the entire assessment book upon this subject, we should be compelled to sustain the decision of the court below upon the authority of Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 91 Pac. 1004, 1007, in which it was expressly held that a defect of this character was fatal to the validity of a tax sale. Upon examining the book, however, we find that there is no ground upon which such fatal effect can be given to this trifling defect. Immediately following, and to the right of the column above mentioned, appear other columns. Numbering the first column 1, the others are as follows: (2) "Value of Improvements Thereon;" (3) "Value of City and Town Lots;" (4) "Value of Improvements Thereon;" (5) "Value of Personal Property Exclusive of Money and Solvent Credits;" (6) "Amount of Money and Solvent Credits;" (7) "Deductions on Account of Mortgages, Deeds of Trust, Contracts, or Other Obligations by Which a Debt is Secured by Lien on Property;" (8) "Value of the Interest of the Mortgages, Trust Deeds, Contracts, or Other Obligations by Which a Lien is Secured in the Property Affected Thereby;" (9) "Total Value of All Property after Deductions." In each of these columns numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, the dollar mark appears in the appropriate place at the head of the column, showing that the figures to be entered below in the subdivision lines of the column represent the stated number of dollars, respectively. In the assessment in question no figures were entered in any of the columns from 2 to 9, except column "9," headed "Total Value of All Property after Deductions." The effect of this condition of the book was equivalent to a statement that there were no improvements upon the land in question, no city or town lots assessed to the owner, no personal property, no money or solvent credits, no deductions on account of mortgages, and no mortgage or trust deed interests to be valued. In brief, that there was nothing to be added to the value of the real estate described on the line and preceding the figures "160" in column 1. In column 9, at the appropriate place opposite the description and opposite the figures "160" in column 1, appeared the figures "160" in the first three subdivision lines of column 9 at the right-hand side thereof. This clearly showed that the total value of all property after deductions was $160. The previous columns showed that the only property valued was the property here in controversy. As an entirety the book was equivalent, therefore, to a statement that the value of the property in controversy was $160. No person could be misled upon an examination of the assessment book. It would clearly inform him that the total assessed value of the property was $160, and that nothing was deducted therefrom on any account whatever.

These facts clearly distinguish the case from Fox v. Townsend, supra, and the other cases upon which that case is founded. In none of them does it appear that there were other columns in which the dollar mark was properly entered, and which conclusively showed that the property was valued in dollars at the amount stated by the figures. Our conclusion is that the court erred in holding that the tax sale and deed were invalid because of this defect. It is necessary, therefore, to reverse the judgment and order.

[2] In view of the possibility of another trial, it is proper to mention another point urged for reversal. After the beginning of the action, and before the trial, the plaintiff conveyed to one Murray an undivided three-fourths interest in the land in question. It also appeared that the title he holds of the remaining fourth is held by him in trust for another person. The claim of the appellant is that because of these facts the court could not proceed with the case, or give judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in case it should properly decide that the plaintiff was the owner thereof at the time the action was begun. This claim is without merit. Where a transfer by the plaintiff of the property in controversy occurs after the beginning of the action, it is optional with the transferee to continue the action in the name of the original plaintiff, or to have himself substituted and proceed in his own name. Code Civ. Proc. § 385. If he elects the former alternative, the court may give judgment according to the conditions existing at the time the case was begun. The transferee, in that event, must be deemed to have elected to trust the original plaintiff to make over the title to him in some appropriate manner after the judgment has become final.

The judgment and order are reversed.

A complaint against the stockholders of a corporation to recover from them a corporate debt, which alleged that within three years last past the corporation became indebted to plaintiff for a balance due on an open account, sufficiently alleged, against a general demurrer, that the indebtedness was incurred within three years before the commencement of the action, so that the stockholders were liable therefor, since it can be reasonably construed to allege that the indebtedness, a balance of which remains due, was all incurred within the three years, and, if it was not sufficiently definite in that particular, a special demurrer should have been interposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by F. P. Cutting against Anna R. Oliphant and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank D. Stringham, of San Francisco, and D. D. Oliphant, Jr., Schwartz & Powell, and Hayes & Oliphant, all of Oakland, for appellants. Gerald C. Halsey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action brought to recover from the defendants the amount of their respective liabilities as stockholders of the D. D. Oliphant Company, a corporation, arising out of an alleged indebtedness of said corporation to the assignor of the plaintiff, in the sum of $2,236.97.

The facts out of which this corporate indebtedness arose are substantially these: During the year 1907 and thereafter the D. D. Oliphant Company was a corporation doing business in the city and county of San Francisco. In the month of May of that year it became necessary for the corporation to raise a sum of money to meet certain obligations then coming due. The plaintiff, F. P. Cutting, was the secretary of the corporation, and was also the manager of the F. P. Cutting Company, another corporation. In order to raise money to meet the accruing obligations of the Oliphant Company, an agreement was made with Mr. Cutting, representing the Cutting Company, which was then the owner of a thousand cases of tomatoes, by the terms of which the Cutting Company was to turn over to the Oliphant Company these tomatoes upon the understanding that the latter was to sell them, and use the proceeds of their sale, if necessary, to meet the obligations of the Oliphant Company as they fell due. In pursuance of this arrangement, the Oliphant Company proceeded to sell and deliver these tomatoes to various customers, and to use the money collected upon such sales. There were also some other articles, such as cans and solder, bought by the Oliphant Company from the Cutting Company during that year, and, on the other hand, some payments made or credits given, leaving a balance due from the Oliphant Company to the Cutting Company of the sum of $2,236.97, which being unpaid by the Oliphant Company, and being by the Cutting Company assigned to F. P. Cutting, he commenced this action against these defendants, as stockholders of the Oliphant Company, to recover their proportionate share of this indebtedness.

Upon the trial the court gave judgment against each of the defendants for the sum of $619.18 principal, and $240.57 interest, from which judgment and from the order denying a new trial the defendants appeal.

The first point presented by the appellants is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that their general demurrer thereto should have been sustained.

[1] The complaint is in two counts, which are, however, substantially the same in the form and substance of their material averments. In the first of these counts it is alleged that:

"Within three years last past the said D. D. Oliphant Company became and now is indebted to the plaintiff for a balance due upon an open book account in the sum of $2,236.97, for money paid, loaned, and advanced, and for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to said D. D. Oliphant Company at its special instance and request."

It is also alleged that at all times mentioned in the complaint each of the defendants was the owner of 83⅓ shares of the capital stock of the corporation. The objection which the appellants make to these averments of the complaint is that it does not appear therefrom that the defendants were stockholders of the Oliphant Company at the time the original indebtedness arose, but only at a time when there was a balance of such indebtedness due. We think, however, that this is altogether too strained a construction of the complaint to be availed of, at least upon general demurrer. It is true that the complaint refers to a balance of an account upon which the Oliphant Company became and was indebted within three years last past; but a balance of an account is not a new indebtedness; and the words "became indebted," as used in the complaint, may reasonably be held to refer to the time of the creation of the original account, and of which only the balance remains unpaid. The cases cited by the appellant in support of his contention all refer to actions against stockholders based upon new obligations given by the corporation in lieu of the original indebtedness, and hence they have no application to the case before us. Whatever doubt may arise in the construction of this complaint, from the use of the form of the common count therein in pleading the indebtedness of the corporation, amounts at most to an uncertainty, which should have been assailed by a special demurrer, in the absence of which we must hold the complaint to be sufficient.

[2] The next contention of the appellants is that the transaction between the Oliphant Company and the Cutting Company with regard to the transfer of the tomatoes amounted to a present sale of said goods as of the date of the agreement; and hence that the stockholders' liability of the defendants had that date for its inception; and that this action, having been commenced more than three years after that date, must be held to be barred by the statute of limitations. The findings of the court, however, are against this contention, and are in effect that the agreement between these two corporations relating to the tomatoes was that the Cutting Company merely authorized the Oliphant Company to sell the specified number of cases of its tomatoes, and received the money arising from such sale, and to use the same when so received to relieve, if necessary, its financial stress; and that the obligation of the Oliphant Company to the Cutting Company took its inception from the date of the actual receipt and use of the money derived from the sale of the tomatoes. The evidence in the case fully justifies this finding of the court; and this being so, and the action having been begun within three years of the earliest date of the receipt of the proceeds of the sales of the tomatoes by the Oliphant Company, it follows that the plea of the statute of limitations on the part of the defendants is of no avail.

[3] The appellants' next contention is that the court erred in excluding from evidence the warehouse receipt for the tomatoes which had been issued to the Cutting Company and delivered by it to the Oliphant Company. The statement of the case discloses that when it was proposed to introduce evidence preliminary to the introduction of the warehouse receipt, and the court inquired as to the purpose of its introduction, counsel for the defendants stated that their purpose was to show the date of the delivery of the goods in order to fix the date of the inception of the defendants' liability. The court sustained the objection to the defendants' offer; but a little later on in the trial it was admitted by both parties that the delivery of the goods was made prior to May 27, 1907. This admission must be held to have satisfied the purpose of the defendants, in the introduction of this evidence; and hence the error of the court, if any, in excluding it, was cured. The evidence does not disclose that the warehouse receipt itself was ever produced in court, or was ever offered in evidence by the defendants.

[4] We deem the appellants' final contention, that the court erred in refusing to grant the defendants' motion for a nonsuit as to the second alleged cause of action, to be without substantial merit, in view of the fact that both counts in plaintiffs' complaint cover substantially the same ground, and especially in view of the fact that, after the denial of the motion, the defendants presented evidence with respect to the dealings between these two corporations which would have the effect of eking out whatever defects in proof on the part of the plaintiff which, uncured, might have formed a proper basis for the defendants' motion. We discover no reversible error in this record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

McCAMPBELL v. OBEAR. (Civ. 1397.)

1. CORPORATIONS 82—SALE OF STOCK—CONTRACT TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A promoter of a corporation, who, to induce a subscription, executed in January, 1908, an instrument reciting that he guaranteed specified dividends, and providing that, should the subscriber desire to sell the stock on or before April 12th, he would purchase it at par, and, should the subscriber thereafter desire to sell, the promoter would purchase for an additional price prior to October 20th, and declaring that the promoter reserved the right to terminate his obligations on written offer to buy the stock and tendering the money at the agreed price at any time on or before the expiration of two years from date of agreement, gave the promoter the right to terminate such of the obligations of the guaranty as had not been either performed or insisted on by the subscriber either at the time provided for their performance or at any later time before the exercise by the promoter of the option to buy, and where in October the subscriber demanded performance of the guaranty, and the promoter failed to perform, an action begun in April, 1909, on the guaranty, was not premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by G. W. McCampbell against W. H. Obear. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Archibald Barnard, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. L. Fleming, of Los Angeles, and Costello & Costello, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $11,500, alleged to have become due to the plaintiff from the defendant in accordance with the terms of a contract between them arising out of a stock transaction.

The two chief witnesses upon the trial of the case were the plaintiff and the defendant. The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show the following to be the facts out of which the contract in question arose: The plaintiff, who was a rancher and vineyardist then living in Los Angeles county, met the defendant, a real estate agent and promoter, in the city of Los Angeles in the year 1907. He had been interested in transactions with the defendant before, and upon this occasion the latter sought to enlist his interest and cooperation in a plan for the purchase, development, and sale of a tract of land in San Mateo county. He asked the plaintiff to go in with him, and assured him that he would double his money in a short time, and offered to give him a written guaranty to that effect if he would put $5,000 into the venture. In October, 1907, the plaintiff came to San Mateo county and looked the land over, and, upon so doing, told the defendant that he would go in with him, and then gave him the sum of $2,500 on account of the transaction, for which the defendant gave a receipt, in which the organization of a stock company to handle the project is referred to, and also in which the defendant offers a guaranty that the stock of the plaintiff shall have a guaranteed dividend of 10 per cent. per annum, and a guaranteed value of $200 per share. A little later the plaintiff paid an additional $2,500 to the defendant, and received another receipt referring to his former subscription. In the meantime the corporation was in process of organization, with a capital stock of $550,000 divided into 3,750 shares of preferred stock and 1,750 shares of common stock, each of the par value of $100 per share. The plaintiff signed the subscription for stock in this corporation to the amount of $5,000, and upon the completion of the organization of the corporation the San Mateo county property was bought. Early in January, 1908, the plaintiff visited the office of the defendant in Los Angeles and asked for the formal guaranty which he was to receive, whereupon the following document was executed and delivered to him:

"This memorandum of agreement witnesseth: This is to certify that said G. W. McCampbell has this day purchased through us, as agents, fifty (50) shares of the preferred capital stock of the East San Mateo Land Company of the par value of five thousand dollars, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged.

"That for and in consideration of the purchase of said stock, through me as such agent, I hereby jointly and severally agree to and do hereby guarantee said G. W. McCampbell dividends upon said stock at the rate of eight (8) per cent. per annum, to be paid on or before the following dates, to wit: April 29, 1908; October 29, 1908; April 29, 1909, and October 29, 1909; and in the default of the payment of any of such dividends at the rate above specified, I hereby agree to pay said G. W. McCampbell, at any of said times when there is a default in payment of such dividends, an amount equal to an eight per cent. dividend upon said stock, said payment to be made upon demand.

"We also agree to save and hold said McCampbell harmless against any loss or depreciation in the market value of said stock below its par value. And should he desire to sell said stock on or before April 12, 1908, we hereby agree upon demand to purchase the same for the sum of $5,000. And thereafter, should he retain said stock, and desire to sell the same, we hereby agree to purchase the same at any time upon demand prior to October 20, 1908, for the sum of $10,000.

"This agreement and guaranty is subject, however, to the following conditions: That the undersigned reserve the right to terminate all their responsibility and all obligations under this guaranty upon written offer to buy said stock of said G. W. McCampbell and tendering to him the money therefor at the agreed price of $200 per share at any time on or before the expiration of two years from date hereof. And should he not elect to accept such offer, this guaranty shall be at an end.

"Dated at Los Angeles, California, this 16th day of January, 1908.

"[Signed]

W. H. Obear."

The defendant's plans for the subdivision and sale of the property in question do not seem to have come to fruition according to his hopes; and in the month of October, 1908, the plaintiff demanded in writing the fulfillment of the defendant's aforesaid guaranty, which not being forthcoming after several months of delay and some correspondence between the parties, he commenced this action on April 30, 1909, to recover the sum of $10,000. He subsequently filed a supplemental complaint for the additional amount of $1,500, alleged to have been paid in three assessments of $500 each upon his stock after the commencement of the action.

The defendant in his answer denied much of the preliminary negotiations prior to the giving of the alleged guaranty, but did not deny its execution and delivery to the plaintiff.

The verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiff upon all of the issues in the case, and judgment was rendered thereon for the full amount of his demand. This appeal is from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The first contention of the appellant is that this action was prematurely brought. This contention is based upon the construction which is placed by the appellant upon the concluding paragraph of the contract of guaranty above set forth, and which, according to appellant's insistence, postpones his liability upon all of the other obligations of his guaranty until a period later than the date of the inception of this action. We do not so construe this clause of the contract, for to do so would be to practically nullify the other provisions and conditions of the document, and thus violate the rule of construction that all parts of a writing are to be read together, so that, if possible, all shall be given effect. When the concluding clause of the defendant's contract is so read and so construed, we think that it must be held to intend that the only right which the defendant reserved by the terms of said concluding clause of his guaranty was the right to terminate such of the obligations thereof as had not been either performed or insisted upon by the plaintiff either at the time provided for their performance, or at any later time before the exercise on the part of the defendant of the option contained in the closing clause of his contract, which, as the evidence shows, he never exercised. It follows that the action was not prematurely brought.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that the contract of guaranty was without consideration, and therefore void. The argument of appellant in support of this contention rests wholly upon his construction of the evidence in the case; his theory being that the testimony of the plaintiff as to the circumstances leading up to his investment of the sum of $5,000 in the venture and to the giving of the guaranty is not to be believed. We do not find in the record any such inconsistencies in the plaintiff's testimony as would have justified its rejection; and it is evident that the jury believed, and we think were justified in believing, the plaintiff's story. This being so, and the jury having resolved the conflicting evidence in the case in favor of the plaintiff, its verdict will not be disturbed.

As to the several objections urged by the appellant to certain rulings of the court during the course of the trial, and also to certain of the instructions given to the jury, we think that none of these has any sufficient merit to require individual consideration.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

James W. Byrnes was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Reversed.

Earl Rogers, H. L. Giesler, Frank E. Dominguez, and M. M. Cohen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an indictment charging him with committing the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The scheme, trick and device, by means whereof the property of one Friesz was stolen, is fully described in an opinion of this court filed in the case of People v. Lee Rial, 23 Cal. App. 713, 139 Pac. 661, the theory of the prosecution being that defendant was the one therein referred to as the "man behind the counter," who, as shown, aided and abetted Rial in the commission of the crime for which the latter was convicted. While conceding the property of Friesz was obtained by Rial and his accomplices in the manner there set forth, defendant nevertheless claimed that he was not a party to or participant in the fraud, and that at the time when the transaction occurred in Venice he was in San Bernardino, some 75 miles distant therefrom, from which fact, if true, it must follow that he was innocent of the charge. The crime was, as alleged, committed on February 18, 1913, and the case was tried in June, 1914. At the trial Friesz identified defendant as being the man behind the counter who received the bets and, from pretended information received by him over the telephone, shown to have been a false pretense in that it was not connected with or a part of a telephone system, called off the places of the horses falsely represented to be running, and announced the result. The testimony of Friesz was the only evidence offered which tended to identify defendant as being present and participating in the commission of the crime. To controvert this proof, defendant testified that at the time in question he was in San Bernardino, and he procured a witness who, so far as shown, had no interest in the matter, who testified that in said city he met and talked to defendant at about the same hour when the prosecution claimed he was in Venice. A few days after the alleged offense, defendant was placed under arrest and incarcerated in jail. While there he was conducted to a room wherein there were a number of others, and Friesz being present was asked by officers accompanying him if he recognized any one in the room, other than Rial, who was at the pool room or acted in connection with Rial, to which, according to the testimony of the officers, he replied in the negative. And on another occasion about the same time, when inquiry into the matter was being considered by the grand jury, and Friesz being in the corridor near the grand jury room, defendant was brought into the corridor, and Friesz was informed by officers that the man arrested as being the one who received the bets was present among the persons there gathered, and, as shown by the testimony of such officers, after looking around, replied that he did not recognize him. Friesz claimed that he did at the times in question recognize defendant, but made no answer to the inquiry for the reason that he was "working under the rulings of the district attorney." He also admitted that after the trial of Rial, wherein he appeared as a witness, he stated to the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution of that case that he could not identify the "man behind the counter," who aided Rial in the perpetration of the crime, giving as a reason for making the statement the alleged fact that he feared if he told the truth "some of the bunch" would inflict bodily injury upon him. Upon this evidence so given by Friesz, and notwithstanding the evidence tending to impeach him as a witness, the jury were clearly justified in refusing to accept the testimony of defendant and his witness as sufficient to establish the alibi as claimed. The reason for thus referring at length to this phase of the case is that the sharp conflict therein presented, and Friesz' theretofore admitted inability to identify defendant as the man who participated with Rial in committing the offense, became highly important in considering the prejudicial effect of a ruling of the court in admitting evidence of other alleged like offenses, which ruling is the chief ground upon which appellant insists upon a reversal of the judgment.

The evidence, admitted under this ruling, was the testimony of J. A. Torline and A. N. Koehler as to the commission of alleged like offenses at Redondo Beach in February and November, 1912, whereby it is claimed their property was made the subject of grand larceny, and according to whose testimony Byrnes, the defendant, was fully identified as the chief operator, or man behind the counter.

As stated by the court in its instructions to the jury, evidence of these alleged collateral offenses was received for the sole and only purpose of showing that defendant was knowingly engaged in promoting and operating a criminal scheme or system of criminal action, and they were told that if they found there was such scheme or system, and that the crime with which defendant was charged was committed pursuant to or as a part thereof, then they might consider such evidence of alleged collateral offenses, "for the purpose of determining, and only for the purpose of determining, whether the defendant, if he was a party to the taking of the property of Friesz, acted with a guilty knowledge or with a guilty and felonious intent. But for no other purpose can you consider the evidence respecting any of such other alleged offenses."

[1] It is settled law that, the doing of the act being proved, evidence of other like offenses may, as an exception to the general rule, be received to "repel any inference of accident or mistake," and negative an innocent state of mind existing at the time of the doing thereof. Underhill on Criminal Evidence (2d Ed.) §§ 87, 89; People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, 62 L. R. A. 193; People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 137 Pac. 1076; Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, §§ 303 and 346.

[2] As in the case of Friesz, these witnesses were first induced to place bets with the operator of what purported to be a fully equipped betting exchange, having telephonic and telegraphic connection with the track where races were run and, as in the case of Friesz, in making their first bets they used checks drawn upon banks where sufficient funds were not on deposit to meet the same. After it was announced that the horse upon which they had placed their bets was the winner, and upon presenting their pool tickets, the question arose as to whether or not the money was on deposit to meet the checks. Whereupon, it was agreed that the cash and checks used in making the bets should be sealed up in an envelope and held until the checks were made good. The witnesses procured sufficient money to cover the checks and, in company with their new found purported friends, who were engaged with Byrnes in committing the offense, went to the so-called betting exchange for the purpose of collecting the money so won. The operator, stating that everything was correct and that they were entitled to payment, made the excuse that he was waiting for the books which would shortly arrive, when he would make payment. While waiting one of the bunko steerers expressed a desire to bet upon a race about to be run, and upon being informed by Byrnes that they could use the money in his possession to which they were entitled, in making a wager thereon, he instructed the other accomplice to place the entire sum upon a horse which he named to win, but through misunderstanding this other party placed it upon the wrong horse and the entire sum was lost. This evidence as to the paraphernalia and fittings contained in the pool room, scheme and system operated, is almost identical with that used in the so-called pool room at Venice, whereby Friesz was fleeced out of his money, with, however, this very material difference: While in the Venice case it was conclusively shown that the telephone and telegraph instruments therein had no connection with the wires or system of any telephone or telegraph company, by reason of which fact the entire scheme whereby Friesz was induced to place his wager was shown to be a fraud and to have no existence in fact, such evidence was wholly lacking in the case of the Redondo Beach betting exchange where Torline and Koehler placed their bets. Indeed, so far as shown, the telephone and telegraph instruments installed at Redondo may have been connected with systems and wires from which the operator received information, and the money may have been hazarded in all respects as Koehler and Torline intended it to be, and the races actually run, since there was nothing shown to the contrary. The room at Redondo appeared from the furnishings and fittings to be a fully equipped betting exchange or pool room for placing bets on races, having installed therein telephone and telegraph instruments which purported to be connected with a line of wire and system over and by means of which the operator was in constant communication with the tracks where the races were being run, and the representations were made to both Torline and Koehler that they were betting on what were termed and understood by them to be "fixed races." Not a word of evidence was offered tending to show that these representations were untrue, or that the pool room and its equipment were other than what they purported to be, or that the bets were not actually made as they intended them to be, and the races run with the result as announced by Byrnes. That the evidence tended strongly to show that at the times in question defendant was present, engaged in the operation of an unlawful scheme whereby these witnesses were swindled, may be conceded, but the transaction was wholly lacking in the material element existing in the main case, viz., the fraud and deception practiced upon Friesz. "When the body of the offense has been established, and that defendant passed the check, and it is sought to show guilty knowledge by the fact that defendant also passed other forged paper, the prosecution assumes the same burden as to all the other checks introduced. It must show that such checks were forged." People v. White-man, 114 Cal. 338, 46 Pac. 99; People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 137 Pac. 1076; People v. Bird, 124 Cal. 32, 56 Pac. 639. The testimony of Torline and Koehler, wherein they identified defendant as operating a betting exchange or pool room at Redondo, was insufficient to establish a like offense in that it was wholly lacking in the essential element of deception and fraud required to constitute the crime with which defendant was charged.

[3] Moreover, as stated, the reception of this character of evidence for the purpose of showing intent, is an exception to the rule and should only be received in cases where the intent accompanying the act is equivocal, or where it otherwise becomes an issue in the trial, as where it is claimed the act was the result of mistake, accident, or inadvertence, where from the nature of the acts constituting the crime with which the accused is charged, proof of its commission carries with it the evident and conclusive implication of guilty knowledge, there is no occasion for admitting such evidence, and the rule, not the exception, should apply. People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 654, 112 Pac. 281. Surely, if a man is captured while making his exit in the nighttime through a broken window of a storeroom, having in his possession goods of the owner stolen therefrom, and his defense is an alibi, no evidence of other like acts committed by him should be required to show the criminal intent with which he committed the act. So in the case at bar, proof of the acts, by means whereof Friesz claimed to have lost his property, was of a character which could leave no doubt in the minds of the jurors as to the criminal intent accompanying the act.

That such evidence so erroneously admitted must necessarily have prejudiced defendant in the minds of the jurors, admits of no doubt. The chief question in issue, and the one upon which the evidence of the prosecution was weak, was the identity and presence of defendant as a participant in the criminal act. As to this, the testimony of Torline and Koehler not alone tended strongly to corroborate that given by Friesz, but taken as a whole was well calculated to, and no doubt did, "create in the minds of the jury a prejudice against the defendant so pronounced as to preclude an unbiased consideration of the question as to whether or not, in its entirety, the evidence upon the main case left a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt." People v. King, supra.

A number of other alleged errors are discussed in appellant's brief, a consideration of which, however, is, under the view here expressed, rendered unnecessary.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PENNINGTON v. GEORGE W. PENNINGTON SONS et al. (Civ. 1483.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 24, 1915.)

CORPORATIONS — 298 — BOARD OF DIRECTORS — QUORUM.

Under Civ. Code, § 308, providing that a majority of the directors is sufficient for the transaction of business, and every decision of a majority of the directors duly assembled is valid as a corporate act, the power of a board to transact corporate business is not affected by the fact of a vacancy in the board, unless the number of directors is reduced below the required quorum; and a resolution removing a member of the board from his position as superintendent of the corporation, adopted by two directors at a meeting attended by the four of the five members, is a valid corporate act, the member removed being disqualified from voting and one vacancy existing by reason of death.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by George W. Pennington against George W. Pennington Sons, a corporation, and another. From an order denying relief to plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edwin L. Forster and Robert R. Moody, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order, which was the equivalent of a final judgment, denying plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate, commanding the corporation defendant and its president, the defendant Thomas Pennington, to restore the plaintiff to his position and salary as superintendent of the corporation, from which he had been removed by a resolution of the board of directors of the corporation at a meeting of the board which admittedly was regularly called in compliance with the by-laws of the corporation.

But one question of law is presented for consideration, and that arises out of the undisputed facts of the case, which are in substance as follows: On the 8th day of September, 1913, a meeting of the board of directors of George W. Pennington Sons, Incorporated, was held in the office of the corporation. There were present at this meeting four of the five directors of the corporation. At the time of this meeting there was a vacancy in the board of directors caused by the death of Mary Ann Pennington. The directors present at the meeting were Thomas Pennington, Edmond Pennington, George W. Pennington, and John Pennington. The meeting was called to order by Thomas Pennington, the president of the corporation, who, after appointing Edmond Pennington as acting secretary, offered a resolution providing that the plaintiff, George W. Pennington, be deprived of all salary as superintendent of the corporation from the date of the meeting. This resolution, after being seconded by Edmond Pennington, was put to a vote; Thomas Pennington and Edmond Pennington voting "Yes," and George W. Pennington and John Pennington voting "No." Thereupon Thomas Pennington declared the resolution carried, and then proceeded to offer another resolution, which called for the removal of George W. Pennington from the office of superintendent of the corporation, and deprived him of all authority to sign checks and documents for or in the name of the corporation. The latter resolution was also seconded by Edmond Pennington, and upon being put to a vote was declared carried by the affirmative votes of Thomas and Edmond Pennington.

The only disputed question of fact in the case is as to whether or not George W. and John Pennington were given an opportunity to vote upon the latter resolution. It is conceded, however, that the determination of this question of fact is immaterial to a discussion of the paramount point in the case, because admittedly the plaintiff was a party interested in the subject-matter of the resolution, and therefore disqualified, as a matter of law, from voting upon it. In other words, it is admitted that, if there had been in existence a full board of five directors, the affirmative vote of two of the three qualified directors present would have been sufficient to legally adopt the resolution deposing the plaintiff; and it is conceded, therefore, to be immaterial to know whether or not the third director was given an opportunity to vote.

It will thus be seen that the paramount question in the case is, as stated by counsel for the plaintiff, "narrowed down to an enunciation of the legal effect of an unfilled vacancy on the board of directors caused by the death and consequent inability to give notice to five directors." In this behalf it is the contention of counsel for the plaintiff, as we understand it, that, when a vacancy is created by death in a corporation's board of directors, no business of the corporation can be transacted until the vacancy in the board is filled, notwithstanding the fact that a sufficient number of the living directors to constitute a quorum may be present at a regular meeting of the board duly called for the purpose of transacting the corporation's business.

Section 308 of the Civil Code provides that:

"A majority of the directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business, and every decision of a majority of the directors forming such board, made when duly assembled, is valid as a corporate act."

Admittedly, if there had been no vacancy on the board of directors in the present case, and after due notice of the meeting one of the directors had failed to attend, the resolution in controversy would undoubtedly have been legally adopted by a majority vote of the qualified quorum of directors present at the meeting. No good reason for a contrary conclusion because of a vacancy in the board can be conceived; and, indeed, a contrary conclusion would necessitate a radical revision of the Code section above quoted, and that may be done only by the Legislature. The generally accepted rule which defines a quorum in the event of unfilled vacancies in corporate boards of directors is that:

"A quorum is a majority of the entire board as it would be constituted if all the vacancies were filled, and not a majority of the board as it remains with the vacancies unfilled." 10 Cyc. p. 778.

In other words, the power of the board to transact corporate business is neither diminished nor defeated by the fact of a vacancy in the board, unless the number of statutory directors be reduced below the required quorum; and the number of directors necessary to be present in order to constitute a quorum for the transaction of corporate business remains the same, even though there be unfilled vacancies in the board of directors. 3 Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 713a, p. 2462; Wright v. Commonwealth, 109 Pa. 560, 1 Atl. 794. Practically the same question presented here was involved in the case of Porter v. Lassen County, etc., 127 Cal. 261, 59 Pac. 563; and, while the court there did not definitely and directly decide the question, nevertheless it quoted with approval the doctrine announced in Wright v. Commonwealth, supra, that "the power of a board is never suspended by vacancies unless the number be reduced below a quorum;" and it is very evident that, if necessary, the court would have decided that "such boards, though curtailed in number, could carry on the corporation's business."

The corporate proceedings complained of in the present case being well within the statutory rule covering and controlling the creation, deliberations, and decisions of the board of directors, its action in adopting the resolution in controversy must be held to be valid, and therefore beyond the reach of the mandate of the court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

COSTELLO v. BELL et al. (Civ. 1456.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, March 26, 1915.)

1. VENUE $\S$ 41—PLACE OF TRIAL—NONRESIDENCE OF DEFENDANTS.

Where an action was brought in the county in which two persons, properly made defendants, resided, codefendants residing in another county were not entitled to a change of venue to the county of their residence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, providing that, if any person is improperly joined as defendant, his residence must not be considered in determining the proper county for trial of the action.

3. VENUE $\S$ 41—CHANGE OF VENUE—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where an action in claim and delivery for the possession of an automobile or its value was brought in the county of the residence of the two defendants who defrauded plaintiff out of the machine in that county by a fictitious check for its price, and who then took the machine to codefendants residing in another county, and placed it in their care, codefendants, who did not deny that plaintiff had been defrauded, as claimed by him, nor dispute that they came into the possession of the property from defendants, were not entitled to a change of venue to the county of their residence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by John P. Costello against John Doe Bell and others. From an order denying a motion of defendants Bell and another for change of venue, they appeal. Affirmed.

Charles O. Busick, of Sacramento, for appellants. Fitzpatrick & Greeley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion of the defendants Bell and Schlut for a change of venue from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Sacramento, their place of residence.

The facts of the case, as shown by the plaintiff's complaint, are as follows: On February 9, 1913, the plaintiff was the owner of a certain Stoddard-Dayton automobile which he had intrusted to the Acme garage in San Francisco for sale. On that day the defendants Menrath and Williams (alias Fisk) undertook to purchase said machine from said garage, giving therefor a false check for the sum of $1,300, being its entire purchase price; and, by this means having obtained possession of the machine, they drove it to Sacramento, where they placed it with the defendants Bell and Schlut. The fraud being discovered, the plaintiff brought suit in the city and county of San Francisco against Bell, Schlut, Menrath, and Williams, setting forth the foregoing facts, and praying for the return of the machine or its value. Plaintiff also seized the machine upon the usual affidavit and writ in claim and delivery. The defendants Bell and Schlut were served with process, but the other two defendants had for the time being disappeared and could not be found. The defendants Bell and Schlut in due course appeared and made this motion to change the place of trial, and in their affidavits filed in support of said motion deposed upon information and belief that the defendants Menrath and Williams were made parties to the action by the plaintiff for the sole purpose of defeating the right of said moving parties to a change of venue. In these affidavits it was conceded that the defendant Menrath was a resident of San Francisco at the time the action was brought. Later these affidavits were amended so as to be made direct instead of upon information and belief; and the residence of Menrath in San Francisco was denied. The defendants also asserted in these later affidavits that the transaction between themselves and their codefendants was one of sale, and that they bought and paid for the machine, and that it was their property, and that their codefendants had no interest therein. The plaintiff by counter affidavit denied that the defendants Menrath and Williams were made such for the purpose of defeating the other defendants' motion for change of venue, and asserted that the defendants Menrath and Williams both resided in San Francisco at the time the action was brought, and that they were necessary and proper parties to it, and hence that the motion of the defendants Bell and Schlut should be denied.

[1-3] We are of opinion that no error was committed by the court in denying the motion of the defendants Bell and Schlut for a change of the place of trial. It is not to be disputed that if the defendants Menrath and Williams were proper parties defendant, and that if they or either of them resided in San Francisco at the time the action was brought, their codefendants Bell and Schlut would not have been entitled to a change of the place of trial to Sacramento county, under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Greenleaf v. Jacks, 133 Cal. 506, 65 Pac. 1039. The evidence adduced by the affidavits of the respective parties to the motion is conflicting; and in such case this court will not interfere with the discretion of the lower court in reaching its conclusion as to which affiants were to be given credence. As to the showing sought to be made by the defendants Bell and Schlut to the effect that the plaintiff had named defendants Menrath and Williams as defendants in the action for the purpose of defeating a motion for change of venue, we do not deem such showing sufficient to establish that fact. It appears from the face of the complaint that the plaintiff had been defrauded out of his automobile by the defendants Menrath and Williams in the city and county of San Francisco, through the device of a fictitious check for its purchase price; and that, having obtained possession of it in this fraudulent way, these defendants took it to Sacramento, and there placed it in the care and custody of the defendants Bell and Schlut. It does not appear from said complaint that the last-named defendants were other than merely the agents of their codefendants in the custody of said machine.

[4] The plaintiff in his complaint sets up the fraudulent transaction, and prays judgment against all of the defendants for the return of the machine. This we think he had a right to do. The remedy of retaking personal property through the process of claim and delivery is not to be classed as an independent form of action, under our system of pleading; but it is available as an auxiliary remedy in any action wherein the plaintiffs assert a present right to the possession of personal property. Faulkner v. First Nat. Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 62 Pac. 463, and cases cited. In the showing made by the defendants Bell and Schlut in support of their motion, it is nowhere denied that the plaintiff had been defrauded out of the possession of his property in the manner detailed in his complaint; nor is it disputed that the defendants Bell and Schlut came directly into the possession of the property from those who had perpetrated the fraud. This being so, the plaintiff was not bound to inquire closely into the exact relation between the several defendants before commencing his action against them all, and enlisting the process of claim and delivery to aid him in the recovery of his property.

The motion for change of venue was properly denied. The order is affirmed.

BRUNSON v. CITY OF SANTA MONICA.
(Civ. 1671.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 25, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 745½ — NEGLIGENCE OF OFFICERS — LIABILITY.

In the absence of a statute permitting it, an action does not lie against a municipal corporation for damages caused by the negligence of its officers and servants in the performance of public or governmental duties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1568, 1569; Dec. Dig. — 745½.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 747 — NEGLIGENCE OF OFFICERS — LIABILITY.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a municipal corporation is not liable for the negligence of its officers in maintaining a dump as a public work of the city, though the person injured was compelled and permitted to use the dump within the exercise of the police power of the municipality for the protection of the public health.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1570–1577; Dec. Dig. — 747.]

3. STATUTES — 120 — TITLE — SUFFICIENCY.

Under Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be expressed in its title, the title of St. 1911, p. 1115, entitled, "An act relating to the liability of public officers for damages resulting from defects and dangers in streets, highways, public buildings, public work, or property," is not sufficient to justify a provision in the body of the act subjecting municipalities to liability for negligence of its officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 168–172; Dec. Dig. — 120.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by C. E. A. Brunson against the City of Santa Monica. From a judgment for defendant, rendered on sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. Burton Ceruti, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hutton, Jensen & Fogel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action judgment was entered in favor of the defendant under an order sustaining its demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to further amend said complaint. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

In the complaint it was alleged that the defendant maintained a dumping ground, "the same being the street, highway, public work and property of said city"; that defendant and its agents, officers, servants, and employes negligently and carelessly operated said dump so that it was in a dangerous and defective condition, and maintained a fire in the pit thereof; and did "compel and permit the plaintiff to use said dump so maintained, operated, and conducted as to cause the horses and wagon of the plaintiff to fall therein and in the pit thereof," with consequent damage and injury.

[1] In the absence of a statutory provision permitting it, an action will not lie against a municipal corporation for damages caused by the negligence of its officers, agents, and servants in the performance of the public or governmental duties of such corporations. On the other hand, it has been established that such corporation is liable for damages caused by negligence in its conduct of some kinds of business carried on by it for the public use, such as gas works, electric works, and waterworks. Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847.

[2] In the absence of a statutory provision declaring otherwise, a municipal corporation in California is not liable in damages for the neglect of its officers or agents in the maintenance or care of streets or bridges (Winbiger v. City of Los Angeles, 45 Cal. 36), nor for such negligence committed while engaged in repairing a sewer. Chope v. City of Eureka, 78 Cal. 588, 21 Pac. 364, 4 L. R. A. 325, 12 Am. St. Rep. 113. The case at bar comes within the doctrine of these cases of nonliability. The complaint does not definitely state for what purpose the so-called "dump" was being maintained; but it is stated that the dump was a public work of the city, and that the plaintiff was compelled, as well as permitted, to use it. This implies the use of a power of compulsion for some public reason, such as the exercise of the police power for protection of the public health. The decisions in other states, to which we are referred in the brief of appellant, show that there is a conflict of decision on the question here presented; but it is equally clear that the rule in this state is as above stated.

[3] An attempt has been made to modify, by statutory provisions, the rule of law above stated. An act approved April 26, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1115), is entitled:

"An act relating to the liability of public officers for damages resulting from defects and dangers in streets, highways, public buildings, public work or property."

Section 1 of this act reads as follows:

"If, in consequence of the dangerous or defective condition of any street, highway, public building, public work or property, any person shall suffer injury to his person or property, no officer who has charge of, or whose duty it is to care for or repair, any street, highway, public building, public work or property, shall be liable for any injury to person or property arising from the dangerous or defective condition thereof or failure to repair the same, unless such officer shall have had actual notice of such defective or dangerous condition and shall have failed for a reasonable time after such actual notice to repair the same; provided, that such officer had authority to remedy such condition, or to make such repair at the expense of the state, or a political subdivision thereof, and funds were available for that purpose; and provided, further, that it shall further appear that such damage or injury was sustained while said street, highway, public building, public work, or property was being carefully used and that due care was exercised to avoid such danger, but in all such cases damage may be recovered against the county, city, or city and county as in ordinary actions for damages, and in cases of judgment recovered against the county the amount thereof and cost shall be paid out of the road district fund of the district where the accident occurred, and in all other cases the judgment must be paid out of the general fund of such county, city, or city and county."

Respondent contends that this act is unconstitutional, at least in so far as it attempts to create a new liability against any county, city, or city and county, for the reason that such liability or nonliability is not a subject within the scope of the act as described in its title.

"Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title. * * * Constitution, art. 4, § 24.

"It is not necessary that the title of an act should embrace an abstract or catalogue of the contents. 'When the general purpose of the act is declared, the details provided for the accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents.' Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 637 [29 Pac. 252]. In Spier v. Baker, 120 Cal. 370 [52 Pac. 659, 41 L. R. A. 196], it was held that an act, by its title pertaining to primary elections, could not contain legislation as to political conventions. Such character of legislation furnishes a clear example of a violation of the provision of the Constitution here involved." People v. Linda Vista Irrigation Dist., 128 Cal. 477, 485, 61 Pac. 86, 89.

Here we have an act which, in its title, purports to deal with the liability of public officers for damages resulting from certain specified causes. This cannot, by any process of reasoning, be made to include the subject of liability of the public corporations in whose service such officers may be. The act is void as to any purported legislation therein contained attempting to create a new rule of liability as against such corporations.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

VAN HORN v. PACIFIC REFINING & ROOFING CO. (Civ. 1622.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨265—DANGEROUS PREMISES—RES IPSA LOQUITUR—APPLICABILITY OF DOCTRINE.

An owner, employing a contractor to install machinery, agreed to install steam pipes and connect them with the machinery. The owner was notified by the contractor's foreman to cap a steam pipe near which a machine was to be installed. The owner's steam fitter placed a cap on the pipe, but it blew off, permitting the escape of steam injuring an employé of the contractor. Held, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was applicable, and, in the absence of any explanation as to the cause of the accident, the liability of the owner for negligence was for the jury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨278—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to an employé of a contractor to install machinery caused by a cap on a steam pipe, maintained by the owner, blowing off, evidence held to establish a prima facie case of actionable negligence of the owner.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨997—DENIAL OF NONSUIT—REVIEW.

Where a nonsuit has been denied, and defendant has then introduced evidence as to the accident complained of, denial of nonsuit will not be disturbed, if all the evidence supports a verdict for plaintiff.

4. TRIAL ⇨250—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

A requested instruction submitting the issue of contributory negligence of plaintiff, suing for a personal injury, is properly refused, where contributory negligence was not pleaded, and where there was no evidence thereof.

6. NEW TRIAL ⇨108—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

New trial for newly discovered evidence, which, if produced, would not affect the result, is properly denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by W. H. Van Horn against the Pacific Refining & Roofing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Francis Dunn and Thomas E. Curran, both of San Francisco, for appellant. C. L. Dam and George Appell, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The first contention of the appellant is that its motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. The following are the conceded facts of the cause as presented by the evidence in support of the plaintiff's case: The defendant is a corporation which for several years past has been engaged in the manufacture of roofing and other building material in the city of San Francisco. In the month of March, 1912, it entered into a contract with the San Francisco Mill Furnishing Company, another corporation, by which the latter agreed to undertake the installing of certain machinery in the premises of the defendant, which machinery required connection with steam pipes for operation and use. The installation of these steam pipes, and their connection with the machine, was to be done wholly by the defendant. Some of these steam pipes were placed in position before the furnishing company commenced its work, and others were being installed while the work of installing the machinery was going on. Among the steam pipes which were thus installed when the furnishing company commenced work under its contract was a short upright pipe about three inches in diameter and a foot long, protruding from the floor at a point where one of the machines was to be and was being placed. This pipe was at first uncapped and emitted steam and hot water for a considerable period after the work of installing the machinery began; but finally the foreman of the furnishing company notified the defendant that the work of installing a machine near this pipe was to be begun, and asked that the pipe be capped. Thereupon, and on or about May 17, 1912, a steam fitter employed by the defendant placed a cap over the top of this pipe. The plaintiff was employed by the furnishing company on May 17, 1912, to assist in the work of installing the machines. He worked a portion of that day and the forenoon of the following day, which was Saturday, and also worked on Monday up to the hour of about 3 o'clock, when the accident occurred. During a portion of Monday afternoon, and for about an hour before the accident, he had been working in the vicinity of this upright pipe, passing back and forth near it, but not taking notice of it particularly, although he heard the steam sizzling around the edges of its cap. His immediate occupation there was that of assisting his foreman, George Marshall, in the erection of a scaffold, to be used in the course of installing the machine which was to stand near the pipe. He was presently ordered by Marshall to get a large box, which was on the floor in the vicinity of the upright pipe, to be used as a part of the scaffold. In order to get this box into the position in which he had been told to place it, he would have to move it from 16 to 20 inches toward and up against the pipe. In attempting to get the box into this position, the plaintiff was leaning over the pipe where the box stood, with his face within a foot of it, when suddenly the cap was blown off and the plaintiff struck in the face by it and by a stream of steam and hot water, from which he suffered the injuries for which he brought this action. The box which the plaintiff was handling at the time of the accident was 102 inches long, 14 inches wide, and 8 inches deep, and weighed 92 pounds.

The foregoing was the state of the plain-tiff's case when he rested and when the defendant moved for a nonsuit.

[1] It is practically conceded by the briefs of opposing counsel that, in order to defeat this motion, the plaintiff must rely on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and that the question as to whether or not this doctrine can have application to the facts of this case is the main issue upon this appeal.

The plaintiff was not an employé of the defendant, and had no relation with it, except that arising out of the fact that he was an employé of the independent contracting company engaged in the installation of certain machines in the defendant's premises. With the work of constructing or installing the steam pipes upon the premises, the employer of the plaintiff had nothing to do. The defendant was bound to furnish to the contracting company and its employés a reasonably safe place in which to do their work. The employés of the defendant who were installing its system of pipes, were not the plaintiff's fellow employés. There was nothing in the evidence offered in the course of the plaintiff's case from which an inference of negligence on his part could fairly arise, nor was there any evidence tending in the remotest degree to show that the employer of the plaintiff, or his fellow employé, or any other person, save and except defendant's employés, had ever touched or tampered with the steam pipes of the defendant, or this particular pipe, or the cap which covered it, and which was blown off at the time of plaintiff's injuries.

Such being the state of the evidence at the close of the plaintiff's proofs, we think that a case was presented to which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be fairly and properly applied. The cap of this steam pipe, which blew off at the critical moment when the plaintiff was bending over it in the course of his work, had been placed upon it only three days previously by an employé of the defendant. There are only three possible ways by which its dislocation could be explained: Either it was defectively constructed, or negligently and insufficiently affixed to the pipe, or else it had been tampered with and loosened to the point of danger under pressure by some one other than the defendant's employés. In either of the first two of these possibilities the defendant would be liable. But the appellant contends that, because the third possibility exists, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur cannot be given application. In support of this contention, counsel for the appellant argues that the mere fact that persons other than the defendant or its employés were working in and about the building, and had access to the particular floor where this steam pipe was located, would be sufficient to prevent the application of the rule, because some one or other of these might possibly have so struck or tampered with this pipe as to have caused the loosening of its cap to such an extent that it would be liable to blow off at any moment under pressure.

We think this argument, unsustained, as it is by any semblance of evidence or proof tending to show such interference with this pipe or cap, carries the possibilities in cases of this kind entirely too far. To give it application would be to practically eliminate the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur from the law, since it would be difficult to imagine a case where the appliance causing the accident would be so immured as to make it impossible for any person but its owner or operator to have access to it. The cases which the appellant cites as sustaining this view fall short of doing so; and among these the case of White v. Spreckels, 10 Cal. App. 287, 101 Pac. 920, will serve as a good illustration of the distinctions to be drawn in the application or nonapplication of the rule. In that case a steamheating radiator in a room occupied by the plaintiff exploded. The evidence showed that while the defendant, the owner of the building, had installed and was maintaining the radiator, it was as to its immediate use under the control of the plaintiff, who was actually engaged in heating or drying towels upon it (a use for which it was not intended) at the moment of its explosion. The rule declared in this and the other cases cited by appellant, to the effect that the exclusive control and management of the appliance causing the injury must be shown to have been in the defendant, must be taken to refer to the right of such control; otherwise, as we have seen, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur could seldom if ever be given application.

In the case at bar the exclusive control over the construction, installation, operation, and use of the steam pipes in this building and of this particular steam pipe was in the defendant and in no one else. And this condition is not affected by the fact that it would have been possible for other persons, in no way entitled to do so, to have touched or tampered with this pipe. It would not be reasonable to require that the trial court, upon a motion for nonsuit and in the absence of any shred of evidence as to the fact, should hazard a guess that some unauthorized person had wrongfully tampered with the instrumentality of the defendant causing the plaintiff's injury, in order to defeat the application of the doctrine to this case. The rule laid down in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, and quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, to the effect that "when a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care," may be given application to the case at bar. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 60; Judson v. Giant Powder Co., supra, and cases cited.

The recent case of O'Connor v. Mennie, 146 Pac. 674, in no way militates against this rule, but, on the contrary, it expressly re-states and upholds it, while at the same time defining the limitations attending its application to cases between employes and employers, which do not exist in the case at bar.

It follows from these views that the defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[2] It is, however, urged by the respondent that, even if it were conceded that the court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit, the error, if any, was cured by affirmative evidence offered by the defendant, and from which the jury would have been justified in finding that the defendant was negligent. The defense produced as its own witness, and after the motion for nonsuit had been denied, the steam fitter in its employ who had placed the cap on the pipe a few days before the accident. He testified:

"I screwed it on as tight as I could by gripping it with my two hands. I screwed it down tight. I put in on, I think, about eight or nine days before the accident happened. During that time steam was being continually passed through the pipes."

If this evidence had been before the court and jury at the time the defendant's motion for nonsuit was made, it would seem quite clear that, taken in connection with the evidence which the plaintiff had offered, it would have sufficed to constitute such a prima facie showing of negligence as to have justified the court in denying the motion for nonsuit.

[3] The rule is well settled in this state, in cases where a motion for nonsuit has been denied, and the defendant has then proceeded to offer evidence as to the facts and circumstances attending the accident, that if all the evidence given on the trial by both parties, considered together, sufficiently supports the verdict, the order denying the motion for nonsuit will not be disturbed. Srivani v. Dondero, 128 Cal. 31, 60 Pac. 463; Williams v. Long, 139 Cal. 186, 72 Pac. 911; Lowe v. S. F. & N. W. Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 575, 98 Pac. 678, and cases cited.

[4] The appellant urges several alleged errors of the court in respect to its instructions to the jury. None of these merit especial attention, except the objection that the court erred in its ruling refusing to give a requested instruction on the subject of the plaintiff's contributory negligence. The answer to this objection is that there was no evidence of any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff sufficient to justify or warrant the giving of such an instruction. Besides, the defendant had not presented the issue of contributory negligence in its answer. White on Personal Injuries, § 441.

[5] The appellant further contends that its motion for a new trial should have been granted upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The two items of newly discovered evidence upon which the appellant relied were, first, a written statement of one of the plaintiff's main witnesses as to the circumstances of the accident, made a day or two after its occurrence, which varied in certain material respects from his testimony given at the trial, and which the defendant claims it could have used for the purpose of impeachment of such witness, had this written statement been in its possession at the time his testimony was given. It is a well-established rule, however, that newly discovered evidence, which is simply impeaching or cumulative in character, is insufficient to support a motion for a new trial. People v. Golden-son, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161.

[6] The second item of evidence which the defendant claimed to have been newly discovered by it was the cap of the steam pipe which was blown off at the time of the plaintiff's injury. We do not think that the affidavits offered in support of the defendant's motion amount to a sufficient showing of due diligence as to either the statement of the witness Marshall, or the search for the missing cap, to have entitled the defendant to a new trial. Nor do we think that either of these items of newly discovered evidence, if produced, would have materially aided the defendant or affected the result of the trial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WILLIAM WILSON CO. v. TRAINOR et ux.
(Civ. 1425.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 23, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨934—JUDGMENT ⇨131—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

Upon a direct attack by appeal a judgment cannot be held to be void merely because the affidavit, upon which the order for publication of summons was granted, does not appear in the judgment roll, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 670, so that where the affidavits in support of an order for publication were filed in the action and were in existence prior to the making of the roll order the clerk's failure to include them in the default judgment was not a ground for reversal; and, if in fact no affidavits in support of the order had been made, that should have been affirmatively shown in the record upon appeal, and without such a showing the judgment upon direct attack would be presumed to be correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3777-3781, 3782; Dec. Dig. ⇨934; Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 160, 245; Dec. Dig. ⇨131.]

2. PROCESS ⇨98—PUBLICATION—ORDER.

An order for publication of summons was not defective because it did not include the proof upon which the court found the existence of the jurisdictional facts, jurisdiction to make the order resting upon the averments of the affidavits and not upon the recitals in the order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-124, 126; Dec. Dig. ⇨98.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨914—ORDER FOR PUBLICATION—PRESUMPTION—JURISDICTION OF FACTS.

An order for publication of summons having been made, it will be presumed on appeal that the necessary jurisdictional facts were duly established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3693-3698; Dec. Dig. ⇨914.]

4. PLEADING ⇨354—STRIKING OUT—IRRELEVANCY.

Where the denials of the answer of a defendant tendered no issue save upon conclusions of law, and the answer as a whole was evasive and contained numerous negative pregnant, the trial court was justified in striking it out as irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1092-1095; Dec. Dig. ⇨354.]

5. CORPORATIONS ⇨612—FORFEITURE OF CHARTER—PROCLAMATION.

A corporation's failure to pay its license tax does not effectually and finally forfeit its corporate franchise, until the forfeiture has been duly proclaimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2445; Dec. Dig. ⇨612.]

6. CORPORATIONS ⇨514—ANSWER—INFORMATION AND BELIEF—MATTERS OF PUBLIC RECORD.

The plaintiff's allegation of its corporate capacity and existence could not be denied upon information and belief, because it might have failed to pay its license tax, as the statutory acts to be performed before its franchise would be forfeited were matters of record, and the existence of a fact ascertainable from an inspection of a public record cannot be put in issue by a denial solely upon information and belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2052-2081; Dec. Dig. ⇨514.]

7. PLEADING ⇨129—ANSWER—ADMISSION.

Where plaintiff's allegation that the lease provided for an attorney's fee not to exceed a certain sum, taxable as part of the costs of the action, was not denied, an answer denying the reasonableness of the maximum sum provided in the lease and claimed in the complaint, admitted the plaintiff's right to attorney's fees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 270-275; Dec. Dig. ⇨129.]

8. PLEADING ⇨354—STRIKING OUT—MATERIAL ISSUE.

In such case, where it was the duty of the court to ascertain and allow a reasonable attorney's fee, such denial did not raise a material issue, so as to compel a denial of the motion to strike.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1092-1095; Dec. Dig. ⇨354.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the William Wilson Company against John Trainor and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Hoff Cook, of San Francisco, for appellants. Percy E. Towne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal upon behalf of both defendants from a judgment in an action of unlawful detainer.

[1] Upon a direct attack by appeal the judgment cannot be held to be void merely because the affidavits upon which the order for publication of summons was granted, do not appear in the judgment roll as is required by section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It appears from the order for publication upon which the default of the defendant John Trainor was entered, that the affidavits made in support of the order for publication were on file in the action, and that they were subsequently offered and received in evidence upon the hearing of a motion to quash the service of summons. It thus clearly appears from the record before us that the affidavits referred to in the order were in existence prior to the time of the making of the order. No claim or showing was made that the affidavits were insufficient to support the order, and the failure of the clerk of the court to perform the ministerial duty of including in the judgment roll necessary papers which were on file and available, cannot be considered as a ground for reversal. If in fact no affidavits in support of the order had been made that could and should have been affirmatively shown in the record upon appeal, and in the absence of such a showing the judgment upon direct attack must be presumed to be correct. Kahn v. Matthai, 115 Cal. 689, 47 Pac. 698.

[2] The order for publication was not defective, because it did not include the proof upon which the court found the existence of the jurisdictional facts necessary to the making of the order. Jurisdiction to make the order rested upon the averments of the affidavits, and not upon the recitals of facts found in the order.

[3] The order having been made, it will be presumed that the jurisdictional facts necessary to its making were duly established. Goodale v. Coffee, 24 Or. 346, 33 Pac. 990.

[4] The denials of the answer of the defendant Elizabeth Trainor tendered no issue save upon conclusions of law, and the answer as a whole was so evasive and contained so many negative pregnant that the trial court was justified in striking it out upon motion of the plaintiff upon the ground that it was sham and irrelevant.

[5, 6] The allegation of the corporate capacitancy and existence of the plaintiff could not be successfully denied upon information and belief because, perchance, the plaintiff had failed to pay its license tax, and might, therefore, unknown to the defendant, have lost its corporate character by operation of law. A failure to pay the license tax would not have operated to effectually and finally create a forfeiture of the corporate franchise until "the acts required to be performed by the secretary of state or the Governor (proclaiming the forfeiture) shall have been performed in the manner required." Kaiser, etc., Co. v. Curry, 155 Cal. 639, 654, 103 Pac. 341. "Without the performance of such acts, the forfeiture does not result. * * *" Alaska, etc., Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 Pac. 454. As a matter of course the statutory acts required to be performed in conjunction with the failure to pay the license tax, before a forfeiture of the corporate franchise will occur, must become matters of public record, and it is well settled that when the existence of an alleged fact may be ascertained from an inspection of a public record, its existence cannot be put in issue by a denial based solely upon information and belief.

[7, 8] It is claimed that the denial in the answer of the defendant Elizabeth Trainor relative to the allowance of attorney's fees, raised a material issue, and that therefore this denial alone should have compelled a denial of the motion to strike out. In this behalf the answer denies the reasonableness of the maximum sum provided in the lease, and claimed in plaintiff's complaint as an attorney's fee for the recovery of the possession of the leased premises. The allegation that the lease provided for the allowance of an attorney's fee, not to exceed a certain sum, which might be taxed as part of the costs of the action, was not denied. The plaintiff's right to attorney's fees was therefore an admitted fact in the case, and inasmuch as it was the duty of the court to ascertain and allow a reasonable attorney's fee within the limit of the sum fixed by the condition of the contract of the parties, it was unnecessary in the plaintiff's complaint to allege that any specific sum was a reasonable attorney's fee (First National Bank, etc., v. Holt, 87 Cal. 158, 25 Pac. 272; White v. Allatt, 87 Cal. 245, 25 Pac. 420); and as the court below fixed the attorney's fee at a sum very much less than that specified in the contract of lease, we cannot see how the defendant was prejudiced by the order complained of.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEARSON et al, v. BROWN. (Civ. 1462.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, March 29, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1915.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐187 — CONTRACT OF SALE—STIPULATION—WAIVER OF CONDUCT.

Where purchasers had been repeatedly in default under an installment purchase of land, and the vendor had received, without objection, the tardily made payments, by so doing he waived the stipulation of the contract making time of the essence, and providing that, upon default in payment of an installment for 60 days, payments made were to be forfeited as liquidated damages, and he was no longer entitled to take advantage of delinquencies, without express notice of his intention to enforce the stipulation, by declaring the contract canceled because of the delayed payments, and by claiming forfeiture of such payments as he had received; the only effect such declaration and forfeiture could have being to notify plaintiffs that such vendor intended to insist upon a strict compliance with the contract, which the plaintiffs fulfilled by immediately paying all back installments and interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 374, 375; Dec. Dig. ⇐187.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐102—BREACH OF AGREEMENT—"RESCIND"—"CANCEL."

In an action by purchasers of land under an installment contract to recover amounts paid thereunder, which defendant vendor had refused to return to them upon notice that he had "canceled" the contract, his statement in a letter to plaintiffs that he had canceled the contract was an abandonment by him, entitling plaintiffs either to sue for specific performance or to recover what they had paid on the purchase price, since "cancel" is equivalent in meaning to "rescind," which, when used with reference to the refusal of a party to a contract for sale of land to proceed further with its performance, is not employed in the sense in which it is used in Code sections referring to the termination of contracts by the technical process of rescission, but is employed rather to signify an abandonment of the contract by the party refusing to be bound.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Shepard K. Pearson and another against Herbert F. Brown. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

J. L. Kennedy, of Eureka, and J. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants. C. H. Oatman, of Sacramento, and W. H. Humphrey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendant. The action was one to recover the sum of $390, with interest, alleged to have been paid by the plaintiffs on account of two certain contracts for the purchase by them of certain lots in Richmond from the defendant, which contracts, it was claimed, the latter had broken and abandoned by his refusal to receive further payments thereon, and by his express cancellation of said contracts.

The facts regarding the making and execution of these contracts, and the defendant's alleged breach of them, out of which the plaintiffs' claim arises, are, according to the admissions of the pleadings, as follows: On August 21, 1909, the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a contract by which the former was to purchase from the latter a lot in a certain tract in Richmond for the sum of $800, to be paid in monthly installments of not less than $10; the first deferred installment to be payable on September 21, 1909, and the balance in monthly installments of $10 payable on the 21st of each and every month thereafter until the purchase price was fully paid. These deferred payments were to be without interest, except that it was agreed that, if the purchaser should be delinquent for a period of 60 days, interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum was to be paid thereon during the period of such delinquency. It was also provided that time was to be of the essence of the agreement; and that, if the payments were not made according to the terms and conditions of the contract within 60 days after they became due, then all of the payments were to be forfeited as liquidated damages, without recourse, at the option of the seller. On the 14th of October, 1909, a similar contract for the purchase of two additional lots in the same tract, for the purchase price of $400 each, payable by like monthly installments on the 14th day of every month thereafter, was entered into between the parties. The admissions in the pleadings show that the plaintiffs commenced making payments on both of these contracts, but that almost from the beginning they fell behind in paying the installments on the stipulated dates, sometimes being only a few days in arrears, and at other times allowing a month or more of delinquency to occur. On their first contract the plaintiffs paid in all and at irregular intervals the sum of $200 up to May 15, 1911. On their second contract they had paid in all and at like irregular intervals the sum of $190 up to May 15, 1911. These various payments were all received by the defendant without any objection on his part that they were not being made on time. No further payments upon the installments of either contract were made or offered by the plaintiffs after May 15, 1911, until December 30, 1911. On December 5, 1911, the defendant wrote plaintiffs a letter in the following words:

"December 5, 1911.

"James F. and S. K. Pearson, Arcata, Calif. —Gentlemen: This is to advise you that I have on this day canceled your contracts for lots in the Brown Andrade tracts on account of non-payment of installments, as you are now delinquent ten months, and I feel that I have carried this account long enough. However, if at any time within one year from date of this letter you should wish to buy four lots from me, I shall be very glad to apply what payments you have made on any four lots that you may select that I have in any of my tracts, at current prices.

"Yours very truly, Herbert F. Brown."

This letter was sent by mail to the plaintiffs at their place of residence in Arcata, Humboldt county, and in the ordinary course of the mails probably reached them a few days later. On December 30th the plaintiffs paid to one J. G. Dolson, the agent of the defendant to whom their previous installments had been paid, the sum of $120 upon each contract, which, according to the admitted averments of the plaintiffs' complaint, would have fully paid up all back installments then delinquent, and all interest upon deferred payments to that date. On January 19, 1912, the defendant wrote again to the plaintiffs, informing them that he had received their said payments of December 30th, but that he returned same, inasmuch as he had canceled their contracts on December 5th, and that he could not reinstate them as to the lots in question. On January 24, 1912, the plaintiffs demanded of the defendant that he retain and credit the said money, and apply the same upon the payments and interest on said contracts, which demand the defendant again refused to comply with. Thereupon, and on February 16, 1912, the plaintiffs demanded the return of the sum of $390 which they had previously paid on said contracts; and, this being also refused, this action was brought to recover said sum.

The court on motion rendered judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] Upon the foregoing admitted facts, the first question that arises is as to what the rights of the respective parties were on December 5, 1911, the date of the defendant's first letter to the plaintiffs informing them that he had canceled their contracts. On that date the plaintiffs were about eight months in default in respect of their monthly installments upon each of these contracts; and, according to the strict letter of their agreements making time the essence of such contracts, the plaintiffs would then have been subject to the penalty of having their contracts canceled, and of a forfeiture of the payments which they had theretofore made. On the other hand, however, the defendant, by repeatedly receiving without objection the several payments which the plaintiffs had been tardily making upon these contracts, must be held, by his action in so doing, to have so far waived his right to insist upon the strict letter of the contracts as to be no longer entitled to take advantage of the plaintiffs' past delinquencies so as to either declare the contracts canceled because of them, or to claim the forfeiture of such payments as he had theretofore received without objection when they were not being made on the dates fixed by the contract. Pomeroy on Contracts, § 337; Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 291, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751; Sausalito, etc., Co. v. Sausalito Imp. Co., 166 Cal. 302, 136 Pac. 57; Standard B. K. Co. v. Anderson, 121 La. 935, 46 South. 926, 15 Ann. Cas. 251; Barnett v. Sussman, 116 App. Div. 859, 102 N. Y. Supp. 287.

The foregoing cases not only sustain the rule above set forth, but they also undertake to distinguish and declare what the rights of a vendor are as to all subsequent payments due or to become due upon such contracts after such waiver on his part of the default of the vendee as to prior dilatory payments. The rule in this regard is well expressed in Stevinson v. Joy, supra, wherein it is said:

"Where time is made of the essence of the contract for the payment of rent or other payments of money, and this covenant has been waived by the acceptance of the rent or other moneys after they are due, and with knowledge of the facts, such conduct will be regarded as creating 'such a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture as could only be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it.'"

The rule is also well stated in Barnett v. Sussman, supra, wherein it is held that:

"The acceptance by the vendor from the beginning of payments not made according to the contract, but irregular as to time and amount, the purchaser being all the time in arrears, was a waiver of the forfeiture contract, which could not be revived, except on notice to the purchasers that, if they did not pay the balance due within a reasonable time specified, such forfeiture would then be exercised."

This statement of the rule accurately defines what the rights of the respondent in this case were on December 5, 1911, the date of his letter to the appellants, in which he assumed to cancel the appellants' contracts by reason of their default in making payments according to their terms. The respondent was not entitled to work such cancellation, and his said letter could not be given that effect. The utmost effect, under the foregoing rule, which would be given to it, would be that of a notification to the vendees that the vendor intended thereafter to insist upon a strict compliance with the terms of the contracts; and that unless within a reasonable time the vendees paid up their deficiency, and thereafter made their payments strictly in accordance with the time conditions of their contracts, the forfeiture clauses would be enforced. The vendees apparently placed this construction upon the defendants' letter of December 5, 1911, which the evidence shows they received through the mails at their home in Arcata, Humboldt county, on December 11, 1911, for the admitted pleadings show that on December 30, 1911, they paid to J. G. Dolson, the agent of defendant authorized to receive installments due on such contracts, and to whom their previous payments had been made, the sum of $120 on each contract, which fully paid their delinquencies thereon to that date. In so doing we think they acted within a reasonable time after receipt of defendant's letter; and we are also entirely satisfied, under the authority of Stevinson v. Joy, supra, that, when the plaintiffs had paid these sums of money to the agent of the defendant, they had fully relieved themselves of their past default, and were in the position of having fully complied with the conditions of their contracts up to the date of such payments. This being so, it was the duty of the defendant to have accepted such payments, and this failure and express refusal so to do constituted a breach of the contracts on his part. The pleadings show that on January 19, 1912, the defendant sent back to the plaintiffs the money they had paid on December 30th, and again informed them that he had canceled their contracts, and refused to further proceed with their fulfillment. On January 24, 1912, the plaintiffs again demanded that the defendant retain the sums which they had paid on December 30th, and which had not yet been actually returned to them, and apply the same upon their contracts. This the defendant again refused to do, whereupon the plaintiffs on February 16, 1912, demanded the repayment to them of the sums which they had previously paid in installments upon each of the contracts, and, this being also refused, they instituted this action for the recovery thereof.

[2] The contention of the respondent is that, conceding that he had not the right to abruptly terminate the contracts between himself and the plaintiffs in the manner and to the extent attempted in his letter of December 5, 1911, still his use of the word "cancel" in that and his later letter in respect to said contracts is not to be considered as the equivalent of the term "rescind," nor as amounting to a rescission of the contracts on the defendant's part; and hence, he argues, there being no rescission, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover what they had paid upon the purchase price. In making this contention the respondent seeks to bring this case within the reasoning of Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. We think, however, that the reasoning by which the respondent seeks to do this is based upon an over-refinement of terms. The word "rescind," when used with reference to the refusal of a party to a contract for the sale of real estate, to further proceed with the fulfillment, is not employed in the sense in which it is used in the Code sections which refer to the termination of contracts by the technical process of rescission; but it is rather employed in the sense and as the synonym of an abandonment of the contract by the party refusing to longer be bound by its terms. It is not necessary for such a party to use the word "rescind" in order to accomplish what the cases intend by the use of that term. Any appropriate words, or any definite acts, by which the vendor indicated that he would not proceed further with the fulfillment of the contract, and that he would not permit the plaintiffs to proceed further with the performance of its obligations on their part to be performed, will be taken to amount to a rescission or an abandonment of the contract, so far as the vendor is concerned, and will be held to entitle the vendees not in default to their choice of remedies for the breach of the contract on the vendor's part, in the exercise of which they could either stand upon their contracts and insist in a court of equity upon their specific performance, or they could accept the defendant's attempted repudiation and abandonment of the contracts, and, treating them as thus rescinded, sue for the return of the money already paid on them. The plaintiffs chose the latter course, as we think, under the admitted facts of this case as disclosed by the pleadings, they were entitled to do. It follows that the plaintiffs, and not the defendant, should have had judgment upon the pleadings.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount prayed for in their complaint, with interest from January 19, 1912, at the legal rate.

WOOSTER v. SUNDERLAND et al.
(Civ. 1505.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 24, 1915.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS —169—
DISCIPLINE OF SCHOOLS—POWER OF BOARD OF EDUCATION—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 1617, regulating the power of boards of education and giving such boards the right to suspend or expel pupils for misconduct, when other means of correction have failed, where plaintiff, a high school student, made a speech condemning the board of education at a students' meeting, held on a school day, during school hours, the proceedings of which were a part of school work, prescribed by the city superintendent, ex officio secretary of the board of education, and held under the observation of the high school principal, cognizance of the plaintiff's conduct, while participating in the meeting was within the jurisdiction of the board of education.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 341; Dec. Dig. —169.]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS —177—
DISCIPLINE OF SCHOOLS—EXPULSION—CONDUCT OF SCHOLAR.

Although Pol. Code, § 1617, regulating the power of boards of education and giving such boards the right to suspend or expel pupils for misconduct, when other means of correction have failed, did not expressly make misconduct of a student, in criticising the board of education in a school meeting, ground for expulsion, nevertheless, where the speech was intended as an attack on the board and delivered to create a spirit of insubordination in the students, the speaker's admitted purpose having been to belittle the board of education and its members in their official capacity, and the whole tenor of the speech having been calculated to produce that result and to engender a feeling of disrespect toward the board in the minds of the student body, it was within the power of the board to punish the insubordination of the speaker by expulsion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 346, 347; Dec. Dig. —177.]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS —177—
EXPULSION OF PUPIL—DEMAND FOR APOLOGY—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 8, providing that the board of education may expel a pupil to maintain school discipline when other means of correction have failed, where a pupil was guilty of misconduct in having delivered before a school meeting a speech criticising the board, such board's demand for an apology was not a waiver of the right to expel upon refusal.

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS —169—
DISCIPLINE OF SCHOOLS — MISCONDUCT OF PUPIL—SUMMONING PUPIL TO INVESTIGATION.

Where a high school student was guilty of misconduct in criticising the board of education at a meeting of the school pupils, held in the course of school work, the board had inherent power to summon such pupil before it to investigate and pass upon his alleged misconduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by Earl Wooster, suing by Ernest Wooster, guardian ad litem, against A. E. Sunderland and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Williams and C. E. Beaumont, both of Fresno, for appellant.—M. F. McCormick, of Fresno, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this proceeding sought by mandamus to compel the defendants, as the board of education of the Fresno city high school, to reinstate him as a student of the school, from which he had been previously expelled by an order of the board. The judgment of the lower court was given in favor of the defendants, from which and from an order denying a new trial the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll, and a statement of the case used upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case are substantially these: During the year 1913 the plaintiff was a student in the Fresno city high school; and just before the close of the school term, and before he had taken his final examinations, the plaintiff, during school hours, in the assembly hall of the school, delivered an address to the student body of the school, wherein he declared in substance that the auditorium, the chemistry room, and the domestic science department of the school, all of which were located in the same building, were unsafe because of the possibility of fire; and then denounced the defendants for compelling the students to hold their mass meetings, social entertainments, and class productions in the auditorium, because, in the event of fire, the means of exit were inadequate. Following the somewhat caustic criticism of defendants' management of the school and the school's properties, the plaintiff, in no uncertain terms, objected to and denounced the action of the defendants, previously taken, prohibiting the students from engaging in the class performance known as "a donkey fight," which it seems was an annual event with the students, and oftentimes resulted in "cracked heads and injured bodies." The plaintiff declared, during the course of his address, that it "was not fair of the board of education to forbid a donkey fight, in which the boys took their own chances of being injured, and forced them to take chances of being injured in a fire trap." The plaintiff closed and climaxed his incendiary address by offering a resolution, which was adopted by the student body, requesting the defendants in their official capacity as members of the board of education, to "no longer talk about bonds, but to do all in its power to put such a bond issue before the people of the district." In due season, as was to be expected, the defendants were informed of the plaintiff's address to the student body; and thereupon plaintiff was cited to appear before the defendants, sitting as the board of education, and explain his motive for making the address. The plaintiff appeared before the defendants; and while attempting to justify his conduct, declared incidentally that his address to the student body "was intended as a slam" at the defendants. At the conclusion of the hearing of the matter the defendants formally decided that the plaintiff's conduct was a breach of school discipline, and that it was intended and calculated to discredit and humiliate the defendants in the eyes of the student body; and as a punishment therefor demanded of the plaintiff an apology, and a public retraction of his offensive remarks. The plaintiff refused to comply with the demand of the defendants, and as a consequence an order was finally and formally entered of record upon the official minutes of the defendants, expelling the plaintiff as a student from the Fresno city high school.

But two points are presented and relied upon in support of the appeal, and they are in effect: (1) That the student body was not a co-ordinate branch of the high school, and therefore the defendants, as the board of education, were without jurisdiction in the premises; (2) that the particular conduct of the plaintiff, for which he was expelled, was not sufficient to warrant and justify his expulsion, even if the defendants had jurisdiction of the matter.

[1] The defendants, as the board of education of the Fresno city high school department, were empowered to prescribe and enforce rules not inconsistent with the state law or the rules of the state board of education, for the government of the high school; and "to suspend or expel pupils for misconduct when other means of correction have failed to bring proper conduct." Pol. Code, § 1617. The evidence adduced upon the hearing had in the lower court shows, without conflict, that the student body of the Fresno city high school was at all times under the immediate supervision of the principal of the school; that the meetings of the student body were held on school days and during school hours; and that its proceedings were a part of the school work prescribed for the students by the city superintendent of schools, who was ex officio secretary of the board of education; and finally, that the meeting of the student body at which the plaintiff delivered the offensive address was held on a school day, during school hours, and under the immediate observation of the high school principal.

This being so, it seems idle to contend that the proceedings of the student body were beyond the control and regulation of the defendants in their official capacity. Being a part of the school work prescribed for the students upon school days, and during school hours, the proceedings of the student body, and its conduct individually and collectively, when in meeting assembled, were undoubtedly as much within the control and cognizance of the defendants, as would be the ordinary school work and conduct of the students when assembled in the class rooms upon school days and during school hours. That this is so seems plain to us beyond the need of further discussion; and being so, there is no room for argument that cognizance of the conduct of the plaintiff, while participating in the proceedings of the student body, was not within the jurisdiction of the defendants sitting as the board of education.

[2] It cannot be successfully contended that the defendants were without jurisdiction to expel the plaintiff, because neither the statute nor any rule or regulation of the defendants expressly made the misconduct charged against the plaintiff a ground for expulsion. This contention, in our opinion, is met and overcome in the case of State ex rel. Burpee v. Burton, 45 Wis. 150, 30 Am. Rep. 706, where, in disposing of a similar contention, the court said:

"In the school, as in the family, there exists on the part of the pupils the obligation of obedience to lawful commands, subordination, civil deportment, respect for the rights of other pupils, and fidelity to duty. These obligations are inherent in any proper school system, and constitute, so to speak, the common law of the school. Every pupil is presumed to know this law, and is subject to it, whether it has or has not been re-enacted by the district board in the form of written rules and regulations. It would indeed seem impossible to frame rules which would cover all cases of insubordination. * * *

The reasoning and the conclusion of the opinion in the case just quoted was commended and followed in the case of State ex rel. Dresser v. Board, 135 Wis. 619, 116 N. W. 232, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1050, where it was said that there are "certain obligations on the part of the pupil, which are inherent in any proper school system, and which constitute the common law of the school, and which may be enforced without the adoption in advance of any rules upon the subject."

The minutes of the meetings of the defendants, at which the conduct of the plaintiff was considered, were read in evidence at the trial of the case; and it is apparent therefrom that the order of expulsion complained of was based upon findings made by the defendants to the effect that the conduct charged against the plaintiff was intended to discredit and humiliate the board in the eyes of the students, and tended to impair the discipline of the school. The trial court, among other things, found that the plaintiff's address to the student body was intended as "a slam at the defendants," and delivered for the purpose of creating in the minds of the students a spirit of insubordination, and was subversive of the good order and discipline of the school. We have no doubt but that the respective findings of the defendants and the trial court were sufficiently supported by the testimony taken at the hearing had before the defendants and the evidence adduced upon the trial of the case. In our opinion no other findings were permissible under the undisputed facts and circumstances of the case. The admitted purpose of the plaintiff's address was to belittle the defendants in their official capacity; and the whole tenor of the address was well calculated to produce not only that result, but to engender as well, in the minds of the students, a feeling of disrespect for the defendants, and a secret if not an open hostility to their control of the student body and management of school affairs. Such being the natural tenor and tendency of the plaintiff's address, his conduct in making the same cannot be classed as anything but a species of insubordination to constituted authority, which required correction at the hands of the defendants in order that the discipline of the school might be maintained unimpaired by anything that was said and done by the plaintiff. State ex rel. Dresser v. Board, supra.

[3] There is no merit in the contention incidentally made that the defendants' demand for an apology from the plaintiff was a waiver of the right to expel. To the contrary, such demand and the refusal of the plaintiff to comply therewith, were, under the particular facts of the present case, essential as a predicate to the greater punishment of expulsion. The exercise of the power of expulsion is expressly limited to cases where other means of correcting misconduct have failed (Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 8). In other words, a resort to the harsh penalty of expulsion may not be had until milder measures for the correction of misconduct in any given case have failed. In the present case an apology would have been adequate punishment for the misconduct of the plaintiff, and doubtless would have served to prevent a repetition thereof; and at the same time would have tended to correct the evil resulting therefrom. The refusal of the plaintiff to make the apology demanded not only accentuated his misconduct, but made it necessary for the defendants to resort to an order of expulsion as the only effective means of punishing the plaintiff and maintaining the discipline of the school. State ex rel. Dresser v. Board, etc., supra.

[4] Involved in the contentions made upon behalf of the plaintiff is the suggestion that the defendants exceeded their power when they ordered the plaintiff to appear before them to explain and justify his conduct. In response to this it will suffice to say, that having jurisdiction in the premises, the defendants undoubtedly had the inherent power to summon the plaintiff before them for the purpose of investigating and passing upon his alleged misconduct.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by W. R. Bradshaw & Co. against Frederick Eggers, as Sheriff. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting defendant's motion for new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. Tomskey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The facts are these: The plaintiff, a wholesale dealer in tailors' cloths, entered into an arrangement with one Muller, a tailor, by which the former was to place with the latter in his tailoring establishment 50 suit patterns of cloth, which the latter was to sell in the form of suits as ordered, and for which patterns of cloth he was to pay as the suits were sold. While this cloth was in the possession of Muller under this arrangement, a portion of it was attached upon the suit of a creditor of Muller, and taken into the possession of the defendant as the attaching officer. The secretary of the plaintiff, who was in its employ under a regular monthly salary, spent some time in looking up the matter of the attachment and whereabouts of the property; and he also, acting for the plaintiff, placed the matter of the recovery of the property into the hands of Mr. Samuel T. Bush, the regular attorney for the company, with instructions to retrace the goods and reclaim the property, paying him the sum of $50 for his services. Upon the trial it appeared from the testimony of Mr. Bush himself that he prepared the plaintiff's verified claim and demand for the property to be presented to the sheriff, signing the same as the attorney for the plaintiff, and that the clerks in his office did some work in the service of papers, etc., prior to the institution of the suit. Mr. Bush also testifies that the $50 paid to him was not paid to him as an attorney's fee, but for the purpose of trying to recover the property without litigation; but he also very frankly testifies that he—

"acted in the capacity of an attorney in representing the claimant in the effort to recover the property, and received the $50 for that."

This action for the conversion of the property was presently begun. Upon its trial the case was submitted upon the plaintiff's proofs, the defendant offering no evidence. The court found in favor of the plaintiff, awarding it the sum of $305 as damages, of which sum, according to the findings of the court, the item of $16.65 was awarded as compensation for the time expended in the proper pursuit of the property, and apparently the further item of $50, paid to plaintiff's attorney as above set forth, was included in the above award of damages.

[1] The defendant moved for a new trial upon several specified grounds of insufficiency in the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment of the court. The court granted said motion generally, without specifying upon what particular ground it based its order. It is not required of this court that upon this appeal it shall review all of the grounds urged by the defendant upon his motion for a new trial. If any one of these was sufficient, the order of the trial court will be sustained, and that one of the defendant's grounds of motion was sufficient we entertain no doubt.

[2] The trial court awarded plaintiff damages in the sum of $305.65; and in making up this sum included the item of $50 paid to the attorney for the plaintiff, as testified to by himself. It is evident that this fee was paid to plaintiff's attorney as such, and for services which consisted chiefly, if not wholly, in consultations and in the preparation of the claim and demand of the plaintiff, which were necessary preliminaries to the institution of this action. The rule is well settled that attorneys' fees are not recoverable as damages in actions of claim and delivery or conversion. Martland v. Bekins, etc., 19 Cal. App. 283, 125 Pac. 759; Nicholls v. Mapes, 1 Cal. App. 349, 82 Pac. 265; Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 62 Pac. 395; Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, 41 Am. St. Rep. 200; Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 459, 462, 25 Pac. 12; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325. The evidence in this case being insufficient to sustain the finding and judgment of the court as to this element and item of the damages awarded to the plaintiff, the court properly granted defendant's motion for a new trial.

It is not necessary to consider the other points in the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Mendel Berman against Byron Rutley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Manning, of Oakland, for appellant. Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,769.15, alleged to be due according to the terms of a written contract between the parties.

The facts of the case, which are relied upon to sustain the findings of the court, are these: On the 1st day of May, 1912, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement, which recited that the defendant was the holder of a lease upon certain premises in the city of Oakland, in which he was to open a clothing store dealing in men's clothes, and to stock said store with a certain lot of goods which he had theretofore ordered from the Imperial Clothing Specialty Company, a corporation of New York; that the plaintiff was an experienced clothing salesman, whose services the defendant was desirous of procuring as manager of his said store for the ensuing year with a view to a future partnership between them. The agreement further recited that the defendant was presently to receive from the Imperial Clothing Specialty Company a bonus of $500 for handling their goods, and that he was also to borrow $1,500 from the plaintiff, which sums he was to use in the fitting up of the store and in the conduct and carrying on of the business; that the $1,500 so to be received from the plaintiff was not to be repaid by the defendant in the event that a copartnership was entered into between them within the period of a year; but that in the event that no such partnership was entered into the plaintiff was to be repaid the same, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of its advancement. It was also agreed that the plaintiff was to receive the sum of $150 a month salary from the date of the agreement.

The testimony adduced upon the trial was chiefly that of the parties themselves, and was radically in conflict as to what had occurred subsequent to the execution of this agreement. The trial court, however, chose to accept the plaintiff's statement as to the relation and dealings and differences of the parties during the months immediately succeeding the making of their contract. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff so accepted by the court was in substance to the effect that, owing to some misunderstanding with the Imperial Clothing Specialty Company, and possibly to the unsatisfactory quality of their first consignment of goods, the defendant did not receive from that company its promised bonus, and did not handle their goods, and in fact never did open the store; but, owing to his capricious and procrastinating ways, kept the plaintiff at his beck and call for eleven months, paying him his stipulated salary with a fair degree of regularity during that time, but finally abandoning the enterprise and disposing of the leasehold of the store. During this period repeated attempts were made to arrive at a settlement of the mutual obligations and differences of the parties arising out of their agreement and subsequent conduct, but without avail, until finally, when the enterprise was abandoned and the design of forming a partnership given up, the plaintiff demanded the return of his $1,500, with accrued interest, and the payment of the small remaining balance of his salary, which, being refused, this action was brought to recover those sums, aggregating the amount for which judgment was given.

As heretofore stated, the testimony of the plaintiff and the defendant is in sharp conflict upon many of the foregoing matters; and practically the entire brief of appellant is devoted to a discussion of those disputed issues of fact. The trial court, however, resolved these conflicts in favor of the plaintiff, and with its discretion in so doing this court will not interfere.

We do not discover in this record any legal question which requires consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

1. SALES ⚡S7 — EXECUTED SALE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover an amount due plaintiff on sales of oil which had been bought by his vendor from the defendant, which had agreed with plaintiff to deliver such oil to plaintiff's customers, collecting the price and accounting therefor, evidence held sufficient to show that the transaction between defendant and plaintiff's vendor was an executed transaction of sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by C. R. Laurence against the Pacific Oil & Lead Works. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant. Powell & Dow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $687.13.

The facts out of which this action arose are substantially these: On the 25th day of April, 1911, the Pacific Oil & Lead Works, the defendant herein, made a written contract with the Cocoanut Products Company of Portland, Or., which recited that the Pacific Oil & Lead Works had sold, and the Cocoanut Products Company had bought, 400 tons of a certain grade of cocoanut oil, to be shipped from April 25 to October 31, 1911, in quantities to suit the purchaser. In the month of August, 1911, the Cocoanut Products Company found itself unable to use a portion of the oil which it had agreed to purchase, and since the market price of such oil seemed to be declining, the latter company concluded to sell the excess of the oil deliverable to it under its aforesaid contract. The plaintiff is a commission merchant and broker. His first transaction with the Cocoanut Products Company consisted in his sale for them of 75 barrels of this oil upon a brokerage basis. Shortly after this transaction was placed, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the Cocoanut Products Company by which he was to buy from them a large part of the remaining portion of this oil for a net price, which he was to undertake to sell to customers of his own at figures which would yield him a profit. The oil was still in the hands of the Pacific Oil & Lead Works, and it was deemed desirable that, when the oil was delivered by the latter, it should be transmitted directly to the plaintiff's customers. The Cocoanut Products Company consequently requested the Pacific Oil & Lead Works to deliver said oil directly to the customers of the plaintiff as ordered by him. The plaintiff also came in touch with the Pacific Oil & Lead Works through its officers, and explained to them the situation, viz., that he had bought the oil from the Cocoanut Products Company for a fixed price, and was about to sell it to various customers of his own at an added price, and that he wished to make an arrangement with the Pacific Oil & Lead Works, by which the latter would deliver the oil directly to the plaintiff's customers as ordered by him, and collect from them the price at which he had sold it to them, and pay over to him the excess between the price at which he had bought it from the Cocoanut Products Company and the price at which he had sold it to his customers, which difference in price is called overage. The plaintiff testified that the defendant agreed to this arrangement, and the court found such to be the fact. Thereupon the plaintiff sold three separate consignments of this oil to as many customers, notifying the defendant of the fact and detail of each of these sales. The defendant filled these several orders for said oil, and made collections thereon, according to the plaintiff's direction, but, having done so, refused to pay plaintiff his overage. Hence this action. The court found substantially the foregoing to be the facts, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of his alleged overage. The defendant appeals.

The two main points which the appellant presents upon this appeal are: First, that the contract between the appellant and the Cocoanut Products Company was a mere executory contract for the sale of certain oil not in existence at the time such contract was made, and hence that the Cocoanut Products Company had no such title to the oil as they could deliver to the plaintiff, and that, having no title to the oil, the plaintiff could have no interest in the price at which it was finally sold; and, second, that the agreement between the appellant and plaintiff was without any consideration.

[1] As to the first of these propositions, it may be noted that the written agreement between the appellant and the Cocoanut Products Company purports on its face to be much more than a mere executory contract. It recites that the Pacific Oil & Lead Works "have sold," and that the Cocoanut Products Company "have bought," the oil covered by the contract. In addition to this the plaintiff averred in his complaint that the appellant "sold" the oil in question to the Cocoanut Products Company, and in responding to this averment the defendant expressly admitted that it had "sold" to the Cocoanut Products Company the oil mentioned in the complaint, and that said "sale" was made in San Francisco. In further support of the foregoing averments and admissions the manager of the defendant testified that:

"The oil involved in this suit had been by us sold to the Cocoanut Products Co.; they had bought it on April 25, 1911. It was their oil. They bought it and we had sold it."

In view of this state of the record it is rather late to urge for the first time on appeal that the transaction between the appellant and the Cocoanut Products Company of April 25, 1911, did not amount to such a complete purchase and sale as to pass the title to the oil to the Cocoanut Products Company.

[2] The second contention of the appellant is that the agreement between itself and the respondent by which it was to deliver the oil in question to his customers at the prices he directed, and collect and pay over to him the overage, was without consideration. We think that this contention is without merit. The plaintiff testified and the court found that the appellant had agreed to act for the respondent in the matter of delivering the oil which he had sold to his customers, collecting thereon at his prices, and paying over to him the difference between the price at which he had bought and sold the oil. This agreement reveals nothing more nor less than an agency between the parties to it, the obligation of which having been accepted by the appellant for reasons of its own not revealed by the evidence, it cannot be heard to question the consideration moving to it for undertaking such agency after it has received the respondent's money through its exercise. The money thus received does not belong to the Cocoanut Products Company, for it has already been credited with the full price at which it sold to the respondent the oil. It does not belong to the appellant, for it had no contractual relation with the ultimate purchasers of the oil, and could only have received the price at which it was sold to them as the agent of the respondent. This overage was therefore the respondent's money. Whether or not the price which the appellant received from the respondent's customers for the oil delivered to them was greater or less than the price at which the appellant had originally sold the oil to the Cocoanut Products Company is, in view of the findings of the court, an immaterial factor in this case.

The appellant urges several other points of alleged errors occurring during the trial of the cause. None of these, however, appear to us material, or sufficiently prejudicial to justify the reversal of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRIDGES v. CITY OF SIERRA MADRE.
(Civ. 1620.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 25, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\Leftrightarrow$ 162—OFFICERS—COMPENSATION—CITY ATTORNEY.

Under Municipal Corporations Act (St. 1883, p. 277), § 879, providing that the city attorney of a city of the sixth class shall advise the city authorities and officers in all legal matters pertaining to the business of the city or town, and that he shall receive certain specified compensation for the collection of delinquent taxes, and such other compensation as may be allowed by the board of trustees, and a city ordinance, providing that the duties of the city attorney shall be those now fixed by law, and such other duties as the board of trustees shall hereafter fix by ordinance, fixing the compensation of the city attorney at $50 per month, and providing that the salaries therein fixed shall be in full compensation for all services rendered, the city attorney of such city cannot claim extra compensation for services rendered by him in addition to the collection of delinquent taxes and the giving of advice, without showing an agreement by the trustees to pay such compensation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by H. F. Bridges against the City of Sierra Madre. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Dunlap, of Stockton, for appellant. Charles C. Montgomery, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant corporation is a city of the sixth class. On April 28, 1911, on motion duly adopted by the board of trustees, appellant was appointed attorney for the city from month to month at a salary of $50 per month, beginning May 1st, and thereafter acted as city attorney pursuant to that appointment. During the period of his incumbency in that office appellant performed services in behalf of the city which he claims were outside of his duties under his general employment as city attorney, and for which he demands compensation in addition to the salary provided in the order by which he was appointed. The demand is for $1,000, and the items of service rendered had relation to negotiations and contracts for acquiring a water system for the city; assistance rendered to special counsel in an action to condemn certain water rights and rights of way; examinations of records for purposes connected with the foregoing matters; work done relating to the issuance of municipal bonds; and sundry smaller business, including services as attorney in certain actions of minor importance. On April 9, 1913, appellant presented to the board of trustees his demand for the amount sued on herein. Prior to that time his official relation to the city as its attorney had been terminated. At the trial it was stipulated that Ordinance No. 3 of the city of Sierra Madre, approved March 28, 1907, from which we quote herein, was in force at the time of appellant's employment as city attorney, and that no ordinance repealing said Ordinance No. 3 was passed until after the services described in the complaint had been rendered, and that no ordinance, resolution, or motion, except those which have been mentioned, was passed or adopted by the board of trustees of defendant in relation to services to be performed by the plaintiff. It was further stipulated that the services sued upon "are claimed by plaintiff to have been performed as a result of conversations between the plaintiff and three members of defendant's board of trustees," but there is no evidence and there is no stipulation with respect to such conversations. The case was submitted to the court upon the stipulation of facts without taking evidence as to the value of plaintiff's services, upon the understanding that if the court should determine that plaintiff was entitled to judgment in his favor, further evidence would be taken as to the value of the services, but that if the court should find that plaintiff was entitled to take nothing by his action, judgment should be entered accordingly upon the stipulation and the pleadings. Thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The duties of the city attorney of a city of the sixth class are described in section 879 of the Municipal Corporations Act. It is there provided that it shall be his duty "to advise the city or town authorities and officers in all legal matters pertaining to the business of said city or town," that he shall receive certain specified compensation in connection with the collection of delinquent taxes, and that "he shall receive such other compensation as may be allowed by the board of trustees." The ordinance above mentioned is entitled as an ordinance "defining the duties of and fixing the salaries of and the bonds to be required of certain officers of said city." Sections I, IV, and VIII of this ordinance, so far as applicable to the city attorney, are as follows:

Section I. "The duties of the * * * city attorney * * * shall be those now fixed and specified by law for the said several officers and such other and further duties as the board of trustees shall from time to time hereafter fix by ordinances."

Section IV. "The salary and compensation of the city attorney of the said city is hereby fixed at the sum of fifty ($50.00) dollars per month."

Section VIII. "The salaries hereinabove fixed shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the respective officers hereinabove named. * * *"
